

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:"—

FRANCE—DENUNCIATION OF THE TREATY OF COMMERCE—RESOLUTION—
Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the recent action of the French Government in imposing 'Differential Duties' on merchandise carried in British Ships in the 'Indirect Trade,' is inconsistent with the policy mutually agreed upon between the two Countries in 1866; and that such policy, whilst likely to entail serious injury upon French Trade and Manufactures, is calculated, in the present circumstances of the 'Carrying Trade,' to inflict injury upon British Shipping, and to impair the relations and intercourse between the two Countries, which have grown up under recent commercial arrangements, more especially when it is considered that other European flags are (under Treaties recently made with them) free from the restrictions now imposed upon British Shipping,"—(Mr.
Graves,)—instead thereof 1760

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—After long debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT: Sir, I rise to move that the Bill be now read a second time. The question of giving the Parliamentary vote to women who are owners and occupiers of property has come before the House on three previous occasions; on the second it received much larger support than on the first, and on the third more than on the second. Last year 151 Members voted in favour of the Bill, and the total number of Members in the present House of Commons who have voted in favour of the principle of the Bill is 202. Outside there has been a corresponding growth of public opinion in favour of the measure, which has been shown by the expansion of old and the formation of new associations, by the resolutions of public meetings in all large towns, and by the increase in the number of Petitions presented to the House. Two years ago the number of signatures attached to the Petitions was 160,000; a year ago it was 180,000; this year, according to the last Return, the number has reached 243,000, and up to-day no doubt the number will reach 250,000. I mention these facts to show the steady rising and somewhat rapid growth of opinion in favour of the Bill. Although the question has been somewhat extensively discussed in this House, I cannot, of course, ask that the Bill be read a second time without offering some reasons for doing so; but I promise to be brief. Of course, everybody admits that in the abstract women have a right to vote. ["No, no!"] At all events, I can quote opinions to that effect given by the late Sir Robert Peel, the right hon. Gentleman the present Leader of the Opposition, the late Mr. Cobden, and many other distinguished men. Women have to obey laws, to suffer from the infraction of them, and to bear the burdens of the State in common with men. Every year we vote millions of money to maintain the Army, the Navy, our Courts of Justice, and the government of our colonial possessions. In support of all these, women contribute their full share. The Chancellor of the Exchequer makes distinctions between the rich and the poor in taxing the people. In the case of the income tax, for instance, the very poor pay none, and those who are less poor pay upon a diminished scale. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer makes no difference between men and women. I am aware, however, that Parliament never legislated to satisfy a theory, or to establish an abstract right, and therefore I must give other reasons in favour of this Bill. Among those reasons, I would say that whenever you remove disabilities from a portion of the people—I do not care what those disabilities may be—those in whose favour the change is made always stand higher in the estimation of the community than they stood before. Let women be consulted as men are consulted, in a constitutional manner, with regard to the laws which they are asked to obey, and from that moment they will have more self-respect and will command a greater degree of respect from men. Among the many very poor reasons which are urged against this Bill, is the statement that if women had the franchise that courtesy which is supposed to be universally extended to them by men would disappear; but it must be in the recollection of hon. Members, that in days gone by there were women in this country who returned Members to this House in their own right. Does anybody suppose that these privileged ladies were treated with less courtesy by those among whom they lived than their less privileged sisters?

Mr. Jacob Bright

Women may or may not have intellectual defects which do not belong to men, but they have at least the sagacity which has enabled them to discover that it is independence which commands courtesy, and not dependence; they have the knowledge which assures them that it is influence and not the absence of influence which obtains consideration, whether it be the influence of wealth, of rank, or of political power. We charge women with leading vain and frivolous lives, and then we endeavour by force of law to limit their fields of thought and of activity to a narrow sphere which we call their own. Give women the responsibility which comes with political influence, and you open up to them a larger life; you will find them with experience and knowledge they did not before possess, and which they would not otherwise have acquired; you will make them fitter companions for intelligent men; and I believe the result will be the attainment of a higher civilization. I may be told these are not very practical considerations, and that they should be addressed only to men who have generous thoughts and wide sympathies; but I have found in my experience of this House, that these mental qualities are as much possessed by men on both sides of this House as they can be in any Assembly in the world; and that being so, I have a right to appeal to them. I am aware, nevertheless, that both the House and the country will ultimately decide this question upon severe practical considerations, and therefore it is to the practical argument I will for a short time call the attention of the House. There have been within my lifetime, and probably within the lifetime of the majority in this House, two considerable extensions of the suffrage—that of 1832 and that of 1867. In 1832 the middle classes for the first time in recent years obtained political power, and they have employed that power for their own advantage, and, I believe, for the advantage of the country. They have been enabled to secure almost absolute free trade—the freedom of that by which they live. They have modified legislation in many ways. Look, for instance, at the position of Dissenters, who are in the main a middle-class body. When they obtained political power they were labouring under great disabilities. Civil and religious liberty was the watchword of almost every great statesman, and the result of their enfranchisement was, that they were put upon an equality with the rest of their countrymen. It has been the same with the working classes. In 1867 they acquired political power, and everyone knows what a change has come over the tone of the House in consequence. Had they not obtained the vote, it would have been impossible to have done justice to the cultivators of the soil in Ireland, or to have inaugurated a national system of education. Not only so, but we have commenced dealing with the truck system, and have come to regard trades unions as legitimate organizations. By the Ballot we are giving political independence to the humblest voter; and the Chancellor of the Exchequer never brings his Budget before the House without carefully balancing the interests of the country, and seeing that the working classes are treated as generously as any portion of the country. Now, women are said to be illogical; but the facts are against those who make the accusation. It is because women are logical that they ask for this Bill. They have noticed the result of the extension of the franchise in legislation with regard to every other portion of the people. They have found that the middle classes and the working classes have been consulted more assiduously, and are more respected throughout the community than they were before; and they believe, with a degree of reason which is unassailable, that the same results would follow if the franchise were extended to them. Have women any grievances to redress? Do they suffer from inequality of the laws? They believe, and many hon. Members in this House believe, that the legal inequalities from which women now suffer are far greater than those which were borne by the middle and working classes before they obtained political power. We should probably differ very much in this House, and in the country, as to the way in which these inequalities should be dealt with, but nobody will doubt their existence. Under the Elementary Education Act, I find that some of the boards, either on their own authority or with the sanction of the Educational Department, give three pennyworth of education to girls and four pennyworth to boys, a distinction which can be defended only on the ground that girls are more intelligent than boys, and that it therefore takes less time to instruct them. Women also have just grounds for complaint that the educational endowments of the country are withheld from them, and that the Endowed Schools Act does not rectify the injustice. Last year I referred to the unequal contest going on between a few intellectual women and the authorities of Edinburgh University. These women have passed with honour every examination to which they have been submitted, but they are not allowed to complete their professional education. No institution which is not national should come to Parliament for funds to sustain it. The Edinburgh University comes to this House year after year, and sums of money are annually voted for its maintenance, and yet it shuts its door to one-half of the community. I know of nothing more scandalous than the fact that every woman in Edinburgh is taxed for the maintenance of this University, and not one of them can partake of its advantages. I will not refer to the inequality of the divorce laws, beyond saying that last year the Prime Minister, in speaking upon this subject, expressed in eloquent terms his objection to the state of the law. With regard to the rights of property, it is well known that a woman's property is still confiscated by her marriage. To illustrate the hardship of the law, I may mention the recent case of Mrs. Shillito, who had £500 in the bank when she married. Her husband soon died, and the money was confiscated to pay the creditors of her husband, the principal of whom were his father and brother, for debts contracted before the marriage. The result was, the widow was left penniless. Let it be remembered that while the husband takes everything the wife has which is not settled on her, he is in no wise liable for a farthing of her debts. I have been told by wholesale traders in Manchester, who deal with thousands of shopkeepers all over the country, that it is difficult for them to give credit to any single woman, because she may at any time marry, and the result would be that the husband would become possessed of all she had without being responsible for her debts. The hon. Member for Coventry (Mr. Staveley Hill) has introduced a Bill dealing with this peculiarity; but I hope the House will not accept that Bill, because it proposes a retrograde step, and will never settle the question satisfactorily. With regard to the possession of children, at present the right of the father is absolute—the right of the mother is absolutely nothing. Will anyone say that is a just arrangement? Surely the natural tie between the mother and the child is as strong as that between the father and the child. Look at the original anxiety and suffering of the mother in regard to her child; consider the incessant watching by day and night which falls upon her, and then imagine that at the age of seven she ceases to have any right of control over that child. There are numberless cases in which mothers are threatened with the loss of their children, if they do this, or refuse to do the other. But there is a stronger case still in the position of the widow having children. If there are those who believe that the father's rights should be absolute when living, surely there are none who think the mother should have no rights when the father is dead. I remember reading a speech by Mrs. Crawshay, of Merthyr, upon this point, wherein she declared it to be the hardest of all existing laws that the mother is not held to be the natural guardian of her children upon her husband's death. Nothing in the world can be harder than that. A woman may find when her husband is dead that a stranger may step in, and be able to dictate what religion her children should be taught, and even to separate them from her altogether. I could give instances of this kind which have lately been reported in the public Press, but I will be satisfied with that general statement, lest I should occupy too much the time of the House. Perhaps I shall be told that most of these hardships come from the common law, and have been of long duration. That is, I suppose, true; but it is not true that recent legislation has been more agreeable to women, or more in accordance with their sense of justice, and as it is my duty to make a practical case, showing the necessity for political protection, I am obliged to go for a moment into that recent legislation. Knowing what I know of the opinions of this House and of the other House of Parliament—for we have all of us the means of ascertaining the sentiments which prevail in the other Chamber—I am

justified in saying that there is nothing at this moment but the consciences of women standing between this country and a gigantic system of prostitution supported and controlled by the State. So far is this system established by law, so deep is the root it has already taken among us, that prostitutes, in their legalized corporate capacity, have begun to petition this House, and to ask for a special Vote on account of their peculiar position; and the supporters of the system have been so unwise as to ask that these Petitions should be read at the Table. Women believe that this system of legislation has inflicted a supreme degradation upon their sex. Our soldiers and sailors are not the most sensitive, delicate, or fastidious, even among the humbler portion of our people; yet, when this system was applied to them by medical officers, there was a general revolt against it; the men declared it humiliating and degrading to them; and it was singular that Parliament could hold that that which was degrading and humiliating to men could in any sense be morally elevating to women. The Royal Commission has declared against that legislation; there have been innumerable Petitions against it, with as many as 500,000 signatures in one year; the Money Vote which it required was carried by a narrow majority of Government officials; and still apparently the system is to be continued. Having no part in the election of Members of Parliament, women have failed to exert their full influence upon the question. I am aware that what appears to have been an attempt to abolish the system has been made by the Government, but their Bill has in it the objectionable principle of the existing Acts. It is also full of injustice to women, and is characterized by all the harshness and cruelty of Puritan legislation, without the excuse of Puritan belief or of Puritan morals, either on the part of the Cabinet which introduced it or of the age in which we live. The legislation to which I have been referring has given an impulse to the movement in favour of women's suffrage greater than it has received from any other cause. Four years ago I attended a public meeting at Manchester, at which for the first time women advocated their claims to the Parliamentary vote, and at the present hour I could name at least 40 women, some of them ladies of rank, many of them ladies of wealth and position, and all women of character, who are engaged in the public advocacy of the suffrage question. Last year, when I brought forward this question, I had two principal opponents, the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) and the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Mr. James). One of these hon. Gentlemen possessed the largest experience in this House, and both were men of acknowledged ability. If I am to have opponents on this question, I consider it a privilege to have able opponents, because if the Bill I advocate is untenable — if it cannot pass, the more able the opponents the sooner it will be removed from the arena of the House of Commons; and if, on the other hand, the Bill is a just Bill, and the claim such as cannot be resisted, no amount of ability will long obstruct its course. These two hon. Gentlemen exercised all their ingenuity—they employed all their eloquence and powers of persuasion to induce the House to treat this Bill with disregard. They had an advantage which is never possessed by the Mover and Seconder of the Bill, because they spoke to a full House and to those who would decide the question. But the result of their opposition was, that a considerably larger number than before followed us into the Lobby, and included in that number were men of the very highest political influence. The right hon. Member for Kilmarnock took what I thought a peculiar line of argument. He seemed to treat women-voters as a revolutionary class. He gathered together from all quarters materials to support his views, and attributing fantastic notions to women, described them as dangerous to the Constitution. The hon. and learned Member for Taunton took an opposite line. His argument was founded chiefly on the incapacity of women, and he said women would be led by the clergy and others, so that they could never be trusted to act independently. These two arguments could not be both true. One was clearly destructive of the other; and if I might offer advice to my opponents, I would say that they would succeed better in opposing this Bill if they would compare notes before they came into the House, and not offer arguments which were mutually destructive. The hon. and learned Member for Taunton said that women were more impulsive and less logical than men. I have heard it said that the Scotch are less impulsive and more logical than the Irish, but surely that would not be a good reason for disfranchising the Irish people. Again, the negroes of the United States are more impulsive and less logical than the white population of America, but their enfranchisement is an absolute guarantee for justice, and secures the peace of the country. I will not enter upon a discussion of the mental differences between men and women. If their minds are alike, I suppose my hon. Friends will not object to give them votes; if there are mental differences between the sexes, I deny that this can be a fairly representative House unless it represents those differences. If, however, it be true that men have some advantage over women mentally, is there nothing to place on the other side of the account? Have not women more control over their passions? Do they not lead more regular lives? Are they not more sober? In the long catalogue of crime is there a single offence in which the male criminal does not greatly outnumber the female, notwithstanding the acknowledged fact that women have a closer acquaintance with poverty than men, and that in the struggle for bread they are more likely to be trodden down by the competitive crowd? If it be true that women want that self-guidance which it is supposed men possess, it is a profound misfortune, because, as the Prime Minister has said, there is a greater number of them every year who are obliged to seek an independent existence, and it has rarely happened that women have to obtain their bread without having to maintain others who are dependent upon them. In asking that women may be allowed to perform the humble function of giving a vote at the poll, it should not be forgotten that they are to be found at the head of important institutions; that they administer large fortunes as wisely as men; that they are every year occupying a higher place in art and literature, and that the most exalted political positions to which human beings can attain have from the earliest times being held by women with credit to themselves and advantage to the people. I have been told that women understand nothing of military matters, of law, and of diplomacy, and therefore they are not fit for the suffrage. I do not know whether this means that we have too few soldiers, lawyers, and diplomatists in this House. If all those electors who know nothing of law, of military matters, and of diplomacy were eliminated from the constituencies, the electing body would become so small that it might be abolished altogether. When you give votes to men, you do so in order that they may protect themselves against unjust laws. Now, are there no laws on the statute book, and no Bills before this House which women can understand? Half-a-score of Bills, which I could name, are at present before the House, dealing directly with women and children, and with which men have little to do. There is that Bill to which I have referred—described by the Government, I should suppose, in a spirit of irony—a Bill for the Better Protection of Women. There is a Bill also on the same subject by the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Charley)—a Bill that is believed by those out-of-doors to have a much more honest character, and a Bill by the same hon. Member for the protection of infants. The hon. Member for Coventry, as I have already stated, has a Bill before the House with regard to the property of women, and another hon. Member has a Bill with regard to the law of marriage. The hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler) has a Bill to repeal the Contagious Diseases Acts, and a Bill dealing with the custody of children. When I ask that women should have votes, I do so in order that they may give this House the capacity to legislate justly for the country upon matters in which they are peculiarly interested, because I believe no Parliament in the world has the capacity to legislate justly unless it is controlled to some extent by those for whom it legislates. Unless better reasons can be given for rejecting this Bill than have hitherto been given, I think I may express the hope that the House will read it a second time to-day. It is a rare thing for any Bill in the position of this to be rejected by the House. Let me state what I mean. In the first place, it is not a party question. It has been largely supported by both sides of this House. Last year—I do not know the exact numbers, but I believe that 100 Members on this side of the House voted for the Bill, and 50 Members on the opposite side. The measure cannot, therefore, be regarded as in any sense a party measure. We counted among our supporters influential occupants of the two front benches. There are only two Members in the House who have attained to the exalted political rank of Prime Minister. The right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) voted for the Bill last year, and has made on more than one occasion public statements upon the subject which have had more influence than he is aware of in stimulating the agitation in favour of this Bill. In one speech the right hon. Gentleman said—

“I say that in a country governed by a woman—where you allow women to form part of the estate of the Realm—Peeresses in their own right, for example; where you allow a woman not only to hold land, but to be a lady of the manor and hold legal courts; where a woman by law, may be a churchwarden and overseer of the poor—I do not see, where she has so much to do with the State and Church, on what reasons, if you come to right, she has not a right to vote.”

That is the opinion of the ex-Prime Minister. What is the opinion of the present First Lord of the Treasury? Last year he made what I thought a just and generous speech in defence of the principle of this Bill. He did not vote for the Bill, but he made a speech which if it did not compel him to vote for the Bill, at least would have enabled him to do so. And, in conclusion, he said—

“If it should hereafter be found possible to arrive at a safe and well-adjusted alteration of the law as to political power, the man who shall attain that object, and who shall see his purpose carried onward to its legitimate consequences in a more just arrangement of the provisions of other laws bearing upon the condition and welfare of women, will, in my opinion, be a real benefactor to his country.—[3 Hansard, cccv. 95.]

If anyone desired to bring about a well-adjusted alteration of the law, so as to give women some share of political power, I venture to think he would take the course which I am taking. He would find that women who are householders and heads of families possess already every local vote, and he would propose to give to this class the Parliamentary vote. They have the local votes, because they have the qualification fixed by Parliament; and having also the qualification which gives men the Parliamentary vote, it would seem as if this should decide our course in any readjustment of the law. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister has spoken of the difficulties in his path; but I think his chief, if not his only difficulty is the inconvenience women would experience by personally recording their votes at the poll. I have read the accounts of meetings that have taken place in various parts of the country, and I give the answer to that difficulty, which has come from the lips of women. They say—"We readily accept inconvenience in order to avoid injustice." When the right hon. Gentleman speaks of the inconvenience of personal attendance at the poll, I think he must have referred to the dainty and delicate ladies of the London drawing-rooms, rather than to the women of the whole country, the great majority of whom in their ordinary avocations submit to inconveniences every week in their lives far heavier than that of going once in four or five years to cast a vote at the poll. The Ballot too, I suppose, will make some difference in this. Some believe we shall have the Ballot this year; and when we have the Ballot we shall find the polling day will be one of melancholy quiet. But I think there is an argument arising from the Ballot which ought to be alluded to when dealing with this question. The hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett), a few nights ago, in an argument in favour of household suffrage in the counties, stated that nobody henceforth would hold any votes in trust, and just as no one will hold votes in trust for the unenfranchised in counties, so no one will hold votes in trust for women. You will have something like 2,000,000 of men voting in the dark and not a single woman, and there will not be a woman in the country who will know anything as to how those votes are given. I venture to say that will be found to be an intolerable state of things, and the claim of women to have votes in their own right will be greatly strengthened by this change. I must just refer to a question which has been more or less referred to on previous occasions, and which I believe will influence some votes in this House. I have been told that the Bill would give votes to married women. Well, my object was to give votes in accordance with precedent, to women who were owners and occupiers of property. I confess I did not know whether or not married women would be competent to vote if they had the qualifications, but my attention has been called to the fact that the question has been mooted in Sunderland by way of objection to the votes of some married women whose names were on the municipal register, and who voted in their maiden names. The election was a very close one, and therefore those against whom they voted, and who lost the day, were very anxious to set aside the votes. The question, as I understand it, was decided in the Court of Queen's Bench against the married women, and it was held that the circumstance of their having married disqualified them. That being so, this objection to my Bill, that it would give married women votes, will be set at rest. But then there remains the counter-charge. There are some who complain that the Bill does not enfranchise married women, but I believe only the opponents of the Bill make that complaint. The right hon. Member for Kilmarnock has been reported to have said, when addressing his constituents, that this Bill would enfranchise only "the failures" of the sex. If it be true that the Baroness Burdett Coutts, Miss Nightingale, Miss Martineau, Miss Carpenter, Miss Cobbe, and other distinguished ladies whom I could name—if it be true that widows, the mothers of families whose husbands are dead, are the failures of their sex—then I admit my Bill enfranchises failures. But if this objection be sincere, how is it none of those who advance it bring in Bills to enfranchise married women? In bringing in this Bill I am standing on the ancient lines of the Constitution; I am asking that those who have the local vote should have the Parliamentary vote also. The common law prevents married women from voting. When a woman marries she loses her name, her freedom, her individuality, her property, her vote. Surely it is not for me, in my endeavours to give votes to the owners and occupiers of property, to run my head against the common law, in regard to the changes which come about in the case of a woman who marries. It is enough for me to assert that every house shall have a vote in accordance with the principle laid down by that great Act passed in the year 1867—the Household Suffrage Act. I have referred to a striking case which was discussed at the British Association in Edinburgh, of interference with the industrial liberty of women. I am afraid that is a sample of too many of the difficulties against which women have to contend. It is impossible, however, for us to abolish local legislation such as that. We cannot put down the tyranny of ignorant and narrow-minded men; but it is our power to give a simple and complete remedy for Imperial injustice. Give women the power which has now been almost universally extended to men exercising control in the election of Members of Parliament, and every legislative injustice of which they complain will gradually but surely disappear. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. EASTWICK said, he trusted that this important question would be debated fairly and dispassionately, and that the opponents of the Bill would at once refrain from imputing to its supporters aims and intentions which they utterly disclaimed, and which, so far from having any real existence, were the mere phantoms of imagination heated by prejudice. He hoped, that the hon. Members who opposed the Bill would no longer insist upon arguing from contradictory premises, nor affect to know more of the character, duties, and the aspirations of women than women themselves, and that under pretence of befriending and protecting the sex they would not persist in denying to them the means of self-defence. He felt justified in making these remarks by the character of the debate last year, for all the faults of argument of which he complained were to be found in the speeches of the opponents of the Bill in that debate. Taking the speech which was most applauded last year—that of the hon. and learned Member for Taunton—and certainly, if violence and reckless assertion were recommended it was entitled to that distinction—he would show how his remarks applied to that speech. He had taken down seriatim, as briefly as possible, the arguments used by the hon. and learned Gentleman, and he proposed now to examine them, and in so doing to dispose of the stock arguments against the Bill. The hon. and learned Member's first point had reference to law and there, if anywhere, he might be expected to be strong. He said—

"Under the very terms of this measure every married woman who procures herself to be rated would be entitled to a vote equally with the married."—[3 Hansard, cxxi. 108.]

The process of procuring herself to be rated by a married woman was not ascribed, and for his part he must confess he was curious to hear it, and hoped

they would be enlightened on the subject. But here was the hon. and learned Gentleman's opinion on a point of law, and it turned out to be utterly valueless, for the Judges had decided in the case of the Sunderland municipal female voters, reported in The Times of the 23rd January last, that a woman who had been entitled to the municipal vote for the whole year just previous to an election lost that vote if she married before the election, and that a married woman separated from her husband, and carrying on a separate business in a separate house, who would have been entitled to the municipal vote had she been single, was not so entitled because of her marriage, the husband and wife being regarded by our law as one, and the legal existence of the wife being merged in that of her husband. All, therefore, that a married woman would get by following the hon. and learned Member's advice would be to be rated by her husband instead of being rated by the Returning Officer. But further on in his speech this very proposition was refuted by another, for the hon. and learned Gentleman said—

"If I thought the majority of English women desired this measure to become law, I should hesitate before I combated their wishes; but I say emphatically they do not. . . . A few restless, itinerant ladies—my Lady A. here, Miss B. there—pass from town to town, . . . and I never find that any woman, except these well-seasoned lecturers, rises to take a part of these political displays."—[Ibid. 112-13.]

Here was the hon. and learned Gentleman knowing more about women than women themselves. But, to let that pass, if all women, married and single, were so utterly indifferent about the franchise, was it not absurd to say that the married would volunteer to bear the expense of being rated, and would incur the risk of a quarrel with their husbands besides, in order to get the suffrage, which they did not value the least? The hon. and learned Gentleman had pitched his prelude in a high key, but he soon rose to a far higher, for he went on to say that—

"The natural consequences of this measure, to be gathered from its terms and from the clearly expressed hopes and intentions of its supporters, are that any women, either married or single, may be returned to this House; to balance the Constitution they must be allowed to sit in the House of Lords—and I presume to occupy seats on the Episcopal Bench."—[Ibid. 108.]

warm into taking any interest on the question of the franchise were to be suddenly changed into a band of frantic Mænades, to carry that House by storm, scramble over it into the House of Lords, and, not satisfied even with that, rush onward, still shouting "Excelsior!" and topple the very Bishops from their seats! That was a striking picture, very sensational indeed, and if it had been drawn by the friendly, bantering pencil of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire), he could have understood it and smiled. But when it was seriously presented there as an argument in a grave debate of that House, and was pointed and intensified by an illusion in another speech during the same debate to the Sixth Satire of Juvenal, then he indignantly repelled and denounced it as a calumny on the women of England, which ought never to have been uttered. The gist of these descriptions and allusions was to imply that women would overstep the bounds of decorum if it were not for the restraints put upon them by men, and this he flatly denied. The great body of Christian women in this country were a law to themselves, and needed no such restraint. As to this particular measure he thought he might fairly put his experience against that of the hon. and learned Member, for he was sure he had attended more meetings of its supporters and given more time and attention to it than he had, and he maintained that while its supporters had shown a fixed determination to go through with it, they had also shown the greatest moderation. There had been no indecorous excitement, no intolerance of opposite opinions, no exaggerated pretensions, nothing, in short, to deserve the sarcasms of the hon. and learned Member for Taunton, and of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie). But the next argument on which he had to comment was that—"Property is made a qualification, because it has been held to indicate capacity and fitness for the franchise in the holder—and he holds that women do not possess that fitness, because their excess of sympathy shuts out from their mind logical power and judicial impartiality." But Blackstone said, in Book I., 170,—

"The true reason of requiring any qualification with regard to property, in voters, is to exclude such persons as are in so mean a situation that they are esteemed to have no will of their own. If these persons had votes, they would be tempted to dispose of them under some undue influence or other. This would give a great, an artful, or a wealthy man, a larger share in elections than is consistent with general liberty. If it were probable that every man would give his vote freely and without influence of any kind, then, upon the true theory and genuine principles of liberty, every member of the community, however poor should have a vote in electing those delegates to whose charge is committed the disposal of his property his liberty, and his life. But since that can hardly be expected in persons of indigent fortunes, or such as are under the immediate dominion of others, all popular States have been obliged to establish certain qualifications; whereby some who are suspected to have no will of their own, are excluded from voting, in order to set other individuals whose wills may be supposed independent more thoroughly upon a level with each other."

Well, he preferred the authority of Blackstone; but was it endurable that the hon. and learned Member should talk in this stilted style about the logical power, forsooth, and judicial impartiality necessary for giving a vote at an election, knowing as he did very well how such votes were usually given? This was the very fiend's arch-mock. You might as well "lip a wanton and suppose her chaste" as go through the mud of an election and then talk of it in those high-flown terms. There was no want of the logical faculty in women, and it only wanted cultivation to be equal to that of men. The next argument was thus expressed—"In this House we discuss matters connected with the Army and Navy, with commerce, diplomacy, and law. Women can have no direct knowledge of these subjects." But were these all the matters that engaged the attention of that House? Were there no financial questions, no social questions, no religious questions discussed there? Under which of his five heads did the hon. and learned Member rank the questions of education, of the adulteration of food, of conventual institutions, of hospitals and charities? It was a farce to say that women knew nothing of these subjects, that their minds were a perfect blank, and their opinions of no value with respect to a multitude of other matters brought before that House, such as infant life protection, marriage with a deceased wife's sister, or the law of marriage generally. The hon. and learned Member asked—"How will you check the influence of the priest, the clergyman, and the well-selected canvasser upon women?" Yes, let him tell them how to check that influence upon men, and then they would tell him how to check it upon women. He would now turn for a moment to the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), and of the Premier, delivered last year. The right hon. Gentleman, who was to move the Amendment, read an extract last year from an American paper, which stated—

"I am afraid it must be confessed that the Woman Suffrage Movement in the United States is pretty well played out. It has become unmistakably evident of late that the women of the country do not want the suffrage."—[8 Hansard, cxi. 81.]

And then he went on to show how in Illinois 1,400 women petitioned not to be allowed to vote; how in Massachusetts the Constitution would have been altered to give women votes but for the women themselves; how in Minnesota the Governor had vetoed a Woman's Suffrage Bill which had passed the Legislature because he was satisfied women would be annoyed to have the vote given them; and, lastly, how in Utah the women had the franchise but refused to go to the poll. Well, could anything be more damaging to the right hon. Gentleman's argument than those quotations? It was clear from them that in the United States women might have the franchise if they wished for it. In Utah they actually had it, but it was no wonder that ladies who could content themselves with the fortieth part of a husband should not be anxious to have a whole vote to themselves. In other places they might have it if they liked, but they did not desire it, and the reasons were plain. In the first place, who would set store on a suffrage to be shared, he would not say by the heathen Chinese, for he might be an honest fellow, but with every vagabond who had reached his twenty-first year? The truth was the suffrage in the States was so common that it was not worth having, and was so corruptly dealt with that no woman would touch it. The women of the States knew very well that what was wanted under their government was a retrenchment, not an extension of the franchise. They knew, too, that in their country it could not be given in the moderate form it was asked for, and would be given here. If given at all, it must be a universal womanhood suffrage, including married and single women alike; and if voting was already a nuisance in the States, owing to the number of voters, it would become perfectly intolerable if 10,000,000 or 12,000,000 women were all at once to be added to the list. But, above all, it must be remembered that the position of women in the States was incomparably better than that of women here, and that they had really little or nothing to gain by acquiring the suffrage. Two-thirds of the whole education of the people was in their hands. He saw proof of that when he visited the Normal School at New York, where no less than 1,200 young ladies were being trained as teachers. The business of the Treasury was in great part conducted by ladies. 700 performed the work of that principal office of State at Washington, and performed it with an amount of skill, method, and regularity which entirely disproved the statements of the right hon. Gentleman's American correspondent as to the unbusiness-like habits of women. The telegraphic offices in the States were full of women, who did their work as well as, or better than, men. In short, there was no employment in the States that women desired from which they were excluded. How should they compare the social position occupied by women in the States with that held by those in this country, or their personal security there with the miserable state of things in this country? A woman might go anywhere in the United States and be sure of being treated with respect. She enjoyed absolute security from the brutal violence of husbands and others. He held in his hands half-a-dozen slips lately cut from The Times recording brutal assaults, and even murder, perpetrated on wives and mothers, which have been punished only with short terms of imprisonment, such as were inflicted for cruelty to animals. From these reports it was evident that a man might in England gouge out his wife's eye, or throw her under a waggon, and so crush the life out of her, for a short incarceration. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock referred them to the Sixth Satire of Juvenal. He would refer the right hon. Gentleman to our own inimitable satirist, in whose publication of last week he would see a just satire on the odious indifference shown to the safety of women in this country. If the assault of which he had the reports had been committed in the United States the neighbours of the ruffians who perpetrated them would have anticipated the proceedings of the judge, and would have saved him all trouble in the matter. But he would now turn for a moment to the speech of the Premier, who referred to Italy. Article 15 of the Electoral Law of that country says—

“The direct taxes paid by a widow, or a wife separated from her husband, shall be reckoned in the electoral census in favour of that son or son-in-law of the first or second degree whom she may select.”

This was repeated in Article 22 of the communal and provincial law. It was quite clear, therefore, that single women in Italy, if they had a property qualification, possessed an indirect vote. But he laid no great stress upon that. If it were right to give the suffrage to women in England let it be given, whatever might be the condition of things in other countries. Before concluding he wished to state what he conceived to be the case for woman's suffrage in England, divested of all that mountain of misrepresentation which the opponents of the Bill would heap upon it. There were 11,189,657 males in England and Wales, represented by 1,250,019 voters in boroughs and cities, and 801,109 voters in counties; in all, 2,051,128. There were 11,663,705 females represented by 108,838 municipal voters. What was asked was that these females who had the municipal vote should have the Parliamentary vote also. As far as he was concerned there was no stress laid upon the lodger franchise for women; but if it were given it would add only a thousand or two voters, for there were but 5,257 men who had the lodger franchise, and it would hardly be said that there would be anything like that number of women. He was not aware of any statistics showing the number of females who would be qualified to vote for counties; but, taking it at the proportion of females to males who had the municipal vote, there would be altogether in round numbers about 170,000 females who would obtain the franchise by this Bill. Thus, there would be 1 male in every 6 possessed of the right to vote, and 1 woman in every 60. Except in giving women a small amount of influence in questions which had a direct interest for them, this measure would invest them with no political power at all. On the other hand, it would certainly relieve them of great difficulties in renting and retaining farms and houses, and other disadvantages in business matters, and it would remove from them an intolerable stigma as if they were creatures of an inferior nature to men. Were women to be so degraded that the wife of a deaf and dumb man might interpret his vote for him, and when he was dead might not vote for herself? What was the logical power and judicial impartiality of a ruffian who maltreated his wife that he should be entitled to vote, while the most refined and intellectual lady in the land—a Mary Somerville, a Burdett Coutts, or a Florence Nightingale—was declared incompetent? These anomalies were like the lies of Falstaff—“Gross as a mountain, open, palpable,” and he therefore said remove this stigma from the women of England, and then there would be no property and no intelligence unrepresented, and this agitation, which could never otherwise be set at rest, would at once subside. In conclusion, he seconded the Motion for the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Mr. Jacob Bright.)

MR. BOUVERIE, in rising, in accordance with a Notice given some days previous, to move the rejection of the Bill, said, he hoped the House would indulge him if he stated perhaps the whole ground of his opposition to the proposal of his hon. Friend the Member for Manchester. He regretted greatly that his hon. Friend was not in his place, for he had made a moderate, earnest, and reasonable appeal to the House and country in favour of the measure he proposed; but it appeared to him that beyond his statement, as well as beyond the speech of the hon. Gentleman opposite the Member for Penrhyn (Mr. Eastwick), there was that insuperable difficulty under which they laboured—that while they were speaking in the name of the women of England, the great bulk of the cultivated intelligence of the women of England was decidedly opposed to them; and not only was it their feelings but their judgment, which led them to the conclusion that the Bill would be a misfortune to them instead of a boon. That was the feeling of the women of England, and he (Mr. Bouverie) could not help thinking that his hon. Friend the Member for Manchester spoke not for them, but only for the 40 ladies of wealth and character whom he said he represented. His hon. Friend had alluded to Petitions that were presented in favour of the Bill; well, undoubtedly, some 240,000 or 250,000 signatures had been attached to Petitions in favour of the Bill; but a large proportion of those signatures were not the signatures of women, and the Petitions themselves, instead of being the spontaneous outcome of the feelings of the signatories, were sent down to the localities ready drawn, and the people canvassed to sign them after the fashion which hon. Members so well understood. But even supposing the whole of the 250,000 signatures were those of women, they could scarcely be regarded as overwhelming evidence of the desire of the 8,000,000 adult females in these kingdoms for the success of the Bill introduced by his hon. Friend. He would dismiss at once, therefore, the suggestion of his hon. Friend that the number of signatures to these Petitions ought to weigh the House in consideration of the Bill. His hon. Friend had stated with truth that the House was never disposed to favour arguments based upon mere abstract principles, but insisted that substantial grounds should be shown for legislation. His hon. Friend then went on to state that the substantial grievances of those whom he represented were the lack of educational facilities for women, the difficulties connected with the holding of property by married women, and the question of the custody of children. With regard to the education question, he (Mr. Bouverie) admitted that in times past the female sex were placed at a disadvantage as compared with the male sex in the matter of educational advantages; but different ideas now prevailed, and it was not by any means requisite to give votes to women in order to settle the question on a satisfactory basis. He was certain that Parliament, as at present elected and constituted, would at any time be willing to pass any measure calculated to put boys and girls on an equality as far as education was concerned. Then there was the other grievance as regarded the custody of children. On that point his hon. Friend really weakened his argument, because he did not propose to give married women votes. It might, however, be presumed that it was to the children of married women he referred; so that, by way of correcting the grievances of married women, in respect of children, he proposed to give votes to a class who had nothing to do with children. [An hon. MEMBER: Widows.] He (Mr. Bouverie) would treat of widows presently. There could be no doubt, however, that his hon. Friend made out a case of occasional great hardship in married women being deprived of the custody of their children; but, speaking broadly, there must be under the marriage union, in case the parents separated, one parent only who should have the custody of the children, unless his hon. Friend proposed that there should be a judgment of Solomon, and the children should be each divided in half; and, moreover, did his hon. Friend maintain that there were no such beings as immoral and ill-conducted wives as well as husbands? Was there no such thing as a father who would be unwilling to entrust his children to a vicious and ill-conducted wife, as a wife would be to entrust her children to an ill-mannered husband? There might be a fair provision in law in these respects to decide upon the merits of each case, as to which parent should have the custody of the children, but there was really no ground on that score why women should have votes as Members of Parliament; and, in fact, his hon. Friend's arguments tended more to support a plan for remedying defects of the law. In this case, with regard to the custody of the children, it did not require to give votes to any class or number of women who desired to see justice done. All of them had sympathy enough with the distressed mother or wife unjustly deprived of the custody of her children, and were quite willing to remedy any defect in the law affecting her in this respect. Then, as regarded property, the hon. Member for Penrhyn spoke about the common law. Well, the common law was founded upon the theory—rightly or wrongly—that married persons made but one person in law, and hence had arisen these rights with regard to property. These rights, however, had within the last few years been considerably modified. They all knew that in the upper classes of life—and he might say in the middle classes of life—very rarely a marriage took place without a settlement or some provision being made with regard to the property of the woman. Something was done in that way to remedy the defects of the common law, if it were defective, which absolutely gave the whole of the personal property to the husband. But while there was some ground for feeling that this state of the law might often operate with hardship with regard to married women in the humbler classes, on the other hand, the husband, by the fact of marriage, became liable for the debts of his wife; whatever debts she might have incurred during her maidenhood, he was bound to pay; and those warehousemen to whom his hon. Friend referred, who were afraid to give "tick" to a young woman because she might get married, had only to see that if the husband was a man of industry and means they would have the advantage of double security for payment for their goods. He (Mr. Bouverie) appealed to the House to say whether the grievances he had enumerated did not form the sole basis on which his hon. Friend asked Parliament to make a change in the representative system in this country such as had never been made in any other country on the face of the globe. The House, however, ought not to be led astray by his hon. Friend a second time by listening to his earnestness and the voice of his charming, as they did when he introduced a Bill to give votes to single women in municipal elections. Now, his hon. Friend came and said he was asking for a higher thing. He was asking the House to give votes to single women for Members of Parliament; but there should be some place where they ought to stop, and if they did not stop now, he (Mr. Bouverie) could not see where, in future, they were to have stopping ground on that question. Moreover, the addition to the number of the voters in constituencies which would be involved by passing the Bill before the House would be by no means the trumpery affair that his hon. Friend seemed to think, for the addition would not be less than from 320,000 to 330,000, or between 12½ and 13 per cent, according to a careful calculation which he had made on the basis of Returns presented to Parliament. He would remind the House, further, that to make an addition of that character would involve an immediate dissolution of Parliament. ["No, no!"] Hon. Members might express dissent from that statement; but he maintained that if so great an addition was made to the constituencies, it would be absolutely necessary to take their opinion as to the mode in which the country was to be governed. His main objection, however, to the proposal of his hon. Friend was that it merely touched the hem of a great question. It was not merely whether some 200,000 or 300,000 people should be added to the number of the constituencies, but whether the whole system upon which this country had been governed hitherto should be altered. And here arose another great difficulty in his view. His hon. Friend said that women were equally entitled as men to political power, and he thought his hon. Friend was also an advocate for universal manhood suffrage. [Mr. JACOB BRIGHT: No, no!] Well, there were many who were, and who were in favour of this Bill, and he believed the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government two years ago had indicated his feeling in that direction. It existed in America; and however much it might be open to objection, it was not therefore an impracticable system of government. Well, if manhood suffrage were given, they could not do without women suffrage. They must give votes to women all round, as well as to men. Then what was the consequence? Was the House aware that the women exceeded the men by something like 350,000 in this country? The males in the United Kingdom, of all ages, by the last Census, were 15,500,000, the females 16,218,000, leaving a difference in favour of females of 718,000. The adults were about 50 per cent of the whole number; so that about 50 per cent of women, under woman suffrage, would be entitled to have votes. That would amount to a majority of women with voting power in the country against men, who were supposed to be cruel tyrants, and to overbear and misuse the women; and, practically, it would come to this, that the women would out-vote the men, and then the country would be governed by women. It was assumed that the women were in chronic opposition to the men, and, if in a majority, they would necessarily sway the councils of the country at home and abroad. Was that a conclusion to which they would like to come? Its absurdity, on the face of it, showed the fallacy of the views of his hon. Friend. But it was not necessary to have this universal woman suffrage to give women a preponderance at elections. The House was now aware that in nicely-balanced constituencies a comparatively small body of voters would turn their choice of a Member one way or the other. In the present constituencies they knew that a small number who held extreme views on the temperance question were able to turn the scale in many elections, and thus secure support by members to their opinions. If once the votes of women were admitted, as now proposed, there would be many instances where they would be able to turn the balance, and give a feminine character to the policy of the country. He respected the opinions of many women, but he was not prepared to say that the policy of this country was to be influenced by women rather than by men. There was a line from Shakspeare, where one of the old Romans said—"Our father's souls are dead, and we are governed by the spirits of our mothers;" but that was a state of things the old Roman did not like, and we should not like it either, that upon questions of peace or war, perhaps affecting the policy of this nation now and for times far distant, the feelings, sympathies, and peculiar character of women should guide the policy of the country. In the judgment of men, who had the harder work of life to undertake, leaving the gentler and milder duties to the women, this could not be desirable. He would remind the House, too, that it was not with the mere giving of votes that this matter could end. In this country political rights were not and could not be severed from political duties, and if the right to vote now claimed for them were to be conferred upon the women of the country, they ought to undertake the correlative duties which attached to the position of an elector in this country. Who could make a just distinction between women voting for Members of Parliament, and women sitting on the Bench as Judges—sitting as magistrates, or on juries on the trial of cases, and fulfilling all the judicial functions men now discharged? Take the cases where brutal men in the lower classes of life ill-treated their wives, and who received mild sentences from the magistrates. The remedy for that was not a change of the law. The law was just enough. The law imposed a severe penalty for offences of that sort, but it was the fault, if fault at all, of the tribunal. How would it be if women sat as a tribunal, and passed sentences on men who ill-treated their wives? Was the House prepared to see that change? He further understood that it was actually contemplated that women should have seats in this House, for he could not see, how, if they gave women votes, they could refuse to them the right of electing whom they liked to seats in this House; so that they must alter the whole mode in which the Government was carried on. Moreover, would the ambition of the ladies be limited to seats in this House? Would they not aspire to sit on the Ministerial bench or even in the Speaker's Chair? When they once departed from the existing practice in those respects, and gave political rights, his impression was that there was nowhere where standing-ground could be found to resist their claims. Take the case of the defence of the realms. Were women to be balloted for the Militia? Were they to serve as constables, or soldiers in the Army? That seemed ridiculous, but those views were actually advocated by writers of intelligence and ability in largely-circulated publications. A writer in a recent number of The Fortnightly Review—a publication which, by-the-by, came out once a-month—advocated women's rights with great intelligence and ability, and wrote strongly in favour of breaking down all existing distinctions, as far as business occupations were concerned, between men and women. He said—

"Some women are allowed, under the pressure of necessity, to teach, or to write for the Press, or, if they have very great energy, to profess medicine; it only remains to allow all who have the necessary material inducement to enter the Civil Service (where Mr. Gladstone is evidently prepared to let them have clerkships cheap), the Army, the Navy, the Universities, and any other learned or lucrative profession they may fancy."

The writer also referred to the moral and physical forces of the State, and went on to say—

"Undoubtedly, when women have seats in Parliament and on the Bench, they will also hold commissions in the Army; and it may even be surmised that the profession of arms will be rather a favourite with them than otherwise; for military glory has more in common with the aims which they have hitherto been encouraged to pursue than any inducements held out by learned or commercial careers. The few cases on record of women who have disguised their sex in order to enter the Army offer no criterion as to the number who would do so when the necessity for secrecy was removed. The contrary assumption is so much the creation of habit, that it is scarcely possible to argue either for or against it. The physical strength of women is the principal difficulty contemplated; but it is obvious, quite apart from the effect of education or training, that the women of some races are taller and stronger than the men of others; and if that consideration appears too remote, it could be easily ascertained how many maids-of-all-work in London work harder than a dragoon. But it is supposed that women will be particularly influenced by the reluctance which we all feel at the prospect of slaughtering our fellow-creatures. Similarly it was held quite recently that they could not—it is still thought in some circles that they should not—cut off babies' legs. Now, to shoot an invader, who may be out of sight, and to cut off a baby's leg, are both painful surgical operations, which no right minded person would perform, except for the benefit of the infant or the fatherland; but there can be no question as to which of the two is most trying to the nerves and harrowing to the sentiments. Unless antiquity—as is possible—was quite mistaken as to the natural instincts of the female sex, it will prefer the science of destruction to the art of healing."

[Laughter.] The proposal of his hon. Friend related simply to unmarried women, but he, for one, did not see how they could stop there. They all knew that, practically, the great object and the great happiness of single women was to have a happy married home, and that those who failed to get it had more or less to maintain themselves. In our artificial state of society, a great many women failed, especially in the higher classes, to obtain this object. That, he thought, was the great cause of the discomfort which prevailed, and the agitation which had sprung up. His hon. Friend, however, was very strong upon the point that he confined his proposal to single women; but he (Mr. Bouverie) confessed his inability to see how that could be done. The greater part of the grievances sought to be remedied by his hon. Friend were the grievances of married women, and it was by no means clear, from his hon. Friend's point of view, that the best way to remedy them was by conferring the franchise upon women who were not married. That appeared to him to be a very roundabout way of doing what was desired, because if it were necessary that political rights should be extended in order that the grievances of any class should be redressed, those rights should be extended not to those who did not suffer, but to the class aggrieved. The arguments of his hon. Friend, therefore, seemed to point in the direction of giving married women votes; but the giving the right of voting to married women was repugnant to all their ideas of married life. The theory of the married life was, that the husband and his wife were one. That was the old law, and it was none the less good because it was old. A learned author (Littleton), the subject of Lord Coke's Commentaries, writing in the time of Henry VI., said—

"Although a man may not grant or give his tenements to his wife during the coverture, they are hers, for that his wife and he be but one person in the law."

And it was not only the theory of their law—the law as laid down by Littleton—but it was the law of the Church and of religion. It was laid down in that Book which they were accustomed to regard as a sacred code, and which dictated to them their duties, telling them that the husband should rule over the wife. In looking over the literature of the question, he could not help noticing that one of these ladies, who had written on the subject with singular literary ability and force, showed a very great antipathy to St. Paul. She professed a great, and, no doubt, honest respect for religion, but appeared to entertain a particular spite against St. Paul. He seemed to be picked out from everybody else, and spoken of as if he had no authority on the subject. But, perhaps, that might be accounted for when they recollected what St. Paul wrote—

"Let the woman learn in silence with all subjection. But I suffer not a woman to teach nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence."

What he would wish the House to observe was, that the theory not only of their law and of their religion, but of all their social customs, lay in the fact that the husband should rule over the wife; and that condition of things he believed afforded perfect security in the vast majority of cases for the comfort and happiness of the woman. He could not help thinking that his hon. Friend, and those who supported him, had in that matter fallen into a not uncommon error—that of mistaking exceptions for the rule, and that there were myriads of homes in this country, of all classes, where man and wife go on happily from year to year, during their lives; it being the business of the man to do the hard work, and of the woman to make home bright and cheerful for him. The theory, however, of his hon. Friend was, that there was a kind of constant opposition of interest on the part of husband and wife. With reference to the argument based on considerations affecting property, he might mention to the House his own personal experiences. When he married—a great many years ago—he went to consult a very able conveyancer, a personal friend of his, and of the same religious persuasion to which his hon. Friend belonged, about the character of the settlements. His friend said—and he was so impressed with it that he recollected it as well as if it had only happened yesterday—“I advise you strongly for the interest and happiness of your home not to have a separate settlement on your wife.” His friend, then, with a view to enforce his advice, took down a volume of Chancery Reports, and read a passage, in which Lord Eldon, late in his official career, said he had seen a vast amount of litigation with regard to settlements; and the result of his great experience was that a separate and independent maintenance for the wife by settlement, as was commonly made in the upper classes, did not conduce to the happiness and welfare of families. That judgment and opinion he would set against the Motion of his hon. Friend. But the contention of his hon. Friend was, that all that was now to be changed. They were now to have a new kind of “compound householder.” It was impossible to draw a distinction in this matter between married and single women. Indeed, his hon. Friend had had the candour to admit that that was so.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT said, he wished to explain. If he had made such an admission it was a mistake, for he had never intended to convey any such impression.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he had certainly so interpreted his hon. Friend's arguments; but as his hon. Friend had disclaimed any intention of meaning any such thing, he had great pleasure in accepting his disavowal. The whole effect of his hon. Friend's argument, however, went to show that women, to be fully protected, must have votes in that House. The agitation, as he (Mr Bouverie) had already said, had in his opinion arisen from the fact of there being vast numbers of unmarried women, who must and would continue to have to maintain themselves by their own exertions under great difficulties, and some of whom he perhaps might be pardoned for having termed “failures” in life. Their industry was hardly sufficient to do so. That was partly due to the artificial life of women, partly to the unavoidable competition of men with women. They could not compete on equal terms. Their physical strength was not more than two-thirds of that of men, and they could not do more than two-thirds of the work; while they all knew that from physiological reasons, they could not from time to time during a large proportion of their adult life do so much. The labour, therefore, of a woman, was scarcely able to maintain her; and it should be remembered that many of them had to compete with married women, or with unmarried women supported by their father or brothers, who had homes, who eked out their maintenance from other sources by their labour, and who could compete with advantage over those who had wholly to maintain themselves. He admitted fully that they ought to do everything in their power to remedy that state of things by promoting the education of women and girls in all grades of life, and particularly in the higher kinds of education; and let him say that much had been done within the last few years in that respect. Women, too, were showing that they were taking advantage of the additional facilities given to them for education, and for learning various profitable modes of occupying themselves. In many of the artistic walks of life—in drawing, engraving, and designing, and those classes of pursuits for which women were eminently qualified—there had been a large advance made in the way of enabling them to earn a good maintenance; but these were all economical evils to which political remedies could not be applied. They were too apt to take up the theory of the school of politicians to which his hon. Friend belonged—that political rights would alter the economical condition of the class on whom those rights were conferred. That was a mistake. Economical conditions depended upon natural laws and legislation, and political rights could not directly affect them. Men must engage in works of toil—mining, ploughing, navigating, fighting—in short, all the employments which required physical power and endurance. Moreover, part of the hard work of life consisted in governing, and it was not woman's work to govern. The government of the household was one thing; but to mix oneself up with the turmoil of the polling-booth was quite another. They all knew, practically, that a person endowed with a vote was assailed in every possible way to give that vote one way or another. Temptation of every kind was held out—allurement and menace, and where refusal was given, the screw was put on. Why should womankind, and particularly gentlewomen, be subjected to the screw? They knew that it would subject them to all sorts of annoyances and persecution, and therefore it was that the women of the country could not be stirred up to join in that agitation. They were content to leave the governing part of the business of life to men, and they might rest assured that men were fairly disposed to do justice to women as well as to men in their legislation; and he denied that there was any indisposition to do that which was right and fair by the other sex. The time had, however, he thought come when the House must decide which system they preferred, for they were at the turning-point. If they gave a vote to women, he thought he had shown that they must go further, and give them everything else in the shape of political power. It might be prejudice on his part; perhaps it was, but he preferred the old system. That system he should believe to be right until his hon. Friend had proved it to be wrong, and his hon. Friend, he was inclined to think, had lost sight of the fact that the burden of proof lay upon him to show that the existing system was wrong. He did not think he could do better than, in conclusion, to quote the words of one of those 40 ladies of "wealth, worth, and position," who were his hon. Friend's clients. That lady, in one of an exceedingly well-written series of essays, said—

"The majority of Englishwomen have, I believe, at this day, a secret dread lest the granting of the claims which are just now favoured by women should revolutionize society. I wish particularly to notice the fear or presentiment which seems to me most worthy of our serious consideration—namely, the fear that to grant what they are asking would revolutionize our homes. This is, indeed, a serious question, for I believe that home is the nursery of all virtue, the fountain-head of all true affection, and the main source of the strength of our nation."

Those words of Mrs. Butler were wisely

VOL. CCXI. [THIRD SERIES.]

thought and eloquently expressed, and, fully believing, as he did, in the concluding portion of them, he hoped the result would be to show that the majority of the House were of the same opinion.

MR. SCOURFIELD, in rising to second the Amendment, said, he felt he owed an apology to the House for speaking three times on this subject during the present Parliament; but he was desirous of saying, notwithstanding all the arguments that had been adduced in favour of this measure, that his opinions and feelings on the question remained unchanged. He, moreover, was compelled to say something additional, from feelings of gratitude and gallantry, for he found by the public newspapers that, in conjunction with his right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) and his hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope), he had had the honour of being made the subject of a vote of thanks by some energetic ladies at a public meeting convened for the promotion of this movement, on the ground, as they asserted, that they had rendered them good service by exhibiting the utter weakness of the arguments of their opponents. Now, he viewed it as an inestimable advantage to be noticed by the ladies at all, and almost preferred to be thus attacked than to be consigned by them to utter oblivion. Few like "to lie in cold obstruction and to rot." It reminded him of an anecdote related of Dr. Johnson, about a certain individual who complained to him that on visiting Ireland he was kicked by an Irishman; whereupon the Doctor observed that he was glad to find that his friend had risen in the world—that nobody in England had ever thought him worth kicking. If, then, a lady should drink his (Mr. Scourfield's) very bad health, he should certainly feel disposed to return her thanks, and to drink to her good health. But to come to the question immediately before them, he denied that there was any evidence to prove that the mass of the women of England were in favour of the proposal. On the contrary, he was persuaded that the vast majority of the ladies of England and the general feeling of the people at large were utterly opposed to the movement. It had been once remarked by the Chief Baron Alexander that it required an immense amount of mental energy to hold one's tongue at certain times. Now, he (Mr. Scourfield) believed that the ladies of England generally had shown themselves possessed of that faculty in respect to this question; and he did not see any reason why their feelings upon it should be ignored, because they did not express them in so demonstrative a manner as certain lady politicians who were favourable to the measure. If they looked to the Petitions presented on the matter to that House, they would find them representing but a very small fraction of the people, whilst, he believed, there were millions against the Bill. Moreover, they all had a great respect for Petitions sent from the people; but they were different things from Petitions sent to the people. They had had much discussion in that House lately respecting the best mode of maintaining secrecy in the vote at Parliamentary Elections. He thought that the admission of women to the franchise would go far to render it impossible by any machinery to effect that object, and that they themselves would be the first to suffer from a breach of the law in that respect. If the question of voting, however, had been based exclusively on property, he was not sure that he should have any strong objections, provided the necessity of personal attendance were dispensed with; but with regard to that, he would remind the House of what the Prime Minister said last year upon that point. The right hon. Gentleman, speaking generally, said that the personal attendance of women at the poll would be a practical evil not only of the gravest, but of the most intolerable character. Moreover, when the proposal to substitute voting papers for personal attendance was brought before the House it found no more strenuous opponents than the hon. Gentleman and his Friends who promoted the Bill. Indeed, the proposal to render any voter who disclosed his vote liable to a period of imprisonment emanated from an hon. Gentleman who, if he had had his way, would now by his advocacy of this question, extend that privilege to women. The promoters of the Bill did not propose to extend the franchise to married women on the ground that they were under the influence of their husbands; but, as an hon. Friend of his suggested, if the Ballot Bill were carried, they would no longer be under the influence of their husbands, because, although they might tell their husbands they had voted one way, they might in reality have voted differently. It was further said that he and those who agreed with him were fighting shadowy and imaginary evils; but one of the ladies who had taken part in the proceedings at the public meeting recently held to promote this Bill, said that under the present system women suffered a loss of dignity and were inclined to take a childish view of life and its duties, to attempt to rival each other in "dress, domestic economy, the conventionalities of society, and infinitely small things of that kind." And another lady said they would not press for revolution, unless they saw that their demands had been hopelessly rejected. Well, that, at all events, was somewhat consolatory, for it was well to keep off the evil day as far as possible. Revolution at all times was a terrible affair, but when effected by ladies it would be horrible in the extreme. It was only last evening that the hon. Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) took the lead in a cry raised by all the Irish Members—and the Scotch Members "caught faintly the sound as it fell"—that the Civil servants in Ireland were entitled to an increase of salary. But what good, he (Mr. Scourfield) asked, would be a small increase of salary to the Civil servants, if those with whom they were intimately connected were to disregard all considerations of domestic economy? How would their comforts be promoted when on returning from their offices to their homes, they found their wives "quenching their familiar smiles with an austere regard of control," and giving them, instead of a mutton chop, a lecture on metaphysics. As to the value of the "conventionalities of society," he might invoke the personal testimony of the present Speaker, whom he now addressed not only with that respect and regard which his high official position exacted, and which his uniform kindness of manner had inspired, but with sentiments of sadness arising from the reflection that he was now probably addressing the last male occupant of the Chair. Lord Bacon had said that truth emerged more quickly from error than from confusion, and one of the most important means of saving society from utter confusion was the observance of those conventionalities which had been spoken of with such contempt. He (Mr. Scourfield) was afraid that if the lady who might possibly succeed Mr. Speaker in that Chair, refused to recognize the conventional Rules which governed the proceedings and Business of the House, she would, in a very short time, find the House involved in such a state of chaos and confusion that she herself would be obliged to swear in a large body of able-bodied women as special constables to preserve something like order in the Assembly. Now, if he might venture to give advice to the ladies, he should recommend them to rely upon the natural attractions of their social position in society rather than upon the dreamy illusions of political power—on the proud positions which they were capable of attaining in English literature, as instanced by such names as Edgeworth, Austin, Martineau, and Mrs. Archer Eliot, rather than on the fickle and ephemeral notoriety of the public platform of politics and unwomanly declamation. If he ventured on any warning, he would use words not his own, but those of one of the most distinguished ladies that had ever adorned literature—namely, the incomparable Jane Austen, who, in one of her novels, said—

“Goldsmith tells us when lovely woman stoops to folly, she has nothing to do but to die; and when she stoops to be disagreeable, death is equally to be recommended as a clearer of ill-fame.”

Woman had now her home in the hearts and affections of all mankind. In her natural position, as the helpmate and comforter of man, she would ever find herself respected by all persons of refined taste and generous appreciations. He would conclude by quoting and applying the words of Burns—

“For a’ that, and a’ that,
A man’s a man for a’ that.”

Now, notwithstanding the Darwinian theory as to the transmutation of species, and all the speeches made and resolutions passed at public meetings—and he trusted that she would remain so to the end of time.

“For a’ that, and a’ that,
A woman’s a woman, for a’ that;”

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day six months,”—(Mr. Bouverie.)

MR. MAGUIRE*: Sir, from the speech of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Scourfield) who has just spoken, it might be supposed that this was a Bill for the abolition of wives and mothers, instead of being what it really is, a Bill to confer on single women a voice in the selection of those who make our laws—laws by which women are equally affected as men. Before dealing with the main question raised by my hon. Friend’s (Mr. Jacob Bright’s) Bill, I would say something as to the assertion of my right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie)—who is always daring in assertion—that the vast majority of women are opposed to it. Well, how is that shown? What evidence has he given in support of his sweeping assertion? We, in this House, decide just as Judges and juries do in Courts of Law, upon evidence; and the evidence in the present instance is this—that while Petitions in favour of the Bill have been received from all parts of the country, not one Petition has been presented against it. My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester has pointed to the 250,000 signatures in favour of his Bill, and referred to the total absence of signatures against it. Now, Sir, on which side does the balance of evidence incline? Surely not on the side of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock. Can the right hon. Gentleman say that his own constituency are opposed to the principle involved in this proposal? As he seems not thoroughly acquainted with the sentiments of his own constituents upon this question, I will take the liberty of enlightening him thereon. Petitions were presented from Dumbarton, Rutherglen, Port Glasgow, and Kilmarnock in favour of the Bill, and the Town Council of Dumbarton adopted an unanimous Petition in the same spirit; and I may add that committees have been organized in Dumbarton and Rutherglen, of which the respective Provosts are secretaries. But the right hon. Gentleman objects to the Petitions with their 250,000 signatures, because they all seem to be framed in the same model. What he would desire to see would be an uncontrollable and spontaneous outcome of public feeling, expressed in bad English, as a proof of its genuineness. Why, Sir, we all know that in this, as in other organizations, there is a certain form of Petition adopted, as a means of precaution and of safety, by the promoters or supporters of the particular question at issue. In fact, that is a matter of course in the case of every systematized agitation. Now, against this mass of signatures, what have we?—the assertion of right hon. and hon. Gentlemen, that women are all opposed to the giving of the franchise to the woman who pays taxes, and fulfils various other duties of citizenship. Of course, no right hon. or hon. Gentleman would assert what they do not believe to be true; but their means of forming an accurate judgment may be limited, and therefore their individual assertions cannot outweigh the evidence on which we are able to rely. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock has sought to alarm the House by describing the danger of allowing women to have a voice in public affairs, especially in such questions as those of peace and war—that were their influence felt in such grave questions, a feminine tone might be given to the policy of this country, which feminine tone would be perilous to its honour and independence—in fact, that women from their very nature would lean to a policy of cowardice at a time when the honour of the country most needed a bold and manly vindication. This is his assertion on the one hand; but he himself answers himself in a moment after by his quotation from The Fortnightly Review, in which women are represented as being led away by a passion for military glory, and that what really was to be apprehended was their military and combative spirit—at least, that was the impression the right hon. Gentleman sought to convey by his quotation, with which he utterly demolished his original proposition. One thing is clear—that his arguments were utterly inconsistent with, and therefore answered each other. But, Sir, what is the state of things at present? Are those who manage our affairs perfect? Are the affairs of this country never conducted in such a manner as to bring discredit upon its character for dignity and wisdom? Has there been, for instance, no blundering by “the lords of creation” in our foreign policy? Have we never seen our Ministers display at one time a senseless panic, and at another, a stupid bravado? Perhaps it would be well if the influence of women—even the dreaded feminine tone—could be made felt in the government of the country. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock was not only illogical and inconsistent, but it was most unfair to the hon. Member for Manchester, inasmuch as he attributed to my hon. Friend the making of demands which are not contained in his Bill, and he then argues on an entirely false assumption of his own creation. All the Bill asks for is that the same franchise which widows and unmarried women now enjoy for other purposes—Poor Law, municipal, and educational—should be extended to them with reference to the return of Members to this House. No such demand as this has been made on the part of married women; and I have no hesitation in saying that if it had been made I should have voted against it, because it would not be right or prudent that political contention, or its possible cause, should be brought to the domestic hearth. There is then no question of the franchise for married women; and no just reason has been given why widows and spinsters who possess property and pay taxes should not enjoy and exercise it. The objection to this most moderate demand, which I regard as founded on reason, justice, and the strict principles of the Constitution, may be divided into two classes—those who speak in the spirit of the Troubadour of the 13th century, and those who speak in the spirit of the Grand Turk. The one would compliment woman out of her rights; the other would deny her those rights, on the most insulting pleas. The one would place woman on an imaginary pedestal, and there retain her for the worship of the male portion of the human race. According to them, she is a thing too delicate, too pure, too ethereal, to taint or tarnish by contact with the rude world—above all, by mixing in the riot and turmoil of a political contest; and therefore this dangerous gift of the franchise should be denied to her. Now let us deal with this matter in a rational manner, and not be carried away by high-sounding phrases, or by the descriptions of things which do not exist, or will not exist in this country. This objection to the polling-booth is the more important, as it was that most dwelt upon last year by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, who, I may remark, has since the year before last advanced in opinion on this question. On the former occasion, as I understood the right hon. Gentleman, he regarded the proposal to give woman the franchise as something which, if granted, would imperil the foundations of society, whereas last year his objection was limited to allowing women to go themselves to the polling-place; and that if any mode could be devised by which their vote could be taken without submitting them to the danger or inconvenience of personal attendance, he would consent to their obtaining and exercising the franchise. But, Sir, what measure is now passing through this House? The Ballot Bill, which will become law at the end of the present Session. ["No, no!"] Well, certainly the Session after, and which will get rid of all legitimate objection as to the polling-booth. You talk of riot and tumult at elections. What is the first thing which your Ballot Bill does? It puts an end to nomination days; and thus, at one blow, you strike away the main source of riot and tumult, and with it one stock argument against the enfranchisement of women. Now, as to the polling under the system of the Ballot. It was my good fortune to witness the operation of the Ballot in Paris in the November of 1869, when, amongst the candidates of the extreme party, Monsieur Rochefort was elected. The balloting took place on Sunday and on Monday. On Sunday the voting was by no means so active as on Monday. On the Sunday comparatively few persons voted, because, as I was informed, the working classes were afraid of the ballot box being tampered with by the authorities. Can it possibly be imagined that anything of that kind would be done in this model country? Surely, such conduct must be altogether confined to the Celtic race, as the Anglo-Saxon would never dream of doing anything so unmanly. On the Monday, however, I went to five or six polling-places, some of them in the most democratic quarters. In one of these I remained more than half-an-hour, and during that time many persons, including several men en blouse, voted, and the whole proceeding was conducted with such order and regularity, such quiet and decorum, that if I were asked to say, on my honour as a gentleman—one having as true and exalted a respect for the delicacy and dignity of woman as any of those who oppose their just claims—would I consent that female members of my own family should take part in a similar proceeding, I should answer—"Certainly, I would," because there was nothing in what I saw that could in the slightest degree taint or tarnish the most delicate, the most sensitive, or the most ethereal of the sex. Then, we have the considerate objector, who says—"Oh, why take women from their domestic duties; why ask them to sacrifice their time for the public interest?" The obvious answer is—men do not sacrifice their interests, their duties, or their amusements to public affairs, and there is no necessity why they should do so; for even the most active politician can discharge his public duty thoroughly with a very small expenditure of time. One would suppose, from the manner in which this objection is urged, that my hon. Friend was by his Bill proposing to produce a constant crop of elections, to bloom like monthly roses. Elections are things of rare occurrence, which generally happen every three years; and the most conscientious and devoted of enfranchised women could easily discharge all her public obligations by the sacrifice of a few hours in the 12 months. But another and grave objection has been raised to-day by my hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Scourfield) in the interest of the over-worked Civil servant. He has drawn a dismal picture of the Civil servant returning to his home, wearied and jaded after his day's work, and instead of hearing the kettle singing joyfully on the hob, and his chop being nicely done, is treated by his wife to a lecture on metaphysics—or, instead of chops and tomato sauce, is regaled with chops and metaphysics. Such an argument as this, which would find its legitimate place in the pages of a comic album, or in a convivial speech, shows how desperately hard driven are hon. Gentlemen for anything like a reasonable ground of opposition to a plain and simple demand. Then you have objections based on the alleged inferiority of women. It is asserted that women—widows and spinsters—ought not to have the right of voting for Members of Parliament because of their being incapable of appreciating public questions and judging of public affairs. But, Sir, I venture to say there are not 10 Members of this House who have not, at one time or another, sought the influence of women to assist them in their election—aye, and who did not attribute to women a thorough knowledge of the questions then before the country. I can imagine the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock, upon finding the men coy, going to the women and asking them to induce their husbands to vote. I can imagine a case where the elector is thinking more of beer than of politics, or is perhaps calculating how he can sell his vote to the best advantage, and the wife says to the candidate—"John knows all about such matters, but we women know nothing of them;" and the candidate—possibly one who votes against giving women the franchise—saying—"You do know all about them, quite as well as any men; and don't mind what they say to the contrary;" and the wife replying—"Ah, Sir, but you Parliamentary gentlemen say we women are not fit to study political questions, or to mix in political matters. John, who is down in the public, knows all about them; we women do not—" [Mr. JAMES: What nonsense!] My hon. Friend below me has the courtesy to say—"What nonsense!" [Mr. JAMES: I did not.] I heard you. The hon. and learned Gentleman enjoys a monopoly of wisdom in this House. But, Sir, what is the abstruse or recondite question which a woman, as an elector, would be called on to decide?—what is this tremendously difficult question which a woman of ordinary intelligence would find it impossible to answer, but which men, even the stupidest of them, are capable of deciding off-hand? It is simply this—whether A. B. or C. D. is the more suitable candidate—whether this ambitious lawyer, or that great merchant, or that extensive landed proprietor, would be the most faithful and consistent and independent Member of Parliament? Surely, any woman of ordinary capacity, or ordinary quickness and penetration, is as capable of understanding that question fully as any ordinary man? But assume for a moment that women are not as competent to understand questions of public interest, whose fault is that? Is it the fault of nature, or of our existing system? We, in our self-complacency, attribute to an original defect in the constitution of woman, what is solely the result of a deficiency of education and training; but give women the same teaching as you secure to men, submit their minds to the same training, and in a short time you will find that the natural inferiority of woman is purely imaginary, and that they are as well fitted for political rights and privileges as men. What, Sir, is the qualification for the franchise—that great boon which you cannot venture to entrust to women? Is it virtue; is it intelligence; is it knowledge; is it sobriety; is it common decency; is it character; is it the possession of any single moral quality? No, the possession of the franchise does not depend upon any of these; for the rudest, and most brutal, and most profligate, and most drunken possess the franchise. Nay, the criminal who has perpetrated some atrocious offence, and has expiated his guilt by punishment—he may exercise the franchise; but the wise, gifted, good, moral woman is branded with political incapacity. What, then, is the qualification which opens the doors of the Constitution to the man, and shuts them in the face of the woman? The mere occupation of a house, or the possession of a certain amount of property. It has been argued that it is the house which has the franchise—that the franchise is given to the house. If so, why make a distinction between the house occupied by a woman and that occupied by a man? Why refuse the vote to the one, while you give it to the other? Where is the reason in that? But, says the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock, if we give the franchise to women they will out-vote and swamp the men. Let us see if there be the very faintest approach to probability in this apprehension. My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester does not propose that all women, nor anything like all women, shall have a vote; he only asks that the minority shall be enfranchised, and those the occupiers of houses. That enfranchisement will not in any way interfere with the ordinary operations of nature; it will not destroy those mystic influences which attract the sexes towards each other; it will not prevent marriage and giving in marriage; all that will go on as well after the passing of the Bill as it does now; and thus the vast majority of women will not be entitled to vote, simply because they are married, and not single. Therefore, my right hon. Friend will see that the votes of the women cannot by any possibility swamp those of the men. We are told by the same authority that only the "failures in life" demand the franchise; that all the intellectual and highly cultivated women object to it; and that Miss Austen was opposed to the idea of such a concession. If it be true that the failures alone demand the franchise, then all I can say is this—the failures have awfully increased of late, for they may now be reckoned by tens of thousands. As to Miss Austen, she wrote good works some half-century since; but if that lady were now alive, would she not be found with the women of this day who are her equals, if not her superiors, in intellect and in cultivation? Among those failures who are bent on obtaining this right for their sex, are many of our deepest thinkers and our most brilliant writers; are women who, as mothers and heads of families, are models of domestic excellence—are women whom this pursuit does not divest of the delicacy and sensitiveness which are quite compatible with vigour of mind and energy of purpose. Ah, but women are too emotional—too much women, and too little men—they have the fatal defect of being illogical! Now, Sir, there is in this world—I shall not say in this House—a tendency to exalt logic at the expense of every other quality. I, for one, am no believer in the omnipotence of logic. A man may chop logic, and dexterously double up his opponent in argument; but if he be wanting in higher and better gifts, he indeed is a failure—at least a man of this kind makes no great mark on the age in which he lives—none whatever on posterity. Men of this kind fail—fail to lead and influence men, because they cannot understand man; they cannot sympathize with humanity, because they are ignorant of the springs and sympathies by which men are moved and men are governed. I am not afraid of seeing woman's influence more directly felt in this Assembly, and reflected in its Legislature. A great statesman is really great, because he combines in his nature something of the essential characteristic of woman—her generosity, her enthusiasm, her unselfishness, and her large sympathies. When a statesman of this stamp undertakes to redress a great wrong, or grant a great and lasting boon, he does so from strong conviction and with all his heart; and the service and the gift are done and given with such manifest sincerity and earnestness of intention, that they are acknowledged and received with a nation's gratitude; and that statesman, though at times he may fail or blunder, is sure to leave behind him a name of honour and a memory of affection. There are other men with nothing of the true woman in their nature, cold of heart and hard of head, who, if they redress a wrong or grant a boon, are impelled thereto by no generous impulse, by no large sympathy either for a class or for mankind, but whose chief motive is to retain or resume the possession of place and power. There is little gratitude for what they may do or give, and they leave no enduring memory behind them. Sir, if we had more of the influence of women in this House, it would be felt in our laws, which would be more tender to infirmity, more compassionate to suffering, more considerate to poverty, more replete with the spirit of a large and generous humanity. Sir, I support the Bill with all my heart, because I believe its passing would infuse into politics a higher tone and feeling than that which at present exists, and because I regard the demand which it makes as alike logical and constitutional.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN: Sir, a demand for enfranchisement, advanced by any body of our fellow-subjects, deserves—I should rather say, requires—the attention of this House. And when such a demand has attained the proportions of the present; when it is supported by an influential organization, and has been made the subject of a systematic agitation from one end of the country to the other, it is more than ever necessary that the grounds upon which it rests should be fairly examined and fully understood, and that its supporters should be treated with that consideration which is due to their perseverance, as well as to their evident earnestness and honesty of purpose. Therefore, Sir, in the few remarks which I wish to address to the House, I shall endeavour to avoid everything except that serious argument which the advocates of this Bill have a right to expect. They have, however, a right to expect something more. This is not a question upon which our words ought to be enigmatical or of doubtful import. If we entertain vital and fundamental objections to this proposal, it is due to its promoters—it is due to ourselves—it is due to the House —that we should state those objections clearly, fairly, and boldly, and not by complimentary phrases or equivocal utterances give encouragement to hopes, the realization of which we intend, if possible, to prevent by our votes. And now, Sir, taking this Bill in my hand, I find its title to be that of “A Bill to remove the Electoral Disabilities of Women.” I should rather describe it as “A Bill to add to the Duties, the Burdens, the Responsibilities of Women;” or, if I looked at it from another point of view, I should be inclined to call it “A Bill to alter and amend the Laws of Creation, and to re-distribute that arrangement of Duties between the two Sexes which has hitherto existed, and which has worked with tolerable harmony since the world began.” And the principal reason why I trouble the House to-day is, because I desire to enter my protest against such a re-distribution, which, on my conscience, I believe, would result in the infliction of a grievous injury upon the weaker sex, under the semblance — and, no doubt, with the full intention — of conferring upon them a benefit. Now, Sir, in grappling with this question, I am confronted at the outset with an argument to which I desire to direct attention. The very manliness of man’s nature is appealed to against our opposition. It is said — “You are strong, and those who seek enfranchisement at your hands are weak; moreover, you, being in possession of rights from which you carefully exclude the other sex, are about to sit in judgement upon your own case; you have assumed to yourselves the right to deal with, and to settle, questions in which woman has an equal interest with man, and, therefore, it is for you to show by what right, moral or natural, you justify your exclusion of the other sex. And, if you fail to show such right clearly and beyond doubt, your sense of justice, your honour—nay, your very manliness and chivalry are all concerned in your speedy abandonment of an untenable position and in the immediate removal of these unjust disabilities.” Sir, there is at least something touching in such an appeal to our feelings. No man likes to be told, or to be made to feel, that he is one of a body of tyrants who are keeping others—and those, too, weaker than himself—from rights, which are fairly theirs; and we must all feel at the first blush that, if we could reconcile it to our sense of duty, it would be both pleasant and graceful to yield forthwith to these demands, and to pass the Bill now before the House without further delay. But in dealing with such a question as this, we are bound to consider more than the first impressions which may be produced by such an appeal. We are bound to consider how it is that we occupy this position of exclusive possession of political rights; and, moreover, we require to be shown by good and conclusive reasoning, that our yielding a share of these rights to woman—involving as it would the disturbance of those relations between the two sexes which have hitherto existed—would be fraught with advantage to those on whose behalf it is demanded, and would tend to the general benefit of the community at large. And here arises the question at once—how comes it that this state of things ever existed? How did it ever happen that men stood in their present position in the government of public affairs and the transaction of the political duties of the world? Did the two sexes start upon equal terms at the beginning of the world?—equal in strength, equal in the character of their intellectual powers, alike fit for the discharge of the same social and political duties? Was it, then, by an unjust usurpation that from the very first man obtained the political status which to this day he occupies to the exclusion of woman? Has the whole experience of the world been faulty from the first? Has the teaching of every religion which has ever obtained a hold upon the minds of nations been mistaken in the position which it has assigned to woman? Has a cruel usurpation been going on; has a grinding tyranny endured ever since the creation of the world; and has it been reserved for the enlightenment of the 19th century to discover its real character—to sweep away the scandal of ages—to repair the slights and redress the wrongs of woman, and to place her in the position of which she has been for so many centuries deprived by the greed, the ambition, the rapacity of man? Sir, we are to-day reviewing the social relations of mankind since the beginning of the world, and it is necessary to ask such questions. I can conceive an answer to them, although I suggest it with diffidence. There are still some persons bold enough

Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen

—or timid enough, as it may be thought—to prefer the experience of ages and the universal assent of the world up to this time, even to the enlightened theories of modern philosophy. And such people, I imagine, would answer somewhat after this fashion—“At the first creation of the world a Higher Power than that of Kings and Parliaments decreed and constituted organic differences between the two sexes which cannot be affected by human legislation, and the same Power assigned to each sex special functions and special duties for which each was specially qualified.” Sir, in the truth or falsehood of that proposition really lies the gist of the whole question. For if each sex, by its nature, its constitution, its organization, is equally fitted for the performance of the same functions and duties, then the justice of your Bill is undeniable, and our opposition is unfair and unreasonable. But if the natural difference between the sexes gives to and takes from each sex certain qualifications for certain duties, then, that natural difference must be taken into account in the consideration of any such question as the present, which involves the bestowal of certain rights—or rather, I should say, the imposition upon one sex of certain duties and obligations from which it has hitherto been by common consent exempt. Now, can it possibly be denied that this natural difference exists, and that, in consequence, there are many callings and occupations suited to one sex and not to the other—many duties for the performance of which one sex is unfit and incapable, but for which the other is specially qualified? And, taking this into account, when we are asked to re-consider and revise the apportionment of duties between the sexes, it behoves us to take especial care lest, misled by false sentiment and misplaced sympathy, in the attempt to extend woman's rights, we impose upon her duties and burdens which she would find intolerable. Sir, I know I shall be told that I am travelling beyond the limits of this Bill, which proposes only an extension of existing rights. [“Hear, hear!”] My hon. Friend behind me cheers that view of the case; but if he will consider the matter a little more attentively, he will discover that by this Bill a door will be opened which it will afterwards be difficult to shut. Equal rights involve equal obligations, and I can only argue upon this Bill as one, the passing of which must result in the eventual, if not the immediate, granting to woman of the right—and, mind you, with the right, the obligation—to perform every public duty now performed by man. I employ the arguments of the promoters of the Bill themselves. They say—“You make women pay taxes; you give them votes in vestries, in municipal elections, in the election of school boards; why do you stop short and deny them the Parliamentary franchise?” I say that that argument must be carried further, and that if it is illogical and unreasonable to make a standing-point where we now make it, it is equally unreasonable and illogical to make any standing-point at all, short of perfect equality between the two sexes. And I say, moreover, that if you who use these arguments are not prepared to give that perfect equality, the strength of your argument breaks down, you abandon your principle, and it is for you to show how any standing-point, short of that which would entail upon woman the performance of every duty now performed by man, can be more valid or more tenable than that upon which we rest to-day. You say—“Give women votes for the election of Members of Parliament, because you have already given them votes for the election of school boards.” But may it not be urged with equal force, that since you have permitted women to be elected members of school boards you ought also to permit them to be elected Members of Parliament? I hardly know, from the contents of this Bill and the speeches of its promoters, whether this result is or is not contemplated by the authors of the measure. If so, I think I need hardly point out the difficulties that would arise, and how it would assuredly be discovered that the legislative duties which are discharged by men with tolerable facility would be burdensome beyond measure and beyond their strength in the case of women. Perfect equality in this case, although theoretically beautiful, would be practically impossible; because, as soon as the theory became practice, physical conditions would have to be taken into account, and the difference of constitution between the sexes would render it positive inequality. But, if men and women ought to be equal in every respect, how do you defend the exclusion of married women from participation in electoral privileges? I gather this to be the intention of the Bill, so far as I can understand the speeches delivered in its favour, although this point also is involved in some obscurity. But are married women to be placed at this disadvantage? Surely you will not allow that a married woman is under the control of her husband? That would be a very old-fashioned notion, and one, moreover, which would imply recognition of a quasi-inferiority of sex, which cuts away from under your feet the whole ground of your argument. Of course, it will be said that a vote is given upon considerations of property, and that a woman loses her individuality, and becomes, as it were, merged in her husband upon her marriage. But that is not a complete answer. Why should a woman be punished upon her marriage by being deprived of her vote? Is marriage a crime? If not, why clog it with a disability? And see, in what a position the passing of this Bill will place unmarried but marriageable women! A marriageable woman, whom you have taught to value the franchise as a great privilege, will have seriously to consider whether her duty to her country will allow her to enter into matrimonial bonds; and the inconvenience may become so general and serious that it may have to be considered whether it will not be desirable to establish by law, and socially to recognize, some engagement of a less disfranchising character. But what are these married women whom you would exclude from the franchise? Sir, they are the model women of England. We are all proud of our countrywomen; but when we express that pride, of what class is it that we especially think? I have a great respect for those talented ladies, estimable in every way, who go about the country as lecturers; but I should not take them as my model women; neither should I take ladies who have arrived at a certain age without falling into any matrimonial entanglement. When I speak of the women of England, I have in my mind those young, pure-minded girls, who are the light and life of their homes; who develop into the wives and mothers of England; who bring up England's children in the fear of God and in the love of all that is pure and good; who shed a hallowing influence over the families among whom their lot is cast, and bless the homes of which they are the pride and comfort. And that is the class whom your Bill would exclude from the franchise! You tell us that an unenfranchised class of men stands in an inferior position to those who have the franchise—you tell us that the whole sex of woman is degraded and held in less respect by mankind because disenfranchised—and in the same breath, you propose by your legislation to place in an inferior position in comparison with their fellow-women, that class which, by universal admission, are pre-eminently fulfilling woman's mission upon earth, and who, by their nurture and education of our children, are more than any other class moulding our national character. But, Sir, it is said that women desire to have the franchise, and the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright) points with triumph to the Petitions which have been presented in favour of his Bill. I will venture upon no rash assertions upon this matter, but will state solely what I believe to be facts. We are told that to these Petitions are attached some 240,000 or 250,000 signatures. I do not know how many of these are the signatures of women—possibly one-half—but, when we consider that by the Census of last year it was shown that in England alone there are more than 11,000,000 women, and in the United Kingdom upwards of 16,000,000, this number is no very overwhelming proof of the unanimous concurrence of women in the objects of this Bill. Moreover, it must be considered that when amiable and talented ladies of high position hold meetings throughout the country, and ask for signatures to Petitions in support of these views, the natural politeness of mankind is brought into play, and many people will sign out of compliment, who either care very little about the matter, or who do so in the full confidence that Parliament will never pass such a measure, and that their signatures will do no harm. But it is asked why there are no Petitions against the Bill? I think there is a reason for that also. My clients—for it is in behalf of the bulk of the women of England that I am arguing—have an indisposition to mix themselves up in politics, or to step out of what they consider their natural sphere. They are not fond either of agitating or signing Petitions. And, beyond that, having seen how Parliament has already met this question, and the decisive majority against last year's Bill, they are content to remain quiet, and to rely upon the calm judgment and good sense of Parliament to reject it again. No one can, of course, pronounce positively as to the feelings of women upon such matters; but I confidently appeal to the personal experience of every Gentleman who hears me—and I am sure it will not differ widely from mine—namely, that the opinions we hear expressed by women upon this subject are, in a very great proportion indeed, decidedly opposed to the provisions of this Bill. Sir, I hope that in making these remarks, I am not saying or implying anything which can fairly be termed unkind or disrespectful to those who take a contrary view. Such, indeed, is far from my intention. It is in the interest of the women of England that I oppose this Bill. I am against "woman's rights," because I wish to maintain woman's privileges, and I am confident that the granting of the one would seriously imperil the other. Sir, in the course of last year's debate upon this subject, I remember that the hon. Member for Manchester was pleased to refer somewhat contemptuously to what he called the "pedestal" or "pinnacle" argument. And, yet, I think there is something in that argument which cannot be dismissed with a sneer. Those who think with me, when they speak of placing women as it were upon a pedestal, attach a real and tangible meaning to our words. We regard woman as something to admire, to reverence, to love; and, while we would share with her the happiness of life, we would shield her, as far as possible, from its harder and sterner duties. You point to the many instances of cruelty and oppression on the part of men against women. No doubt, there are but too many such instances, but I do not know what cure this Bill would provide. These outrages are perpetrated by brutes unworthy of the name of man; and, indeed, the very scorn, the indignation, the disgust which they excite in the breast of every man worthy of the name, go far to prove the real high and tender estimation in which woman is held by the vast majority of mankind. Sir, to my mind woman is to-day, as much as she ever was in the history of the world, an object for the devotion and chivalry of man. If I might venture upon a poetical image in this House, I would say that she is the silver lining which lights the cloud of man's existence; she softens the asperities of his nature; she elevates the enjoyments, as she assuages the miseries, of his being; she purifies his life here, and, perchance, renders him in some sort more fit for the Heaven for which he hopes hereafter! It is this view of the subject which you deride as the "pedestal argument;" but it will outlive both your derision and your theories. You may have on your side learned professors and enlightened philosophers of the modern school, but we also are not without our allies. We have the experience of ages; we have the common practice of the world since its creation; we have the teaching of Churches—aye, and I believe we have the good, practical common sense of the vast majority of English men and English women. We, then, will not be parties to placing woman in an entirely false position; we will not be parties to dragging her down into the arena of our every-day toil and strife; we will not inflict upon her additional unnecessary burdens and obligations; and it is because we believe that compliance with the demands embodied in your Bill would bring about such a result, because we believe that compliance with those demands would be fraught with evil to the other sex, and would be subversive of social relations which it would be a crime and a folly to disturb—that, whilst we admit the purity of your motives and the honesty of your intentions, we feel compelled to oppose to this measure a respectful but a determined resistance.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, the Bill itself was unexceptionable and plausible enough, simply asking, as it did, that women who had property should be allowed to vote; and if he were not thoroughly persuaded that it was only a step towards a much larger measure he should have been prepared to support it. For instance, the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright) did not hesitate to say that women ought to be admitted into the medical and legal professions; but if they were permitted to do so, it would be necessary to pass an Act for the abolition of flirtation. It was, therefore, of great importance that the House should consider what might be the consequences of a Bill of this kind, since, as had just been said, the next demand might be that women should be allowed to vote for Members of Parliament, and then seek election as Members themselves. If, as an hon. Member had stated, there were nearly a million more women than men, in what position would the men be if legislative power were extended to women? In that contingency, perhaps, the present Representatives of the people would have to apply for admission to the "Gentlemen's Gallery." He remembered an anecdote to the effect that when the Bank of England was founded, one of the regulations provided that no Scotchman should be a member of the Direction, the reason assigned being that if one Scotchman became a Director all the other Directors would soon be Scotchmen; and he believed that if votes were given to the women of England the men would be left at home to rock the cradles and wheel about the perambulators. In short, coupling the Bill with the pamphlets written by women, which were on the tables of all hon. Members, it was clear that this measure was but the commencement of other changes, which would amount to a revolution. He was, moreover, certain that instead of effecting any reform, the measure would destroy the comfort of every home in the country, and eventually undermine the Constitution itself.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, that although he had supported the Bill in previous Sessions, he intended to vote against it on the present occasion, and he should state, in a very few words, his reason for doing so. He did not attach much weight to the argument that the Bill would unsex women; but there was an argument which would have more weight in the division than prominence in the debate—namely, that to give votes to women would be a great Conservative gain, for he believed Thackeray was right when he said that every woman was a Tory at heart. However, he should not be influenced even by that argument, though in the present state of parties the Liberals could ill afford to give any advantage to their opponents; nor by the additional one, that the ladies would be sure to vote for the best-looking candidates—an argument which, no doubt, weighed with the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire) and other

hon. Gentlemen possessed of similar personal advantages. What had influenced him on the subject was, that in the course of four years he had only met with four women who wished for the franchise, or who would exercise it if it were granted to them; and he wished to put this experience against the number of Petitions which had been presented in favour of the Bill. He was convinced that Parliament ought not to legislate on a mere abstract principle, for men could not live by logic alone. It was undoubtedly a fact that English women did not want to have the franchise, and even if this were a woman's question, he had a right to ask who the women were that desired this change, and for what reason? The Bill was advocated only by a small knot of earnest women, who had been brooding over real or imaginary wrongs for so long a period that they were unable to regard any question from any other point of view. Such were the women who originated and sustained the miserable agitation for the repeal of the Contagious Diseases Acts—an agitation which assumed such a form, that it was a disgrace to the country, as it flooded gentlemen's breakfast tables with abominable literature, not addressed to themselves only, but also to their wives and daughters. No doubt, there were other women who desired the change, but they were all women of one idea, who had worked themselves into the belief—a most erroneous one, as he believed—that that House, as at present elected, was disposed to ignore the just claims of women. If the franchise were given to these women there would be a new party in the House. There would then be a women's party—a Home Rule party in a new sense of the word, and there would be not merely war of opinions, or of races, or of creeds, but likewise a war of sexes. If he could believe that a large portion of his countrywomen desired this change, on national grounds and for national purposes, he would give to their application a willing and a patient hearing; but he could not consent to make a revolution for the sake of a handful of fanatics.

MR. HERON said, he should support the second reading of the Bill. All persons entitled by property to the franchise should be allowed to vote, unless they were disqualified by want of intelligence. Women now in England voted at municipal elections, voted for Poor Law Guardians, for churchwardens, voted as members of the great public companies, voted at the election of the school boards, and were themselves among the most efficient members of the school boards. Women voted as proprietors of Bank of England Stock, and formerly voted as proprietors of India Stock. The question was virtually conceded when women were allowed to vote at the school board elections and municipal elections. In Italy women were allowed to exercise the franchise, on the condition that they would exercise it through a deputy. Was there any reason for their exclusion from Parliamentary elections? The women who had the qualifications to entitle them to the franchise were better educated, more quiet, and sober in judgment than the average of Parliamentary electors. Women, physically weaker by nature and less favoured by law, had to fight the battle of life in the face of obstacles more formidable than those which beset the paths of men. And if in the pursuits of life open to women, women were earning the bread of independence, it was by the industry, self-denial, perseverance, and good conduct, which were the noblest features of national character. In the progress of society in the free industrial life of England, the number of independent women were increasing every day, supporting themselves as teachers, writers, painters, workers in every trade, artists in every art. Why, then, should the women voters—themselves as a class the best educated and best conducted amongst those entitled to the franchise—be excluded, upon the illogical argument that half of the human race were by nature, and ought by law, to be deprived of political privileges? They admitted representation ought to be co-extensive with direct taxation. Women were directly taxed. All their recent Parliamentary reforms were founded on the principle that the suffrage was needed by large classes of individuals for self-protection. Was it necessary to give the instance of Edinburgh University? There, a few women of great ability desired to be instructed as medical practitioners—desired to learn the practice of those arts of medicine and surgery which every lady cultivated in the days of chivalry; but Government and Parliament were silent whilst those ladies fought their battle alone against a powerful, first-class professional trades union. Women, therefore, asked for the Parliamentary suffrage, because they had a right to have their best interests politically represented, and because they paid in common with men, the taxes of the State, and they believed they had a constitutional right slightly to influence the making of the laws which they must obey. They had to meet, then, the prominent arguments against women's suffrage. They were of two classes, partly selfish and partly sentimental. It was said women ought to be placed on too high a pedestal to be dragged through the mire of a contested election. Politics involved trouble, and there were many most unpleasant things connected with politics—the riot on the nomination, the riot on the polling day—but the Ballot would moderate the excitement of the election. They disliked the nomination day themselves, and it would be abolished. And those who said it was unfeminine for a woman to give a public vote should remember the unpleasant occupations to which women had been allowed to devote themselves. Had not women been allowed to work in mines? Did they not brave all weathers as stewardesses on ocean steam vessels? Were they not left all menial work inside and outside the house—the sale of fish from door to door, and internal domestic slavery? Then, it was said women had sufficient power. A man's wife was very often the real prompter of what he did in the world, either foolishly or wisely. She was not accountable for the one, and got little credit to the other. Again, it was said disunion in families would be caused by the domestic head of the family no longer being allowed to be the political head, but it was not proposed to give the franchise to married women. The Bill only gave the franchise to spinsters and widows, and they left the question who was the head of the house to be decided in the ordinary manner. He passed over the arguments that a woman had not a logical mind. Were they to go into the question who was able to follow in a logical argument? Should women be allowed a voice in the legal question as to who should have the custody of children? Should women be allowed to vote on the question of a free breakfast table, and questions as to the property of married women? Then there was the historical question. In the Middle Ages woman was not disqualified from any of the offices incident to the tenure of real property. She might be the Returning Officer at an election, Sheriff of a county, or the warden of a castle. The exclusion from the franchise in one remarkable way worked a grievous injustice on some estates. Widows were evicted from the farms their husbands cultivated, because the political influence would be diminished if the vote were lost. The last adverse argument to which he would refer was the purely sentimental argument. The ideal of some was that home should be adorned by beings charming and submissive, having no will of their own, not giving the slightest trouble. The opinions of the Eastern Patriarch were cited as a rule for life in Western Europe in the 19th century. Some persons might desire to imitate the wisdom of Solomon, but society had completely changed. They did not accept the antiquated idea of the subjection or slavery of women in the Patriarchal times as their rule of conduct. They did not accept either Patriarchal, or Spartan, or Athenian, or Roman ideas on the subject. In all those there was something to be imitated, far more to be avoided. In old times representative government did not exist, and most women shared the common lot of slavery. They did not recognize the dogmas of the physical subjection of women or her moral inferiority. Even in this agitation women had displayed the eloquence with which they were by nature gifted. Let equal political rights be given to those who contributed not the least to the happiness and prosperity of the Empire.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he regarded the Bill as belonging to the peculiarly dangerous class of those which were professedly moderate in their apparent object, while the arguments on which they were supported took a much wider scope. Ostensibly a Bill for the enfranchisement of the spinsters and widows with a stake in the country, it was advocated on the ground of the wrongs of women without property, especially of married women. It would be idle, therefore, to suppose that the agitation for women's rights would be stayed by the success of this measure; for the most bitter agitations had generally small and apparently innocent beginnings, though they might end in a blazing capital. In arguing the question he declined to consider its possible bearings on the balance of parties, although politics, according to some hon. Members on both sides of the House, consisted in the judicious or injudicious counting of votes, and in calculating the chances of the next General Election. Hence, some were urged to vote for the Bill on the ground that women were naturally Conservatives. Whether that was the case he did not know, but he was sure that the very qualities which made women the solace of our homes, the very qualities which gave them their real power, unfitted them for the hard fight of politics. It was very well in families that hard, calculating, perhaps mercenary man should be influenced by woman's sympathy and consolation. It was well that in a large portion of humankind the heart should rule the head, but to give that portion an independent and directly appreciable control of politics would lead to a reckless expenditure on philanthropic schemes and to wars for ideas. A Parliament in which woman's influence prevailed would be impulsively ready to risk claims and back up assertions which would be ever on the verge of culminating in bloodshed for the sake of honour and mistaken chivalry. His right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) had been charged with arguing that women's votes would lead to a cowardly policy. He understood him to have said the contrary, and with that view he had expressed his agreement. As to the call for this perilous change, a few ladies might condescend to mingle in the fray of politics, but he did not believe women in general would so unsex themselves, while overflowing meetings in St. George's Hall could not alter the limits which God had placed between the sexes. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire) had drawn a lively picture of women's influence in elections, and had proved, what no one doubted, how persuasive a tongue he brought with him among the ladies. But his lively pictures of electioneering through the women had all reference to our present system of masculine voting. Let the House conceive, if it could, how the process would be intensified if the women got direct votes. If an elector's wife could already be so influential, what would be the case if Biddy O'Grady were herself the elector, and brought Mary Shaughnessy with her to the poll? With all the hon. Gentleman's eloquence and popularity, he would find himself the director of an enormous power, if he could sway the suffrages of the fair daughters of Erin, within sound of

"The bells of Shandon,
Which sound so grand on
The pleasant waters of the Lee."

How far such a power would, if it succeeded, tend to the furtherance of a stable and logical policy, he (Mr. Beresford Hope) left the House to judge. The hon. and learned Member for Tipperary (Mr. Heron) had urged that the exclusion of women from the franchise had deprived them of the tenancy of farms; well, no one could more strongly repudiate than himself importing political combinations into the business relations of landlord and tenant, but that argument had no relevancy, unless it implied that the tenant's vote was the property of the landlord. Now, as he objected to such undue influence, whether exercised by landlords or trades unions, he could not, like the hon. and learned Member, support this Bill as a process of keeping up women-tenants, with the intention of their being women-voters also, voting in the sense of their landlords. He presumed that advocates of the Ballot wished by means of this Bill to ascertain whether secrecy could be preserved if the fairer portion of the community were allowed votes. Under the Ballot it was clear that married women ought not to be treated exceptionally. The argument that their votes would be influenced by their husbands could not be urged by advocates of the Ballot, for on their own showing the votes would be secret, and would, therefore, be free from the husband's influence. Either the Ballot was the sham he had always believed it to be, or married as well as unmarried women ought to be entrusted with the franchise. Another objection to the Bill was that it would encourage the manufacture of faggot-votes, for by the easy process of giving a woman a rent-charge a county vote could be created. Considering the trickery which prevailed and which would always prevail in elections, it was obvious that the production of faggot-votes would be increased if unmarried women could be employed as the medium of the manufacture. The natural courtesy with which, as he hoped, we should always treat women, would check the rough and ready comments with which a flagrant creation of such faggot-votes was now met. The agents would see their opportunity and stuff their faggots with women; and so the constituencies would be extended and denaturalized to an extent of which hon. Members had little forethought. As to women's votes in municipal and school-board elections, the municipal franchise was extended to them by a Bill which slipped through the House in the small hours of the night; and though in the case of the school boards the thing was done deliberately, it must be remembered that these local bodies had limited the definite objects for which they existed, whereas Parliament was vested with the immeasurable Government of the Empire and with questions of peace and war over the world. If women enjoyed the Parliamentary suffrage, they surely ought to serve on juries, a duty from which many of the other sex would gladly be relieved. He opposed the Bill as the offspring of a narrow, fictitious, and noisy agitation.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: This is a question which appeals to the judicial faculties of the House, and I certainly am not disposed to embark upon the large and sentimental questions which have been imported into the discussion of it. I trust the House will allow me to state why I, regarding the matter from a legal point of view, am about to support the second reading of the Bill. The Bill recommends itself to me because it asserts a principle, not an abstract principle, but a practical and correct principle, based upon a matter of fact. The principle asserted by the Bill I take to be this—that the women whom it proposes to enfranchise are, as a matter of fact, at least as much entitled to the exercise of the franchise it confers upon them as the men who are now to exercise it. I do not mean to embark upon a discussion of the abstract question of the rights of women, I will confine myself to the question before the House, and I think there are substantial reasons why, upon the simple issue before us, the verdict of the House should be given in favour of the second reading. Now, it seems to me that upon the question as to whether women are disabled by their sex from political rights, it is difficult for us Englishmen under the English Constitution to return a negative answer. We live under a female Sovereign, upon whose character and whose reign it would not be becoming to say a word; but we live also in a country whose history has been distinguished by two reigns as remarkable in intellect and art, in politics and war, as any on the long roll of English Monarchs, and those two reigns were the reigns of female Sovereigns. I of course refer to Queen Elizabeth and Queen Anne. And upon the authority of others far more competent to speak to this matter than myself, I am able to say that at this moment if you go to India and the East, and if you find any native State peculiarly well governed in an enlightened way, and governed strongly, energetically, and sensibly, you will, as a general rule, find that State to be under female domination. If in one or two instances, then, it be true that the Asiatic woman is fit for the exercise of the highest political functions under circumstances where education, religion, the popular feeling of the country, and every other condition is unfavourable to the development of the intellectual capacity of the sex, that is an answer to any argument derived from the nature of woman, simply as woman, against her being entrusted with the discharge of other lesser political functions. I do not want to overstate the argument in the least, so that I would not assert that all women are, in matters of intellect and political capacity, equal to all men. I do not mean to say that any women that ever lived are equal to some men of former times. I do not think that to be true, and I do not argue it; but I do say that, as far as I am competent to judge, there are large classes of educated women in this country to whom you deny the franchise, who are at least as fit for the exercise of it as uneducated men, and large classes of men to whom we already give it. This being a question of fairness and justice, I will not be deterred from giving a vote which I think to be just, by jokes and arguments which my hon. Friend will forgive me for saying, are addressed rather to the prejudices and the sentiments of the House than to its reason and sense of justice. Now, Sir, let me give you an illustration of this. I have already mentioned the two great and distinguished female Sovereigns of England. It may be said with regard to the reign of Elizabeth that she was one of the few great women of the world, that there are few such, and that it would be unfair to argue from an exception. I grant it, and I pass by Queen Elizabeth. But take the case of Queen Anne. I take it, as far as I know history, that Queen Anne was a person of exceedingly ordinary capacity. I do not mean to say, therefore, that she was equal to Edward I., or Henry VII., or William III.; but I do say that Queen Anne was as fit to sit on the Throne of England as George I. And I say that she was a great deal more fit to sit on the Throne than George IV. If that be so, it seems to me we have no right to make a sort of compromise with justice, and to say that because we give to women the highest of all political functions to discharge, we can deny her as woman the exercise of any others. But I will not hesitate to say that, passing from the question of fitness of women, I vote for this Bill for another reason. I have perfect faith, and I say it sincerely in the wisdom and justice of Parliament; and I believe that when measures are shown to be unwise and unjust, and when laws which are shown to be unjust are brought before Parliament, Parliament will reject those measures, and will alter those laws. I can scarcely believe that if the House of Commons was as much aware, as every lawyer is aware, of the state of the law of England as regards the property of women, even still and after the very recent humane improvements in it, it would hesitate to say it was more worthy of a barbarian than of a civilized State. If that be so, I do not think the wisdom of Parliament will be darkened, nor the justice of Parliament slackened, because those who appeal to that wisdom are entitled to be heard by reason of the possession of something like political power when they come forward to ask for justice. I believe fully that after a certain number of years the law, which I regard in many respects as wholly indefensible, will be altered. As it is I believe the sense of justice on the part of the men, if they are once aroused to it and convinced of the injustice, will in time bring about the reform needed; but I believe this reform will not be brought about so fast as it would if we put into the hands of those who suffer from this injustice some share of political power. Therefore, Sir, while I admit I do not question the justice of Parliament or the right intentions of hon. Members, I submit that the constitutional means of remedying injustice is by influencing Members of Parliament in a constitutional way. Now, what is the objection to empowering women to vote? It cannot be said that it is lack of education. It cannot be put upon anything apart from a question of sex. It is said they are unfit for the exercise of this privilege because they are women, not because if they were not women they would be unfit, but they are unfit because they are women. To tell me you are to vote against this Bill because you do not think women as women are entitled to be enfranchised may be your opinion, but it is no argument. It is not perhaps your fault that you cannot advance a better reason; you may have difficulty in advancing a practical argument, and you cannot offer any evidence in support of your statement that women as women are unfit to exercise the Parliamentary franchise. The only evidence we have upon that subject tells against you. You have entrusted women with quasi-political duties. You have given them a voice in parochial and municipal affairs, and their proceedings have led to a satisfactory result. They can now vote in municipal elections but not in Parliamentary. It is not necessary for me to see, in order to assure myself that they may be fit for exercising the franchise—to vote for a Member of Parliament—that they should be also, if the question arises, fit to sit in Parliament. My answer to that question, if put now, is that, in my opinion, they are not fit; but it is unfair to say you are not to exercise the privilege for which you are fitted, because some years hence you may ask to be admitted to a privilege for which you are not fitted. I am content to ask—Are women in my judgment fit for the privilege they now ask you to give them? My answer is that they are. You are no more flying in the face of nature by allowing a woman having property to vote for a Member of Parliament than flying in the face of nature to allow a woman to vote for a town councillor or a member of a school board. It will be time enough to consider whether women are fit for other positions than this they now ask to be placed in when they make a new demand. At present we have to decide only this question, and it is absurd to endeavour to influence the decision by issues which may never be submitted to the House. We have been warned too. One hon. Member has recommended us to be careful lest this measure which has been introduced as independent of party, should tell against us as a party. I do not know whether women are Conservative or not. At any rate, I believe their tendency in that direction to be greatly exaggerated, and I object to decide questions of this kind on party considerations. It is right in itself, or wrong in itself, to pass this Bill; and if it is right, it should be passed. Probably women would be disposed to show their gratitude to those who had assisted them to procure the franchise, just as the borough voters had done; but whatever the fact, it is the duty of the House to do what it thinks right and just. These things must be judged according to the nature of the question before us. The nature of the question before us seems to me to be that these persons are entitled to vote, and therefore I should confer the right to vote upon them.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, he must protest against the doctrine into which the hon. and learned Gentleman's gallantry had carried him, that the comparative intellectual capacity of men and women should be a criterion in this case. The logical consequence of the hon. and learned Gentleman's argument and of his historical precedents would be that men should be disfranchised and women enfranchised, and that there should be an anti-Salic law, so that females might always reign. He doubted whether such a course would be for the benefit of the country. It was, moreover, dangerous to argue that because women were qualified for Sovereignty they were fit for other political offices, for it would follow that they were fit to sit in this House. He (Sir Charles Adderley), however, was really of opinion that it was a question of property only. The basis of representation in this country was not intellectual capacity, but property; and his reason for supporting the Bill was, that property ought not to be disfranchised because it happened to be held by women.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Dowse) said, he did not agree with the observations which his hon. and learned Friend (Sir John Coleridge) had made in support of this Bill. He (Mr. Dowse) intended to vote against the Bill, and to give his reasons for voting against it. In 1870 he voted for the Bill; in 1871 he recorded a silent vote against it, and on the present occasion, with the kind permission of the House, he would explain why he intended to vote against it again. He was not ashamed to own, after a re-consideration of the matter, that he was wrong when on a previous occasion he voted for the Bill. He was partly influenced last year in the conclusion at which he arrived by the passing of the Married Women's Property Bill, which had entirely altered the position of women with regard to their husbands. That Bill provided that if any freehold estate descended to a woman after her marriage, she would be seized of it for her separate use, and that her receipts alone should be a full discharge. That being so, he was opposed to this Bill, because, having regard to the present state of the law, he did not know what the Bill meant, and because the proposer of it did not know what it meant. He was opposed to it, moreover, because nobody had stated what it meant. Under the Bill as it stood, with the conjoint operation of the Married Women's Property Act, a married woman might have a vote. ["No, no!"] If his hon. Friend the Member for Manchester did not wish to give a married woman a vote, why did not he say so in the Bill? It was a mere skeleton of a Bill, which in Committee might be clothed with flesh, and have blood infused into its veins, but he objected to such measures. This Bill was like the Highlander's gun—it would be a very good gun, if it only had a new stock, lock, and barrel. He objected most emphatically to changes of this kind being taken up, and valid objections treated as mere questions of detail, for the details of the Bill constituted a great and important question with which the House was brought face to face, and not a matter of detail alone. He listened to the speech of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General with a great deal of pleasure for one reason, because he found it so easy to answer. His hon. and learned Friend informed them that under Queen Anne the nation was distinguished in literature and scholarship, and, therefore, he supported the Bill; but he had yet to learn that Joseph Addison was a great writer because Queen Anne was a woman, or that the Augustan age of English literature would not have been as distinguished if a woman had not been on the Throne. And it took its name, by-the-by, not from Augusta, but from Augustus. If Queen Anne could only be present at that debate, with all the knowledge she had acquired in the meantime, he had no doubt she would vote against this Bill. The speech of his hon. and learned Friend drifted in the direction of the argument that if we had a female Sovereign, we might have a female Chief Justice, a female Attorney General, a female Speaker, a female Leader of the Opposition, and a female Prime Minister; and because this Bill was drifting into that, he (Mr. Dowse) did not see his way to voting for it. He was quite aware that many a Judge had been an old woman; but that was no reason why every old woman ought to be a Judge. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire), in a pleasant book, had foreshadowed the future; and had only allowed 20 years to elapse till female Members would be sitting in this House; and one of the number figured in a sketch of that agreeable novelist, as possessed of winning ways which made her a most efficient whip. Everything tended to show that they could not stop with this fragment, but must take it as part of a great and momentous question. He wished thus to consider it, and to give his vote on that ground. It was because he did not desire to see women placed in a different sphere to that which they now occupied in this country, that he should vote against the second reading. Again, there was no demand for that Bill among the class of women who had a right to represent and speak for their sex, and who knew and valued their position as Englishwomen. In the evening after he voted for the Bill in 1870, he saw a lady and told her—"I have been working for your cause to-day; I have been endeavouring to remove the electoral disabilities of women;" and what was her answer?—"You might easily have been better employed." He believed that was the opinion of the great majority of women. In his opinion, the Bill was bad in form and bad in substance, and he should, therefore, vote against it.

MR. J. S. HARDY said, he had voted for the Bill last Session; but not having heard anything said in favour of it by any of his constituents, he thought it his duty now to vote against it, and not to thrust a duty upon women which they did not desire.

MR. W. FOWLER said, although he felt strongly that, on many points, the law was unfair to women, that was no reason why he or the House should vote for this ill-considered and incomplete Bill.

LORD HENRY SCOTT said, he could not support the Bill, because it had been re-introduced this year in the same form as last year, and would give a franchise to women in every respect the same as to qualifications as was given to men under the existing law, and that that would go far beyond the principle of the representation of property, on which ground alone he had supported the general proposition of last year.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT, in reply, said, that the words of the Bill were almost identical with those which gave the municipal vote to women, and it had been decided that when a woman married she no longer possessed the municipal vote. He was not afraid, therefore, that this Bill would give the franchise to married women; but if that were the case, the question would be one for consideration in Committee.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

ENDOWED SCHOOLS AND HOSPITALS (SCOTLAND).

Resolved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into the nature and amount of all endowments in Scotland, the funds of which are wholly or in part devoted, or have been applied, or which can rightly be made applicable to educational purposes, and which have not been reported on by the Commissioners under the Universities (Scotland) Act, 1858; also to inquire into the administration and management of any Hospitals or Schools supported by such Endowments, and into the system and course of study respectively pursued therein, and to Report whether any and what changes in the administration and use of such Endowments are expedient, by which their usefulness and efficiency may be increased.—(Sir Edward Colebrooke.)

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.
 TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA).
 THE INDIRECT CLAIMS.
 THE CORRESPONDENCE.
 OBSERVATIONS.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, seeing in his place my noble Friend (the Earl of Derby) who, on Tuesday evening, put a Question to me respecting the receipt of the answer of the United States Government to my Letter of the 20th of March, I beg to inform the House that yesterday afternoon General Schenck read to me and gave me a copy of a despatch from Mr. Fish to himself, dated 16th of April. I think it right to inform your Lordships that, taking the despatch by itself, it does not afford a solution which would remove the unfortunate misunderstanding which has arisen. If I only had regard to that despatch, I should not feel that Her Majesty's Government were justified in further delaying the production to Parliament of the whole of the Correspondence: but I may state, though I cannot give a precise assurance to Parliament, that I have grounds, and Her Majesty's Government have grounds, to hope that an arrangement satisfactory to both countries will be come to. I beg to express my thanks and the thanks of my Colleagues, for the forbearance your Lordships have shown under circumstances, I admit, of a trying character. I have no hesitation in saying your forbearance has very much assisted Her Majesty's Government in their efforts to come to a satisfactory arrangement; and I hope I am not going too far in expressing a hope that this forbearance will be continued for a few days longer by your Lordships' House.

LORD CAIRNS: I may observe that there is a Notice of a Motion for next Monday which may raise a discussion on the question to which the noble Earl has referred. I am sure, therefore, that the House would be anxious to know what number of days the noble Earl asks to be suffered to elapse before such a discussion should take place.

EARL GRANVILLE: I am quite sure the noble and learned Lord must be aware that when negotiations of this informal character are going on it is impossible to say in what number of days an arrangement perfectly satisfactory in substance and details may be come to. All I can say is that Her Majesty's Government are fully sensible of the grave responsibility under which they lie in respect of this important matter; and the House may be sure there will be no delay beyond that which the Government may consider necessary for the interests of the public service.

INTOXICATING LIQUOR (LICENSING)

BILL—(No. 78.)

(The Earl of Kimberley.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, after the length at which he had explained the provisions of the Bill on the first reading, he would merely say that in consequence of certain enactments respecting beerhouses being of a temporary character, provisions would have to be introduced to meet the case of those expiring enactments.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
 —(The Earl of Kimberley.)

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: My Lords, as I have had an opportunity of looking through the provisions of this Bill since it was printed and distributed, I wish to offer a few remarks on the subject. As the Bill was not before us when the noble Earl (the Earl of Kimberley) made his statement, it was impossible to follow him through all the details, notwithstanding the great ability and clearness of his speech; and I am not, I think, guilty of exaggeration when I say that the subject of which this Bill treats is one of the last importance, affecting, as it does, almost every class of the community. This Bill deals with the interests of the numerous and wealthy traders who have embarked their capital in the liquor trade, and I need scarcely say that it also affects the interests of a very large portion of the poorer members of society. And here, my Lords, I would express a hope that in legislating for the moral improvement of our poorer fellow-countrymen we shall at the same time show that we are desirous not to interfere with their comforts or with the wants of their every-day life. My Lords, I hope the noble Earl (the Earl of Kimberley) will forgive me for remarking on the form in which this Bill was introduced in your Lordships' House. He took a course which I think was somewhat inconvenient; for though I am aware it is a perfectly regular course, and has been adopted on many occasions, I do not think it was a satisfactory course in the case of a Bill of this importance—I mean the course of introducing the Bill in “dummy.” Your Lordships will remember that the noble Earl came down one evening and stated that he intended to introduce on the following evening a Bill having reference to the licensing question. Under the circumstances, therefore, I do not think the course taken with respect to this Bill was a convenient one, seeing that the noble Earl made an elaborate statement, not only of its scope and bearing, but of its details, on the 16th of March, and that it was not printed till the 24th. The noble Lord, as I have remarked, introduced this Bill in “dummy” on the 16th of March, which, by a curious coincidence, happened to be the day preceding that on which a Bill on the same subject, introduced in the other House of Parliament by the hon. Member for Essex (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson), stood for second reading. One can almost imagine that at the meeting of the Cabinet held on the previous Saturday Ministers were reminded by some Member of the Cabinet that on Wednesday, the 17th, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson was going to move the second reading of a measure which might overtrump the Bill of the Government, and this may explain why it was that the Government resolved to introduce their Bill here on the 16th, in order that they might not appear to be behindhand in this important question. I am the more inclined to think that this would not be an incorrect surmise, because the Bill on the face of it bears all the marks of a hastily-prepared and ill-considered measure. Certainly one would be inclined to suppose that if it had received sufficient attention from the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, it would have come before us in a very different shape. A promise of legislation on this subject having been announced in the Speech of our most gracious Sovereign from the Throne, the right hon. Gentleman having had so much experience of it during the last Session, and as it must have occupied no small share of his attention during the recess, it was not too much to expect a very much more perfect measure than that which has been submitted to your Lordships. In proof of its being an ill-considered measure, I may refer to what has fallen from the noble Earl himself this evening. It treats as permanent Acts measures of 1869 and 1870, which were only temporary; so that, as it stands, the Bill does not deal with the beerhouse question at all. Clause 68 of this Bill purports to repeal several Acts “set forth in the second schedule,” but when I turn to this schedule I find it to be a blank. This is pretty conclusive evidence that those who prepared the Bill failed to look to all the Acts of Parliament which should have been included in the schedule. One of my principal objections to this measure is that it appears to me to be one of merely a temporary character. On reading the Bill I almost doubt that the Secretary for the Home Department can have even seen it, because it seems to me that it is entirely contrary to the views which the right hon. Gentleman himself expressed as to the only basis on which satisfactory and permanent legislation on this subject could be attempted. In his speech last year the right hon. Gentleman said—

“He should expect them to concur in the proposition that, under the existing system of licensing, far more licenses had been issued than were required for the public convenience. He had no doubt of this concurrence in the face of the fact that there exists a publichouse or a beerhouse for every 182 of the population. The next proposition he would advance was, that the present mode of issuing licenses was unsatisfactory, no guidance being afforded to the magistrates either as to the number to be issued, or the respectability and responsibility of the persons seeking to be licensed.”—[Hansard, ccv. 1063.]

I can see nothing in this Bill to carry out the views so clearly expressed in that passage of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. The Secretary for the Home Department went on to say—

“The Bill of the Government, which was framed on the principles he had stated, would repeal in whole or in part from 40 to 50 Acts of Parliament, and would consolidate and amend the laws regulating the ordinary retail sale of intoxicating liquors.”—[Ibid. 1064.]

In this Bill no attempt is made to consolidate—if anything, it adds an additional Act to those already in force, and therefore, instead of consolidating and simplifying, it rather adds to the confusion. It leaves the many existing Acts in force, and adds one more to them. The Home Secretary, alluding to the Bill of the hon. Member for Essex, said—

"The Bill of the hon. Member for Essex passed without a division. Yet that Act was regarded only as a makeshift until some complete measure could be introduced. The legislation affecting the trade was in such a state of confusion that it had become necessary to have a conclusive measure. Existing Acts contained conflicting provisions; there was a strange variety of licenses; while there was no definite principle on which licenses were to be granted."—[Ibid. 1067.]

The hon. Member went on to refer to the hours of closing, the variations in the Excise duties, and so on. The noble Earl, in introducing the Bill, said it was not an ambitious measure. It did not propose to deal with the vast number of Bills and licenses to which he had alluded; but which last year was the opinion of the Home Secretary as to what was essential. Having thus expressed himself—

"Under these circumstances it was clear that consolidation and simplification of the law was necessary."

I agree with the right hon. Gentleman, but I submit to your Lordships that this Bill does not affect what he held to be necessary. Now, although I entertain strong objections to this Bill, I will not incur the responsibility of opposing the second reading. I think that as the Government have laid it before your Lordships it is necessary that we should give it a second reading; but before I sit down I will endeavour not only to point out what are the objections to certain provisions in the Bill, but also to indicate certain provisions which, in my opinion, it ought to have contained. My Lords, I object to the manner in which vested interests are dealt with in this Bill. Under its provisions the owners of property were entirely in the hands of their tenants. This I regard as a serious blot. On conviction for certain offences against the Act not only does the person convicted forfeit his license, but the house is deprived of the license for five years. It might easily occur that the owner of a public-house might have a tenant who offended three times against the provisions of the Act without the owner having the slightest knowledge that the Act had been so violated; and yet his house would be deprived of a license for five years. I put it to your Lordships whether to shut a public-house up for five years is not in reality to shut it up for ever. Other houses would spring up in the neighbourhood and the owner of the closed house would be entirely deprived of his property. I do not throughout the Bill find any provision for encouraging the establishment of a better class of houses to which licenses might be given, although that was a matter which was strongly recommended in the discussions of last year. Then, I strongly object to the way in which the Bill entirely ignores magisterial authority in the granting of original licenses. The manner in which those licenses are proposed to be granted is nothing more nor less than a scheme of centralization by which the Home Secretary will be enabled to override magisterial authority in respect of the granting of original licenses. There is another point, my Lords, and it is this—notwithstanding the Motion passed in "another place" by a large majority against the increase of local rates, the expenses of all the appointments under this Bill are to be defrayed by local rates—thereby adding to a burden already too heavy. The provision in the Bill of last year for the removal of licenses from crowded localities to places in which public-houses were more required, and which would be of great public advantage, is omitted from this Bill. I should have thought that the experience of the past would have induced the Government to adopt a system of minimum penalties. Under this Bill recourse is had to the Summary Jurisdiction Act, but the Small Penalties Act is not referred to, though it strikes me that you must of necessity avail yourself of its provisions if you proceed under the Summary Jurisdiction Act. All this tends to show that the Bill is what I have described it to be—an ill-considered and hastily-prepared scheme. I have referred to the mode in which magisterial authority is dealt with by this Bill. The proposal of the Government is that the magistrates in petty sessions shall grant licenses, but that they shall not be valid until they are approved by a committee of magistrates appointed for that purpose by the Quarter Sessions, and they are not to come into force until they have been approved by the Home Secretary. Practically, therefore, the licensing power is vested in the Home Secretary. Now, last year, when speaking of the measure then before Parliament, Mr. Bruce said—

"No appeal would be given from the decision of the justices in respect of the exercise of their licensing jurisdiction, they, living on the spot, being supposed to be better judges of local and personal questions than the justices of Quarter Sessions could be."—[Ibid. 1077.]

The justices living on the spot were then supposed to be better judges in the matter than the justices of Quarter Sessions; but now the authority is to be taken out of their hands because no licenses granted by the magistrates will be valid till they have received the fiat of the Secretary for the Home Department. The offences under this Bill are of two classes, and the first class are, I think, 13 in number, and each conviction for any one of these offences is to be recorded on the license. But, curiously enough, no record is required to be made on the license of the first conviction for two of the most serious offences among the whole of those enumerated in the Bill. Clause 8 deals with the case of a sale of spirits to children under 16 years of age, and Clause 20 with that of adulteration; but the first offence against either of those two clauses is not to be recorded on the license, though under Clause 6, if a glass of beer is drunk on or near premises in which it has been bought, and which are not licensed for the sale of liquor on the premises, the first conviction for this offence is to be recorded on the license. But surely it is quite as great an offence to adulterate the liquor as to give a glass of beer outside the premises. This may have been a mistake in the drawing of the Bill; but, while on this point, I should like to inquire whether three convictions by which a license is to be forfeited must be three convictions recorded on the license or may be three not recorded, or a mixture of both? I would now beg to call your Lordships' attention to the Preamble of the Bill, which is in these terms—

"Whereas it is expedient to amend the law for the regulation of public-houses and other places in which intoxicating liquors are sold, and to make further provision in respect of the grant of new licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquors."

Now, when I come to Clause 13, I find "Penalty on persons found drunk." Surely that clause is not consistent with the Preamble, which refers only to the regulation of places in which intoxicating liquors are sold and to the granting of licenses. Penalties for drunkenness are a part of our police regulations, and have not properly anything to do with a Bill such as the Preamble recites this to be.

The Duke of Richmond

It is, no doubt, difficult to deal with the question of publicans harbouring improper characters; but as Clauses 15 and 16 are of the most stringent character they will both require grave consideration hereafter. Reverting again to Clause 20, I must say I think it is the most extraordinary one I have ever yet read. I imagine I see it in the hand of the noble Earl himself, and I am satisfied it must have emanated from his colonial experience. It states—

"Where a licensed person is convicted of any offence under this section he shall affix, at such part or parts of his premises as may be prescribed by a public-house Inspector under this Act, a placard stating his conviction, of such size and form and printed with such letters and containing such particulars as such Inspector may prescribe, and shall keep the same affixed during two weeks after the same is first affixed;"—

so that the unfortunate publican is required to act the part of bill-sticker to his own establishment—

"and if he fails to comply with the provisions of this section with respect to affixing or keeping affixed such placard, or defaces or allows such placard to be defaced, or if the same is defaced and he fails forthwith to renew the same, he shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding 40s. for every day on which the same is not so affixed and undefaced, and such Inspector as aforesaid or any public constable may affix or re-affix such placard during the said two weeks, or such further time as may be directed by a court of summary jurisdiction."

This punishment appeared to me alike novel and un-English; and I asked in vain where this clause was taken from. I was told that the only country in which any such degradation was inflicted upon anyone was New Zealand. I therefore attribute the clause to the colonial experience of the noble Earl who has charge of the Bill. The clause dealing with adulteration is very unsatisfactory. I am as willing as anybody to prevent the adulteration of liquors; but I think the dealers in the liquors to be analyzed should have better security that the liquor cannot be tampered with from the time it leaves their premises till it reaches the hands of the analyst:—it is important to remove from the mind of the publican any ground of suspicion that such a thing has been done. Clause 27 refers to the "local authorities;" but I have looked through the Bill in vain to find what the "local authority" is. Clause 28 prescribes that refreshment-houses should close at 10 p.m. I cannot see any good reason for this, because I think persons are less likely to get drunk in such houses than in places where no food is sold. Clause 31 makes this provision—

“There shall be appointed in every police district a sufficient number of constables as public-house inspectors, so that in every police district there shall be at least one public-house inspector; and in police districts containing 100,000 inhabitants and upwards there shall be at least one inspector for every 100,000 inhabitants, and for every fraction over 100,000 inhabitants or multiple of 100,000 inhabitants.”

I object very much to the appointment of public-house inspectors for reasons which I shall state presently. It is an additional charge on the rates which is totally uncalled for. But the arrangement provided by this clause is an inadequate one. Take the western division of the county of Sussex for instance. It contains 100,000 inhabitants; it is 40 miles long, and between 30 and 40 wide. Would one inspector be sufficient for such a division? Under the Petty Sessional divisions we have one constable for each of these divisions, which is much better than an arrangement under which there would be only one inspector to travel over the whole of such a division as West Sussex. But my great objection to the clause is that it appoints a particular man to be a spy on the public-houses of a district. I object to the inspectors on the ground that they would be spies—a character which will not dignify the administration of the law. Moreover, at the annual courts for granting licenses, it will be impossible for him to be at all the Petty Sessions for the purpose of giving evidence. In Clause 44 I object to this provision—

“The justices shall not entertain any objection to the grant of such new license, or take any evidence with respect of the grant thereof, unless written notice of an intention to oppose the grant of such license has been served on such holder not less than seven days before the commencement of the general annual licensing meeting.”

My objection is that an offence which ought to disentitle the publican to a renewal of his license might be committed within less than seven days before the commencement of the general annual licensing meeting, and this proviso would prevent any opposition to the grant of the license founded on such offence. I am sorry that I find no attempt made in this Bill to put an end to a state of things which I believe does more to demoralize the lower class, and particularly the female portion of it, than anything else in connection with the traffic in intoxicating liquors. I allude to the sale of wine and spirits by grocers. What does Dr. Little, the senior physician of the London Hospital, say on that subject?—

“I am satisfied that any multiplication of the number of places at which spirituous liquors are obtainable tends to extend the habit of solitary drinking among females. I regret to add that tradesmen reputed respectable have been found to send wines and spirits, packed in disguise, to the wife's order, without the knowledge of the husband. I was professionally consulted in one lady's case, her brain and health having been thus destroyed.”

My Lords, it is stated on good authority that the sale of wine and spirits by grocers who take out wholesale licenses is very injurious to the poorer classes. It is said that in a village near Ipswich, with a population of 900 persons, there is a grocer who thinks it no unusual thing to sell as many as 100 bottles of gin on a Saturday night. In conclusion, my Lords, I must again express my regret that this Bill has not been more carefully drawn, and while I will not oppose the second reading, I must express my conviction that on account both of its omissions and its objectionable provisions the measure will require very careful examination in Committee.

LORD HOUGHTON did not think his noble Friend who had charge of this Bill need have made any apology for its introduction in that House; their Lordships were particularly well fitted to deal with such a measure because of their local knowledge, and also because they were independent of all those classes which were affected by the Bill. At the same time, he did not think the Government had any reason to complain of the criticisms of the noble Duke. He approved of the form in which the Bill was presented. He was of opinion that the Government had done right in not making the measure too ambitious, and he thought that because it was not ambitious it had a better chance of success than the measure of last year. Such a Bill must be tentative, and therefore he did not think it would have been wise to include in it all the subjects glanced at by the noble Duke. He was struck with the observations made by the noble Duke about grocers being allowed to retail wines and spirits; but the noble Duke must have forgotten that so long ago as the ninth year of George II. an attempt was made to put down that system by the imposition of penalties; but the step was so unpopular that only a few years had elapsed till it was repealed. The licensing question was surrounded with difficulties. Their Lordships would remember that the Committee presided over by Mr. Villiers came to the conclusion that the whole system of licenses ought to be abolished, and that the liquor trade ought to be put on the same footing as the other trades of the kingdom. It was a delicate and difficult subject, though not one as to which legislation ought to be avoided for that reason; but at the same time it was a full justification for the Home Secretary not having attempted to legislate at once on the whole subject. Everyone knew that a powerful agitation had been got up out-of-doors in favour of what was called the Permissive Bill, and that the position and prospects of many political persons depended upon that movement for the absolute repression of the sale of strong liquors. He believed that such an attempt would be wrong in principle and inconsistent with all the foundations of our social life. In truth, there were two classes of men whom no legislation could prevent indulging too freely in stimulants—those who could afford to buy them, no matter what the expense; and those whose constitution was such that they would succeed in satisfying their craving even if great physical difficulties were put in their way. It was hopeless to dream that such persons could be made sober by Act of Parliament. But there was the large middle class, who might be tempted into habits of excess by the presence of undue facilities for obtaining drink; it was in behalf of such persons that legislation might usefully be invoked, and it was because this Bill would be useful to that class that he hoped their Lordships would assent to it. To a very great degree, the proper regulation of the liquor traffic must be a question of police; and he was glad to observe that the Bill proposed that a system of police inspection should be established. He was not blind to the difficulties in the way of carrying it out; but if it could be efficiently carried out it would tend to great moral improvement. He believed that it would be welcomed by all the respectable members of the trade, and that they would willingly co-operate with the Inspectors in securing the respectability of their houses. He did not believe that any good would be achieved by merely diminishing the number of public-houses, because the only effect of such a step would be to increase the size of those that were left; and a few large houses, gaudy with lights and rich in decorations, were more harmful than a greater number of less pretentious establishments. The Legislature had no right by any means whatever to deprive the working classes of innocent enjoyment. Such was not the object of this Bill. Its object was the welfare of the people, and he hoped the House would read it a second time, and thus assist the Government in applying a remedy to an admitted evil.

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH: My Lords, I do not wish to intrude my opinions on the House; but as this is a question so deeply affecting the social welfare of the people, I do not think you will deem it unbecoming that one Member at least of the Episcopal Bench should say something on it, especially as there are some considerations connected with it which have not been brought fully into discussion by the criticism of details which the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) has made at such length and with such ability. My object is to put before your Lordships a view of the question which I know to be very largely entertained by persons fully entitled by their knowledge of it to express an opinion and which has hardly found expression in this debate. I am one of those—and they are many, indeed—who do not find fault with Her Majesty's Government for the stringency of the provisions of their Bill as compared with that of last year. Assuredly the Government have not now erred on that side of the question. A moment's comparison of this Bill with that introduced by the Home Secretary last year, both with respect to the renewal of licenses and the regulations for public-houses, convinces me that Her Majesty's Government have felt it necessary—I should be sorry to think that they merely felt it would be expedient—in order to insure the passing of this Bill to relax the stringency of many of the provisions of the Bill of last year. They have omitted several important provisions, the absence of which I, for one, regret. One other matter that I particularly regret is that this Bill does not, any more than the Bill of last year, make any provision for giving to the ratepayers any share in the control of the liquor traffic in their own town or district. That seems to me, my Lords, a great defect in any Bill dealing with the licensing question. There is a very deep and growing feeling in the country, especially among the humbler ratepayers, who are so much interested in this question, that those who pay the rates and whose rates are increased by the crime and pauperism intoxication creates, should have some voice in controlling the machinery which is to issue licenses and regulate the whole of the liquor traffic. I do not, my Lords, claim for the ratepayers entire control; I do not say that they, or a majority of them, should have the power of suppressing the liquor traffic in any town or district. It seems to me monstrous to say that it shall not be a crime to make an article, it shall not be a crime to use it, but it shall be a crime to sell it—to leave the manufacturer free to make liquor and the customer to buy it, but to say to the middle man who comes between these two, you shall not sell it. That, my Lords, I hold would be something like an outrage to the moral sense of the community—it would never be tolerated by the English people if by any chance it became an Act of Parliament. I entirely agree with the noble Lord who preceded me (Lord Houghton) as to the mischief, and I would even say the absurdity, of the Permissive Bill. I believe such a Bill would be not only absurd but mischievous, and that it would tend to exasperate all the difficulties of this question; that in towns where it was most needed it would be inoperative, and that where it is most operative it would be least needed. It proceeds on this most vicious political principle—that the tyranny of a mere majority, not of representative men, but counted merely from door to door, should govern any people. Such a principle is most pernicious. I hold that it is the right of Englishmen to be governed by the Estates of the Realm sitting in Parliament, and not by a hap-hazard majority collected by agitation and canvassing. This is one of the dangers of all democracy—it ignores the rights and privileges of the minority as against the majority; and therefore I believe the tendency of all modern legislation ought to be towards protection of the rights and privileges of minorities. Therefore I entertain the strongest dislike to the Permissive Bill. I cannot, perhaps, express it in a stronger form than by saying that if I must take my choice—and such it seems to me is really the alternative offered by the Permissive Bill—whether England should be free or sober, I declare—strange as such a declaration may sound, coming from one of my profession—that I should say it would be better that England should be free than that England should be compulsorily sober. I would distinctly prefer freedom to sobriety, because with freedom we might in the end attain sobriety; but in the other alternative we should eventually lose both freedom and sobriety. But, though I am thus strongly opposed to the Permissive Bill, I do wish that the ratepayers should have some voice—not an absolute and sole voice, but some voice—in the regulation of the liquor traffic. I think it would not be wise or desirable to intrust the regulation of the liquor traffic to a Board elected entirely by the ratepayers; but I do think it would be quite possible so to combine the official and elective elements in the Licensing Board as to give to the ratepayers the assuring conviction that their interests were fairly represented; while by retaining the magistracy you would have the conservative element duly to resist popular influences and give consistency to their decisions. I appeal to the noble Earl who has charge of this Bill (the Earl of Kimberley) with all the more confidence on this point, as the principle for which I contend has been adopted and sanctioned by a measure introduced by the Government in 1869 for the establishment of County Boards. These County Boards were to be managed partly by elected and partly by official members, the latter being Justices. I would ask your Lordships to consider one fact of great importance in its bearing on this subject. I have spoken of the mischievous tendency of agitation for the Permissive Bill. My Lords, I have had to discuss this question over and over again with some of the most eminent advocates of the Permissive Bill, and I have always found at the bottom of their advocacy—not so much the desire to carry a Maine Liquor Law or totally to suppress the liquor traffic—as the desire to have for themselves, and for the ratepayers, some share in the control of the liquor traffic; and if some such control was given by this Bill and the ratepayers felt that they were fairly represented on the Licensing Board, and were not altogether ignored in the decisions come to as to the number of public-houses, the whole of this most mischievous agitation for the Permissive Bill would, if not altogether collapse, receive a shock which would make it much less dangerous for years to come. There is another consideration which I must mention. In the 44th clause of this Bill there is an extremely stringent provision against frivolous and vexatious prosecutions;—when a prosecution fails the person instituting it must pay the costs and compensate the licensee. A clause so stringent against vexatious prosecutions almost amounts to a prohibition on individual ratepayers taking proceedings; and it is therefore all the more desirable to place on the Board itself representatives of the ratepayers, so that without the vexation and irritation of prosecutions due weight may be given to the objections of those whom they represent. I appeal, if not with confidence at least with earnestness, to the noble Earl who has charge of the Bill whether it is yet too late to adopt this suggestion? As a member of the Episcopal Bench, I feel it would be almost criminal in me to remain silent on this question. It is not a mere question of police, it is not a mere question of licensing, it is not a mere question of adulteration; it is a matter of deep principle which lies very near to the hearts of the great masses of our fellow-countrymen. When you lay your finger on this question you are touching the hearts of the people, and bringing yourselves still closer into relations with the great masses of our population. Nothing, I am persuaded, my Lords, would do more to win their hearts to the cause of law and order than that they should see your Lordships earnestly and deeply considering how far you can not merely repress intemperance and check the evils arising out of it, but doing this in a manner to satisfy them that the highest interests of the working classes of the country will be duly and fairly considered.

The Bishop of Peterborough

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET thought the present Bill a more practicable measure than the Bill brought forward last Session by the Secretary of State for the Home Department—that was a most unfortunate scheme. The proposal now under consideration he regarded more favourably; but it would hardly meet the requirements of the case, unless it were subjected to the consideration of a Select Committee of their Lordships' House. There were so many points of detail in the measure that it would be almost impossible to deal with them otherwise. He did not find that the selling of spirits by grocers was brought under the operation of the Bill, and he thought that the placing public-houses under control and leaving grocers' shops uncontrolled, would be a mode of proceeding which would be fatal to success. They ought both to be brought under one principle. Again, he was surprised to find that the Bill did contain any provisions in reference to the granting of retail licenses for the sale of wines and spirits, to be held in conjunction with wholesale licenses. This, he thought, was a very bad principle. He would not go into details; but he would point out that, though the Bill would diminish the number of public-houses, the provisions relating to the hours of closing would create a feeling throughout the country against the Bill. The noble Earl, in bringing forward the measure, had referred to the large number of licenses at present existing; but he did not state what licenses would be continued under the present Bill; nor did he say whether the sale of spirits would be under the same regulations as the sale of other drinks. While on some points the stringency of the Bill might be relaxed, there were other points in respect to which its stringency should be increased. He had witnessed many instances of the evils of the existing system. When he was at the Admiralty he went to see Haslar Hospital, where he found several men, from 20 to 26 years of age, suffering from delirium tremens, and it appeared that many of these young men, on landing, received from £20 to £40, which they spent all in drink; and he constantly received letters stating that the Saturday half-holiday was frequently a greater harm than benefit, because much of the holiday time was spent in drinking. He believed that the country was quite prepared for some measure like that before the House, and he was glad the noble Earl had taken the matter in hand; but the Bill could not be made efficient unless it was sent to a Committee upstairs for consideration.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, after the very eloquent speech of the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Peterborough), I desire to say a few words on behalf of that much-abused body, the magistrates of the county, as the licensing authority. You must remember that you have got not merely to satisfy the noisy agitators who attend public meetings and speak from public platforms upon this subject, but you have to provide for the discharge of what is a most important administrative duty, affecting the social life and condition of all classes of the community. The great object which you have to attain is to place what is a most invidious power in the hands of persons who are sufficiently independent to secure that they shall not be open to suspicion in the exercise of it. Suppose you place, as has been suggested, the power of granting and refusing licenses in the hands of persons elected by the ratepayers—the persons elected will be tradesmen of the same class as those from whom the guardians of country unions are drawn, and consequently of the same class as the keepers of public-houses themselves. How much ill-feeling, envy, bitterness, and suspicion would you give rise to, even if these representatives exercised their power in a prudent manner; and you would be exposed always to the danger that local feuds would find their expression in the refusal of a license to a person who had taken one side or the other. It seems to me of far more importance that the licensing authority should be free from any suspicion of being influenced by impure motives in granting the license than that you should satisfy a small body of ratepayers who desire to have a share in the licensing authority. I must say that a rather Utopian view of the English ratepayer seems to exist in some minds. There seems to be a notion that the ratepayer is careful for nothing but the moral and social advancement of his kind; that he takes an active interest in all political and social questions; and that the one object of his desire is to be allowed to occupy a position by which he can force his brother ratepayers to be sober. Now, the real state of the case is that if the average ratepayer is sober himself, that is all he can reasonably hope to attain to. I am not particularly fond of household suffrage; but by the use of household suffrage we ascertain what the housekeepers, the ratepayers, think; and when I am told that the ratepayers desire to have a power of depriving me of the power of granting licenses to public-houses, I am inclined to look at recent elections, and ask if such is the case. I have not found in the authorized expression of opinion any intimation of such being their desire. I am afraid a belief is prevalent that the advancement of morality is due to the action of Government authority. If so, we are in danger of abandoning the highest standard of morality, that of Christianity, and of seeking another in Acts of Parliament and regulations of police. Is there any country in the world in which the action of the Legislature has been able to supply the calls of the moralist and the teacher? 150 years ago the upper and middle classes of this country were as bad with regard to drunkenness as the lower classes are now. People did not then trust to legislative action, they resorted to civilization and religion. They trusted to allegiance to a principle, and in the upper and middle classes of this country at present drunkenness is not a prevailing vice. Why, then, not believe that the influences which had been so powerful with the upper and middle classes will be equally operative with the lower? I trust that in any measures your Lordships may be asked to pass, you will shrink from attempting a task which it is impossible for any Legislature to perform—namely, by the action of Government to insure morality among the people.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, there is much in the remarks of the right rev. Prelate behind me (the Bishop of Peterborough) and of the noble Marquess which is worthy of consideration. This Bill, however, I think they will admit, does not err in the way of introducing a new element of control on the part of the ratepayers. I wish also to point out to the noble Marquess that the demand for the interference of the ratepayers comes from the lower classes themselves, and, be it wise or unwise, I do not think those who make that demand are open to the reproach which has been cast against them—of seeking to legislate for the rich to the prejudice of the poor. I will go further, and say that I am perfectly persuaded—so great is my confidence in all classes in the country—that if the absence of regulations likely to affect the rich were the only bar to the passing of this Bill, we should have little or no difficulty in doing that which we believe to be necessary to promote the welfare of the people at large. But, at the same time, I am not one of those who would wish to go too far in the endeavour to make men sober. There is, I admit, a great tendency to apply on every occasion to the Executive Government to remedy evils which I am satisfied cannot be remedied either by the police or by a still higher authority. Any attempt, in my opinion, by means of such measures to put down evils which we may all deplore would not only result in throwing upon the Executive Government burdens heavier than they could well bear and responsibilities which they could not discharge, but would produce other evils greater than those which it is sought to remove. All such measures must therefore be dealt with with the utmost caution—for it is idle to say that we can by such means alone succeed in making a nation moral. Having made these few general remarks, I shall proceed to deal with the criticisms which have been passed on the details of the Bill—especially by the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Richmond). I had the advantage of hearing some of those criticisms before, because a deputation of licensed victuallers waited on me the other day, and pointed out a great many objections to which, in their opinion, the measure as it stands is open. It would be strange, indeed, if it were not liable to some objection, because a Bill of this kind is essentially one of details, in dealing with which we had frequently only a choice of difficulties. Some of the objections which have been advanced by the noble Duke I can, however, I think, show to be unfounded. He, in the first place, referred to what he regarded as an omission in the Bill, and gave us an account of what he supposed had passed in the Cabinet on the subject—but it is clear that account must be based on his experience of previous Cabinets. He said—and the objection was a very natural one—that although there was a clause in the Bill relating to the repeal of a great number of Acts, those Acts were not specified. That, however, is not due to any oversight on the part of the Government, because we have been assured by the drawer of the Bill that the proper time to supply the omission is when the Bill has passed through Committee, following the course which was pursued in the case of another important measure—the Bankruptcy Act. That is the simple reason why the Bill is in its present shape. The noble Duke also urged it as an objection against the Bill that it is not a Consolidating Bill, and I admit at once that it only consolidates the police regulations, which is, I may add, a very considerable work in itself. If your Lordships should adopt the clauses of the Bill, with such Amendments as you may deem desirable, I think we should, as regards the police regulations, accompanied by the repeal of such Acts as it may be necessary to repeal, have a complete code of such regulations. The noble Duke went on to comment on the 4th clause—and it is one, I freely admit, which deserves careful consideration. I am alluding to the clause which provides, in the case of certain offences on a license being recorded, that certain consequences shall follow without any discretion being left to any authority in the matter. The noble Duke pointed out that in certain cases such a provision might work hardly on the owners of houses, and the suggestion is one which is, in my opinion, worthy of attention. I would, however, remind the noble Duke that a similar provision exists in the Prevention of Crime Act, which provides for an absolute disqualification in the case of criminals after a certain number of offences—so that the principle is not a new one. It is, however, perhaps, desirable that the clause in the present Bill should be further guarded, and I will see whether it may not be possible to give the owner, in the case of a second conviction, the power of terminating the agreement with the occupier, so that his interests might be protected. I am, however, perfectly certain that without some stringent clause such as this you will be able to effect no really considerable reform of public-houses. The noble Duke, again, objects to the veto which is given by the Bill to the Secretary of State. It is, he says, extraordinary that such a provision should be introduced into it by the Government, inasmuch as no such provision was introduced by the Home Secretary into the Bill of last year. But I will remind the noble Duke that the principle has been since introduced in the Suspensory Bill, and that it has been found to work very well: it is, therefore, that it has been embodied in the present measure. The Bill will, no doubt, throw considerable impediments in the way of the granting of licenses. My Lords, I think that that is a very important object. It will require the concurrence of three separate authorities before any new license can be granted, and if there is to be uniformity of practice throughout the country, this veto of the Secretary of State is, I think, most desirable. But, at the same time, should the other authorities exercise the power vested in them prudently and wisely, so that there shall arise throughout the country a regularity and uniformity in the granting of licenses, the veto lodged with the Secretary of State becomes of very little importance. The noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) went on to find fault with the provision which establishes a special system of inspection on the ground that it would throw an additional burden on the local rates. Now, I am aware that this question of the adjustment of local and Imperial taxation is one of the utmost importance; but I ask the House whether it is possible to delay every measure of public utility until a controversy so extremely difficult is settled? Under the Bill we make use of the existing machinery in the case of the constabulary; and one of the duties of the constabulary now is to see that the public-houses are properly regulated, and all that is now proposed is to give the Secretary of State special power to see that proper officers are selected from the constabulary force generally who shall carry into effect the inspection of licensed houses. Without some such power it has been shown in practice that, whatever laws you pass, the inspection by the constabulary is to a very great extent a mere name, and nothing more. It is true the Bill gives special powers to the Secretary of State to see that this inspection is adequately carried out and to disallow the proportion of police expenses now contributed by the Treasury if those provisions are not complied with; but these provisions are absolutely necessary. The noble Duke referred to one omission from the Bill which had astonished him—the provision as to the removal of licenses. No doubt a provision on this subject was contained in the Bill introduced by my right hon. Friend, as well as in the Suspensory Act of last year. But the subject has since been fully and carefully considered by the Government. Something may, doubtless, be said in favour of a system of removal of licenses; but it seemed to us that the objections predominated. The original intention was to forbid the grant of new licenses altogether, and only allow licenses to be removed from one district where they were in excess of the wants of the population to another district where more were required. That would have been an exceedingly stringent provision. It might have recommended itself on its merits as far as removals were concerned; but if you allow the grant of new licenses, the result of permitting also the removal of licenses would be to incur great risk of perpetuating existing licenses, and of strengthening the proprietary right which the owners of them are assumed to possess. By such a system you make the license, as it were, a marketable commodity which may be conveyed from one part of the country to another; and our object in reducing the number of public-houses would be to a great extent defeated by allowing the abandonment of such houses in one district and the transfer of the licenses to another. We, therefore, thought that, upon the whole, it was better in the public interest not to introduce the principle of removals. Another point to which the noble Duke referred was the absence of minimum penalties in the Bill. Now, the existence of minimum penalties has been found in practice to work great hardship, and unless you entirely distrust the discretion of magistrates, it is far better to provide merely maximum penalties, leaving it to the magistrate to say how much of these penalties he will inflict according to his view of the gravity of the offence. Then the noble Duke alluded to what he seemed to think the almost diabolical invention of the placard system.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: I did not charge you with diabolical intentions.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: No—the noble Duke was, of course, referring to the clauses of the Bill. He seemed to think I had adopted it from some knowledge I had of the existence of a similar law in New Zealand. Now, I am ashamed to say that I was entirely ignorant of the existence of any such law in New Zealand; but I am glad to hear from the noble Duke that our fellow-countrymen in that colony have adopted so sensible a provision. The offence for which this punishment is prescribed is that of adulterating liquor with the articles mentioned in the Schedule. They are coccus indicus, copperas, opium, Indian hemp, strychnine, tobacco, daniel seed, extract of logwood, salts of zinc or lead, alum, and any extract or compound of any of the above ingredients. I think if a man commits an offence so grave as that of mixing drugs directly deleterious to health with the liquor he sells, it is a most appropriate punishment to enact that every person who goes to his house should know he has been guilty of that which really amounts to a crime. If it had been proposed that a publican should be obliged to expose such a placard if he supplied liquor to a drunken man or allowed drunkenness in his house, I should have said the regulation was an unfair one; but when applied to an offence, which, as I am assured, the publicans themselves regard as most grave—an offence which no respectable man would commit—I think it may be properly met by the punishment provided in the Bill. The noble Duke says that punishment is novel and un-English. My Lords, I cannot help thinking we should make it an English punishment and embody it in our law. The noble Duke behind me (the Duke of Somerset), while he thought that the measure was on the whole a good one, expressed surprise that it did not apply to retail licenses for selling spirits and wine held in conjunction with wholesale licenses. The exemption of these licenses from the provisions of a Licensing Bill is, however, no new principle, and I am prepared to maintain that the exemption is wise and proper. We are dealing here with a class of licensed houses which are found to be subject to great abuses.

It has not been found that the sale by wholesale dealers of wines and spirits in small quantities under their retail licenses has been a cause of abuse. I know there has been a strong movement on the part of the publicans to obtain these restrictions, and I see clearly why they desire them—the sale by wholesale dealers of liquor in small quantities interferes with the publican's monopoly, and therefore the publicans want to drive people into their own houses by means of restrictions which would make the holding of a retail license by a wholesale dealer impossible. Now, for my part, I think the present monopoly of the publicans is quite as great as it need be and ought to be, and therefore I think it would be undesirable to interfere with the retail licenses of wholesale dealers, and place them under these restrictions. On this ground I can hold out no expectation that we shall deal with these licenses in the way which the publicans desire. A great number of details have been alluded to, but most of them were minute, and I shall not weary your Lordships by commenting on them at this stage of the Bill: in Committee, however, I hope to make such explanations as will prove that the clauses have been well weighed, and are not proposed without reason. I may say, however, that in the clause to which the noble Duke refers, he will find the local authority duly defined. The Bill contains so many details that I fear it may present itself to many persons in an uninteresting light. But I agree with the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Peterborough) that important questions are involved in the Bill; it is a matter which deeply concerns the morals and health of the population as well as very large interests throughout the country. Your Lordships must not forget that, while we cannot but deplore the grievous effects that may be produced upon the people by the sale of intoxicating drinks, we are dealing with a trade of great magnitude. It may be the right course to maintain the sale of liquors as a monopoly, or it may be wiser to adopt the opposite course, and throw open the trade as the other trades of the country; but a monopoly we have to deal with, and whilst the Legislature ought not to press unduly and unfairly upon its present possessors, I hope your Lordships will sustain me in maintaining the right of Parliament to control and regulate the monopoly, and in protesting against the attempt of any one class in the country to prevent the Government from carrying into effect legislation in the interest of the public at large which is required for the welfare of the nation.

LORD KESTEVEN said, that a measure of this character was very generally required. In Peterborough, for instance, the number of public-houses was greatly in excess of the population. One-half of the licensed houses were opened for the sale of beer only; and as these licenses were granted, not by the magistrates, but by the Excise, at the request of the ratepayers living in the locality, it was singular that the right rev. Prelate should call upon the ratepayers to suppress an evil which they had themselves created.

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH explained that he did not propose that the ratepayers should act alone, but that they should merely assist the magistrates in granting licenses.

LORD KESTEVEN said, that whenever the magistrates and the police had endeavoured to restrict the number of public-houses and beershops in Peterborough by refusing to renew the license of any house, a large body of neighbouring ratepayers were sure to come forward and say that the House was conducted with the greatest order and propriety. The consequence was, that the action of the magistrates became futile by the very acts of the body which the right rev. Prelate wished to be incorporated with the magistrates. He ventured to think, then, that if such a body were incorporated with the magistrates they would neutralize the action of a much more independent body than themselves, and so perpetuate the evils that were deplored.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday, the 10th instant.

THE RUSSIAN WAR—BRITISH GRAVES IN THE CRIMEA.—QUESTION.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If his attention has been drawn to a Letter, which appeared in "The Times" of the 30th March, describing the disgraceful condition of the British Cemetery at Sebastopol; and, whether he has reason to believe that the statement is correct, and if it be so, whether the Government will take some measures to protect the graves of the Officers and Men who fell in the discharge of their duty from desecration?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, I have seen the letter referred to by the hon. Member, and from other evidence believe that the statement is in substance correct. Up to the middle of the year 1866 there had been a custodian of the graveyards, but in that year Colonel Gordon, who was then in charge, resigned his appointment in consequence of being obliged to return to active service. It is the intention of the War Department, with the consent and concurrence of the Foreign Office and the Treasury, to despatch two British officers to the Crimea to visit the cemetery and graves, and to report home as to their present condition and the best means for their preservation.

INDIA—CONVICTS AT THE ANDAMAN ISLANDS.—QUESTION.

MR. SALT asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the statement is correct that Ahmed Oolah, who was convicted as a leader in the Wahabee conspiracy about the year 1865, was in confinement at the Andaman Islands at the time of the assassination of Lord Mayo; that he had frequent opportunities of conversing with the other convicts; and that the Wahabee prisoners in the convict settlement have been able to hold regular communication with their friends in India?

MR. GRANT DUFF: In reply, Sir, to my hon. Friend, I regret to say that I have no means of answering his Questions categorically. The acting Viceroy has, however, sent Mr. Campbell, a very experienced judicial officer, to the Andaman Islands to make a full inquiry into their state, and when we receive his report we shall, no doubt, be in a position to state which are true and which are false of the many rumours current.

METROPOLIS—SUNDAY OBSERVANCE—THE SHEEPSHANKS GALLERY. QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether Her Majesty's Government have considered the memorial recently presented by deputations from public meetings held in London, praying them to carry out the wish of the late Mr. Sheepshanks that his pictures should be exhibited on Sundays?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the House was doubtless aware that the Sheepshanks' collection of pictures was at the South Kensington Museum. It was quite true that Mr. Sheepshanks, when he made that most generous gift to the nation, expressed a wish that the pictures should be shown to the public on Sunday afternoons; but this was not a condition of the gift, as Mr. Sheepshanks was aware at the time that, according to the existing regulations, the pictures could not be so shown. Deputations had waited on the Marquess of Ripon and himself (Mr. Forster) in reference to this subject, and at several meetings held in London a desire was expressed that the South Kensington Museum should be opened on Sundays. This, however, brought up a very important question, which applied not only to the South Kensington Museum, but to the British Museum also. Without expressing any personal opinion on the subject, he might state that the Marquess of Ripon brought it under the notice of the Government, who did not think they were at present warranted in taking steps for opening those Museums on Sundays.

THE ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS—THE FINSBURY ESTATE.

QUESTIONS.

MR. CARTER asked the honourable Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Thomas Acland), Whether it is true, as stated in "The Times" newspaper on the 30th of March, that many of the houses on the Finsbury Estate belonging to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners are in such a filthy and dilapidated state that they are unfit for human habitation; whether 120 of these houses have been closed by order of the sanitary authorities of the district; whether (supposing these reports to be correct) the Commissioners are taking such steps as will effectually remove this state of things; and, further, whether the alleged condition, so far as paving and cleansing is concerned, of Willow Street, Charlotte Street, Paradise Street, and other streets on this estate is to be attributed to carelessness and neglect on the part of the local authorities of the district, or to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners?

SIR THOMAS ACLAND: Sir, the statement in The Times of the 30th of March as to the state of the Commissioners' property is not correct; but it is true that when the property came under their management at Christmas, 1867, it was in an extremely bad condition. Immediately after the Commissioners obtained possession of the property they engaged workmen to cleanse and repair such cottages as were capable of being maintained, either for a short time or permanently, and to remove buildings that were dangerous. Many cottages were removed by agreement with the parties to whom agreements for leases were granted, as part of the terms of such leases. It would have been inexpedient to remove so many poor in a short space of time without other buildings being provided. To obviate this, the Commissioners encouraged the erection of model dwellings, and the result of their dealing with their property in the parish of St. Leonard's, Shoreditch, may be shortly stated as follows:—About 750 cottages stood upon the property; upwards of 600 are removed. About 20 more are under agreement for removal, some others will follow, and the remainder have been repaired. On part of the land cleared about 500 new convenient residences have been erected; others are in course of erection. In all, about 100 more are agreed to be erected. On other parts of the land cleared of old buildings, a church, schools, and two parsonage houses have been erected. Other improvements are still in progress. With regard to the question whether 120 houses have been closed by order of the authorities of the district, no such orders have been addressed to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, nor to their officers. They are aware that proceedings were taken against lessees under them in respect of some cottages; but at that time those lessees were under covenant to remove the cottages, and the Commissioners were taking steps to enforce that covenant for the removal. They are now removed. The paving and cleansing of the streets is wholly under the charge of the local authorities, and no responsibility in that respect rests upon the Commissioners. I desire to state that if any hon. Members wish to satisfy themselves as to what the public spirit of an individual or the energy of a particular corporation can do in the way of substituting, as a matter of business, wholesome dwellings for the poor in one of the worst parts of London, they ought to visit the Finsbury Estate, where they will see that which will give them hopes for their country. I have seen some photographs of the property as it existed before and as it exists now, and with your permission, Sir, I will place them in the Library for inspection.

MR. FLOYER: Are the 500 houses, which the hon. Baronet mentions as being built, suitable for artisans and the working classes?

SIR THOMAS ACLAND: I believe they are. I have seen some of them, and I believe they are let at the average rate of 2s. per room. Wages in that part of London are considerable, and I have met with several artisans who are living in these lodgings.

TICHBORNE v. LUSHINGTON—PROSECUTION OF THE "CLAIMANT" FOR PERJURY.—QUESTION.

MR. MELLOR asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Government intends to prosecute at the public expense the person calling himself Tichborne for perjury; and, if so, whether he is prepared to lay before the House an Estimate of the probable cost of such prosecution, and to take a previous Vote of the House upon it?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: It is, Sir, the intention of the Government to prosecute, at the public expense, the person calling himself Tichborne for perjury. He is also committed for forgery. The hon. Member asks me to lay upon the Table an Estimate of the probable expense of such prosecution. I should be very glad to do so; but I am told that it is impossible to form any estimate or give any information on the subject; therefore, I must decline to do so under the circumstances, and as to those Gentlemen who think I am too diffident in making estimates, I would refer them to their own experience.

MR. MELLOR: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the latter part of my Question. As the amount required will probably be very large, I wish to know whether the right hon. Gentleman will take a previous Vote of the House upon it?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: If I spend the money first, I do not see how I can take a previous Vote upon it.

NAVY—CHANNEL SQUADRON.

QUESTION.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether, if it be true, as is reported, that the Channel Squadron is to go round the coasts of the United Kingdom during the summer and autumn, he will permit it to visit Lough Foyle?

MR. GOSCHEN said, in reply, that he was unable to give a pledge that the Channel Squadron would visit any particular locality, as the cruise of the Squadron had not yet been determined upon. He was, therefore, unable to say whether the inhabitants of the district immediately surrounding Lough Foyle would be able to carry out the hospitable intentions which he believed they entertained.

ARMY. OFFICERS—PRESENTATIONS AT COURT.—QUESTION.

MR. H. A. HERBERT asked the Secretary of State for War, If his attention has been drawn to a Regulation by the Lord Chamberlain which forbids the name of the Regiment, or Corps in some cases, being announced at Court, in addition to the name of the officer, on presentation to Her Majesty, and so making a distinction between the officers of the different branches of the auxiliary forces and those of the Regular Army, although they, like the latter, hold Her Majesty's commission; and, if he would endeavour to have the Regulation reconsidered?

MR. CARDWELL, in answer, said, he could only repeat the Reply he had previously given to a similar Question—"The Regulations for the Queen's Courts are not within his province, but depended upon the commands of Her Majesty, and were carried out under the direction of the Lord Chamberlain."

ARMY—EQUIPMENT OF THE ARMY. QUESTION.

SIR JOHN GRAY asked the Controller General, If he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House the following documents:—Copies of a Letter written to the Adjutant General, Horse Guards, by Colonel Ponsonby, then commanding 1st Battalion Grenadier Guards, applying for permission to have a renewed and proper trial of Lieutenant Colonel Carter's equipment with the new Valise Equipment; and the Reply; of the Application made by Colonel the Honourable Percy Fielding, C.B., commanding Coldstream Guards, for permission to try the said equipments, and the Recommendation of the same by Major General Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar; and the Reply; and, a detailed Statement of the various articles (under the head of Equipment), and the amount of ammunition (showing how distributed), each soldier will have to carry during war, together with a List of the Regiments which wore the new Valise Equipment at the Autumn Manœuvres; specifying whether any, and which, of those Regiments failed in wearing this equipment as intended during war, with the particulars of the cause of any omissions?

SIR HENRY STORKS: Sir, it is not considered desirable to give the Correspondence referred to in the Question of my hon. Friend. The equipment of the Army was adopted, after mature consideration, on the recommendation of a most competent Board of Officers, and experience has shown that the present valise equipment is well suited to the service. I may add that a voluminous Correspondence as regards Lieutenant Colonel Carter and his proposed knapsack has been already laid on the Table of the House, on the Motion of the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Candlish). I consider the question settled, and do not think any further expense should be incurred in printing Correspondence on the subject.

ARMY—CASHEL BARRACKS. QUESTION.

MR. STACPOOLE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been called to the state of the barracks at Cashel, as described in a letter published in "The United Service Gazette" of the 30th March last; whether the statements in that letter are accurate as to the condition of the barracks; if they are, whether he will direct the next training of the North Tipperary Militia to be held at Clonmel or Nenagh, where ample barrack accommodation can be afforded them; and, whether it is his intention to fill up the second majority now vacant in that regiment, and when?

MR. CARDWELL, in reply, said, his attention was not drawn to the letter referred to in the Question of his hon. Friend until Notice of the Question was given. He had made a reference to Ireland in order to obtain an answer on the subject. With regard to the second portion of his hon. Friend's Question, he begged to say that it was intended to fill up the second majority now vacant in the North Tipperary Militia, and the question of who should be appointed was now under consideration.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.
 TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA).
 THE INDIRECT CLAIMS.
 CORRESPONDENCE.—QUESTION.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I am unwilling to press Her Majesty's Government unnecessarily or unfairly with any inquiry respecting the Geneva Arbitration; but the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government will, I am sure, recollect that on last Tuesday week my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. G. Hardy), on my behalf, preferred an inquiry of a distinct character upon that subject. He asked, Whether Her Majesty's Government would undertake that there should be no further proceedings before the Arbitrators of Geneva until the Indirect Claims were given up by the Government of the United States? The right hon. Gentleman then said he declined to answer that Question until after the receipt of the Despatch, which was then hourly expected. We have since had information that the Despatch has been received by Her Majesty's Government, and I venture now to make an inquiry, which I believe the public feeling demands—namely, Whether the right hon. Gentleman, being in possession of the Despatch, will now give a direct answer to the Question, which, as I have said, was asked by my right hon. Friend?

MR. GLADSTONE: The Question, Sir, of the right hon. Gentleman has anticipated a statement which it was my intention to make. There is just one very slight inaccuracy in the recital of the right hon. Gentleman which I wish to correct. I think he said—I do not know whether intentionally or not—that I had already stated we were in possession of a Despatch from America in answer to Lord Granville's Note of the 20th of March. That is not so. What I said was that we had just learnt that the American Minister was in possession of the answer, and that he had not been able to inform us precisely when it would come into the hands of Her Majesty's Government. That is not the state of facts now. A copy of the Despatch was received by Lord Granville yesterday afternoon from the Minister of the United States, and it has been considered by the Cabinet to-day. And, Sir, as far as the contents of that Despatch are concerned, there is nothing in the Despatch that would have led us to ask, or that would have warranted us in asking, for further forbearance on the part of Parliament in withholding the Papers of the Correspondence which has taken place from immediate publication. There are, however, known to us grounds for the hope that a settlement of the entire matter may be arrived at of a character which would be satisfactory, as we are well assured, to both countries. Under these circumstances, we trust that Parliament will approve our postponing for a short time, on the specific ground which I have now stated, the production of the Papers. I do not venture to specify the number of days over which this postponement should extend; but I have no doubt the delay will be very short.

PARLIAMENT—WHITSUNTIDE RECESS.
 QUESTION.

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman a Question of which he had not given Notice, but which was of great interest to the House. He wished to know on what day they were to commence the fortnight of holiday which was promised at Whitsuntide?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, there never was a fortnight promised; but it was promised that the holiday should approximate to a fortnight. All these promises are necessarily contingent, to a certain degree, upon the progress of Public Business, and in the answer I am about to make I shall speak on the assumption—a very simple one, I think—that the proceedings in Committee on the Ballot Bill will be brought to a termination this evening. It may also be convenient that I should refer to the Report on the Bill. It probably will not be the wish of the House to consider the Report so early as Monday next; but we hope it will be practicable to dispose of it on this night week, in which case I should be able on the following Monday to move that the House, at its rising, adjourn until that day fortnight.

PARLIAMENTARY AND MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS BILL.

First Schedule.

MR. CHARLEY moved, as an Amendment, that the words "or by inability to read" be inserted in the 24th Rule, after the words "incapacitated by blindness or any other physical cause," page 19, line 25. The hon. and learned Member said, that this Amendment did not raise a party question. The Bill, as it stood, would disfranchise, he believed, more Liberals than Conservatives. His object was to mitigate the severity of its disfranchising clauses. The Amendment was not nearly so sweeping in its scope as the Amendment of the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith), which was discussed on Monday night. That Amendment enabled all persons incapacitated by any cause to appeal to the presiding officer for assistance. His Amendment only extended this privilege to persons "incapacitated by inability to read." He objected to the Bill as it stood, because it would disfranchise the very persons whom it was designed to protect. Illiterate voters were generally dependent, and the object of the Bill was to protect dependent voters. What a mockery to say to these dependent voters—"We will protect you by enabling you to vote secretly," when, at the same time, they, in effect, told them—"We will make the mechanical process of recording your vote so difficult that you won't be able to understand it, and therefore will be practically disfranchised." Were they prepared to take away with one hand what they gave with the other? Under the existing system the illiterate voter could, at all events, record his vote. Suppose there were 15 per cent who were dependent voters, and 10 of them could not read; were they prepared to disfranchise the 10 for the sake of protecting the remaining five? But then, it was said, the presiding officers would falsify the vote. Well, the Bill gave the Returning Officer absolute power of rejecting votes for invalidity. If the right hon. Gentleman could trust the Returning Officer, why not trust the presiding officers? There was only one Returning Officer, but many presiding officers, and, in his opinion, the danger of corruption would be diminished by spreading the power and responsibility over a large surface. And what was the remedy proposed by the right hon. Gentleman to obviate the disfranchisement of voters unable to read? That the names of the candidates were to be distinguished by numbers; but the illiterate voter would know as little about 1, 2, 3, as he did of A, B, C. Indeed, at school, A, B, C, was taught before 1, 2, 3. And what was there to prevent the voter who could not read from holding the ballot paper upside down, and trying to decipher it the wrong way? There was another point to which, before sitting down, he wished to allude. By this Bill they were imposing a new educational test. The hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Clay), on Monday last, referred to a Bill which he introduced and withdrew in 1866—a Bill by which it was proposed to give the franchise in boroughs to those who satisfied a certain educational test. It was an enfranchising Bill, and was therefore much better than this Bill, which was a disfranchising measure. The right hon. Gentleman now at the head of the Government was Chancellor of the Exchequer when the Bill was before the House, and in moving its rejection he said—

"In the Scotch Church there is the phrase 'fencing the tables,' used by way of describing the means taken to prevent persons not properly prepared from taking part in sacred rites. My hon. Friend, I must admit, has fenced his tables very well, and the sacred rite of the franchise is not likely to be intruded upon by too many labouring men. I think my hon. Friend has totally overlooked all considerations of human feeling. In my opinion the labouring classes—the mass of the English people—would rise with dissatisfaction—I will not use a stronger word—against those enactments which my hon. Friend proposes to establish in connection with what he calls a boon, but to which he has given a very different character by this Bill. My hon. Friend proposes to burden the people with conditions of time and the observance of a multitude of forms from which the whole of us are free. And let us remember that the observance of minute particulars and dates with regard to notices and documents, and going backwards and forwards, are annoying even to such as are in our station of life, and would become almost impossible of observance by persons of a certain station. . . . My hon. Friend might, for any use the Bill will be to them, put a cipher at its head, and substitute a cipher for every one of its clauses. . . . In my opinion, no method has yet been suggested of making any educational test practically available in regard to the franchise. . . . Regarding the amount of accomplishment and knowledge required, the cumbrous difficulty—practically, the almost impossible nature—of the process my hon. Friend requires these, I must say, unfortunate people to go through, I contend that his Bill is unsound in principle, and that it would be inoperative and even offensive in practice.”—[3 Hansard, clxxxiii. 1484-6-7.]

The present First Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. Goschen), speaking against the same Bill, said—

“It combines the maximum of Liberal profession with the minimum of Liberal result.”—[Ibid. 1499.]

The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) also opposed the Bill, and in the course of his remarks, said—

“The idea of education, in the sense of reading, writing, and arithmetic—and I know not what other branches of knowledge may at some time be added—seems to me to be almost puerile in considering this question. . . . The Bill might admit a large number of young men from 21 to 25 or 30 years of age. Now, I have no objection to young men; but I think a system of franchise which said to the great bulk of the existing working men of England—‘Whilst your boys of 21 shall be admitted to the franchise under this Bill, you, their fathers, because in your time education was not so common, shall not be admitted, although it may be that you have brought up those very boys in the position in which they are now’—I say a Bill like that would be wholly contrary to the constitution of the country, and would be grossly insulting to the great body of the working classes.”—[Ibid. 1513-17.]

All the passages he had quoted were equally applicable to this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman, in his Education Act, had provided the means for educating the rising generation; but the opportunities so afforded could be of no avail to the existing generation of working-class voters, and it was unfair first to fine and imprison the fathers if they did not send their children to school, and to punish them also by disfranchisement for not having themselves been properly educated. To defraud the working classes of the extended franchise given to them in 1867 by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) was a policy on the part of the Prime Minister which might, indeed, be correctly described as combining the “maximum of Liberal profession with the minimum of Liberal result.” The hon. Member concluded by moving his Amendment.

MR. ELLICE believed that the object of the Bill was not to regulate or limit the franchise, but merely to protect the voter in its independent exercise. An evening or two since he had interposed because it seemed to him that the clause, as understood and explained by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Forster), would have a very prejudicial effect upon a considerable number of voters in the Northern part of Scotland. That position was controverted by his right hon. Friend. He (Mr. Ellice) spoke at that time in general terms, and without any precise data; consequently, he was not prepared to state the exact effect which the Bill would have in the part of the country he had referred to. Since then he had been in communication with gentlemen well acquainted with the Highlands, and who were specially conversant with the condition of the population of Invernessshire, in many parts of which the English language was imperfectly known, and he now wished to call the attention of his right hon. Friend for a moment to the two polling districts of Inverness and Fort William. The district of Inverness was, including the town of Inverness, somewhat thickly populated, and contained a large number of voters. Fort William, on the other hand, had a very sparse and scanty population and a small number of voters; but the two taken together might very fairly represent the average condition of the Northern part of Scotland. After he made the statement which was controverted, he telegraphed to parties upon whom he could thoroughly depend, and he begged to assure the House that there could be no possible bias in the information which he received in reply. What he asked for was the number of voters who it was supposed would be unable to deal with the ballot papers as proposed under this Bill, and the reply he received was—

“In the town of Inverness and its vicinity nearly all are able; in the upper parishes one quarter unable; in some parishes a higher rate unable.”

With respect to Fort William, he had his information from the Sheriff, who would be the Returning Officer. He was a gentleman well known to most gentlemen in the Highlands, exceedingly well acquainted with the whole district, and he said—

“There are 236 voters in my district; of whom 88 are Gaelic, and not able to deal with ballot papers without assistance.”

Now, upon this showing, it was plain that under the provisions of the Bill, unless modified to meet these peculiar circumstances, one-fourth, at least, would be disabled from voting in one district, and one-third in another. Taking them together, rather more than one-fourth would be practically disfranchised by the Bill as it now stood, unless some assistance was given to the voter. He did not think that that could have occurred to his right hon. Friend, who, he believed, was actuated by an earnest and honest desire to give the country a good Bill. They had arrived at a stage of the measure at which he (Mr. Ellice) thought that if there were reasonable grounds shown for the re-consideration of this Schedule, his right hon. Friend would not be indisposed to adopt an Amendment. It was a serious matter that in a Bill to protect the independence of voters, clauses were inserted which, in all probability, would tend to disfranchise a large number of them. They were going to create a complicated machinery, which, he was satisfied, that a large number of uneducated voters in various districts of the country would, without help, not know how to deal with. In all probability they would make a complete mess of the paper, or else they would not vote at all. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would take the matter into consideration, with a view of proposing some clause which might be brought upon the Report, to provide against the contingency he had referred to. The Bill, as it stood, would practically take away votes which Parliament had deliberately conferred, and whether this was done directly or indirectly, and whether the number of persons disfranchised was one or a thousand, the principle involved was the same, and ought not to be countenanced.

MR. SYNAN said, he had an Amendment on the Paper of a more practical character than that under consideration. He was not disposed to give to the presiding officer the power of determining whether a man could read or write, or even to read only, and therefore proposed that he should act only on the production of a declaration to the effect that the voter applying to him could not read, and required his assistance. It was impossible to exaggerate the importance of the point in dispute. Out of 1,540,148 adult males in Ireland, 816,000 could not read. The county of Cork, which was a model county in the matter of education, had a male population of upwards of 200,000, of whom 64,000 could not read and write—say nearly half the adult male population. The constituency numbered 16,000, and perhaps a quarter of those forming it could not read and write. If they numbered only 2,000, that was far too many to disfranchise by the Bill. Suppose the defect were not remedied, what would be the consequence? The landlord's agent would try to coach the voter by telling him that all the names would be printed one below the other, and that he was to make his mark against the first and second. But the man might say he could not count. Then the agent would tell him to put his fingers down the side against his names, and to put his mark against the name upon which his third and little finger rested. The voter would naturally ask for a paper to see how this was to be done, but of course this was forbidden. So he would go into the polling-place, and, being unable to read, he would be as likely as not to turn the paper upside down, and placing his fingers on the names, would mark the names upon which his third and little fingers rested, which would chance to be the third and fourth names, and the priest's candidates instead of the landlord's. Again, if they reversed the order of things, and supposing the voter to be coached by the priest or by the agent of the popular candidate, the voter would be as likely to vote for landlords' candidate as for the one he supported. Again, he was as likely to mark it in some wrong place or in some informal manner. By this means one-half or three-fourths of the votes of the ignorant voters would be misapplied or thrown away. It might be said they should not have votes. [Mr. RYLANDS: Hear!] If so, let the House act honestly, and pass a Bill disfranchising the ignorant. It was scarcely possible to secure absolute secrecy in regard to the vote of the illiterate voter, who was as much in need of assistance as the blind voter, for whom they had provided help. Either exclude the illiterate voter from the voting compartment, or, if they admitted them, permit the officer to give them the directions he stood in need of.

MR. LIDDELL said, he thought the hon. Member for St. Andrews (Mr. Ellice) had added a very valuable contribution to the common sense arguments by which that question ought to be decided. But it was not in the Highlands of Scotland, nor in the wilds of Galway alone, that persons were found who could not write. Scores and scores of excellent and industrious English workmen were fully competent to exercise the elective franchise, although they could not read or perform the mechanical act of writing, and common justice required that they should have proper facilities given them for voting. If the House wished to lay down an educational standard for the voter, let them say so; but they ought not to disfranchise by indirect means that class of voters. The two great arguments adduced for the Ballot were that it was easy and convenient, and that it would protect the poor and dependent voter. But they were now going practically to deprive the poor voter of his vote altogether by refusing him assistance in filling up his ballot paper. He would not, until he saw it, believe that the Liberal Members of that House would take such a course. The Amendment before them was a practical one, and he trusted it would commend itself to the good sense of the Committee.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that they were not considering this question in a party spirit, but they were seeking so to deal with the principle of secret voting as to cause the least inconvenience to the voters. He quite agreed that they ought not to make the Ballot Bill a means of imposing an educational standard. If it were intended to take that step it ought to be done by positive enactment. It was never meant by the Government, nor would the House permit, that the Ballot should be employed in order to disqualify persons who could not read or write. The hon. Member for St. Andrews (Mr. Ellice) had given them some figures, which had considerable force, as everything which came from him had; but it was rather doubtful whether the question had been quite fairly brought before his friends in the North, and whether many of the people referred to were persons who were unable to read English or who could not read at all. However, there were, no doubt, a great many people in England who could not read; but he could not help thinking that they were now rather overrating their numbers, and also underrating the ability of such persons to get over that difficulty as to their votes. He maintained that the form of the voting-paper itself, the fact that that form would be known, and the additional fact that there would be hundreds of people who would tell the illiterate elector what was the meaning of the voting paper, would make it easy for every English, Irish, or Scotch elector of average sense to solve the question whether he should vote for the top, the bottom, or the middle name on the list of candidates. An ordinary artisan, whether he could read and write or not, knew very well whether one brick was above or below another. Hon. Members seemed to forget that there was something in Clause 4 that prescribed the duty of the presiding officer. Though there was a prohibition as to obtaining information as to the person for whom the vote was given, there was nothing to prevent the presiding officer answering necessary questions. A voter might ask the presiding officer—"Which is the way in which I am to hold the paper; which is the top and which is the bottom?" There was no difficulty upon that point. What the presiding officer was prohibited from doing was finding out how the voter had marked his paper. If there were no objections to giving the presiding officer the proposed power of helping illiterate voters, the Government would be glad to do so; but if they invested him with such a large power they would probably create a great want of confidence throughout the country. The mere possession of that power on his part would perhaps do more mischief than any actual misuse of it. The hon. Member (Mr. Charley) asked him whether he could not provide some machinery which would meet all these difficulties; but he need scarcely inform him that a great part of the labour he had gone through in reference to this measure had been that of considering the various plans which had been laid before him by which it was proposed that these difficulties should be overcome, and he must honestly say that he could not hold out any hope of hitting upon any plan better than that proposed by the Bill. In consequence of a suggestion that had appeared in a morning journal that all the inhabitants of England should do their best to aid him (Mr. Forster) in finding out the best method of taking votes by ballot, he had been overwhelmed by proposals, some certainly of the most ingenious description, but all equally impracticable. One most remarkable piece of machinery proposed would not take more than one ball from one voter, and would, in a manner, spit up a second if there were an attempt to introduce it; at the same time, it counted the number of balls on each side, and appeared to meet every difficulty that had been anticipated in the working of the ballot. It was impossible, however, that such complicated machinery could be used by thousands of presiding officers and by millions of electors without there being great danger of its getting out of order either by accident or wilful act, and thus vitiating the election, and under these circumstances it would, in his opinion, be most inexpedient to adopt it, more especially as the Committee were not likely to sanction the substitution of the ball ballot for the voting paper ballot. He merely alluded to this subject in justification of himself, as he was anxious to show that he had closely looked into these various suggestions, and had not thrown them aside without having examined them. It had been stated that voting papers were a novelty, but that statement was inaccurate, because they had been used in all municipal and local elections in this country, and had been adopted in every part of the world where the Ballot was in force, except in Greece. He should gladly accept the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Charley), if he (Mr. Forster) did not think that they should be exposing themselves to a much greater danger by accepting it, and if he did not honestly believe that the plan they proposed was sufficiently clear to enable a voter with common sense, even though he should be unable to read, to record his vote.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that the right hon. Gentleman founded his opposition to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Charley) on the experience of those countries where the Ballot obtained; but he must remind him that in all the Australian Colonies, to which such frequent reference was made, means were provided for taking the votes of illiterate persons analogous to those proposed by the hon. Member. He thought that the right hon. Gentleman was bound to provide such machinery for taking the votes as would prevent any person who was enfranchised by the Act of 1867 from being practically disfranchised. All Englishmen on whom the Legislature had conferred the franchise ought to be encouraged to give their votes, whether or not they could read or write. The right hon. Gentleman said that by the Bill as framed a man who could not read would be entitled to receive that amount of assistance which would enable him to vote. But if a presiding officer answered any other question than that which the right hon. Gentleman suggested, he would be guilty of a misdemeanour. Was that a position to put the presiding officer into? Again, what sort of question was likely to be addressed to the presiding officer, when he was asked for assistance by a man who could not read? Was it not very likely to be—"Where am I to put my mark for Jones?" The speech of the right hon. Gentleman appeared to be really worth nothing at all. He protested against the clause as it stood, and unless some such Amendment as that proposed was carried it would practically disfranchise a very considerable portion of those on whom the Legislature had conferred the privilege of the franchise.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he thought the effect of the clause would be to disfranchise a large number of voters, and to lead to such confusion in the manner in which the votes were delivered, that the Bill would require to be remodelled in the course of another year. His right hon. Friend suggested that a voter who could not read might take counsel from the Returning Officer; but had he ever seen how even half-learned persons came to behave when they required to put their names on paper? If the Committee wished to get votes of illiterate people recorded, some means must be devised by which they might give their votes without the confusion which the clause threatened, and which might vitiate either the election or a large number of votes.

MR. RAIKES said, he could not understand why the Government should not adopt the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Charley), seeing that the Bill had already provided that where a voter had, through inadvertence, improperly marked his voting paper, he could apply to the Returning Officer for a fresh paper.

MR. DODSON pointed out an ambiguity which appeared to arise in connection with the Amendment before the Committee. The Amendment, by proposing to insert the four words "by inability to read," classed a man who was unable to read as equally and absolutely incapacitated with the man who was blind or paralyzed. And the sub-section so amended would be open to the interpretation that a man who was unable to read was to be held to be absolutely incapacitated, and be bound to apply to have his vote marked by the presiding officer. It seemed to him that the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member could not be adopted, as it would give rise to that ambiguity. Effect would be better given to the intention of the Mover of it by adopting the Amendment of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan). And he would also alter the Amendment of the hon. Member for Limerick, by making it so run that the voter who could not read should have the option of applying to the presiding officer to mark his paper for him, accompanying his application with a declaration that he was unable to read.

COLONEL BERESFORD, in supporting the Amendment, referred to an instance in which great confusion, and even a riot, had arisen in consequence of the voters being called upon to make marks opposite the names of the candidates. Four-fifths of the voters on that occasion did not succeed in voting at all.

CAPTAIN GROSVENOR admitted that the number of illiterate voters was likely to decrease; but he thought some provision was necessary for them. He regretted that the right hon. Gentleman could not accept the Amendment. He would have no option but to vote in its favour. Against the evidence brought forward in support of it they had nothing but the unsupported assertions of the right hon. Gentleman. The necessity for it would, no doubt, be greatly diminished in time; and though the statesman was bound to keep one eye upon the future, it was no less binding upon him to keep the other eye upon the present.

MR. NEWDEGATE remarked that they had been told that this Bill had been introduced and pressed forward for two Sessions, not for the sake of the great bulk of the constituency, but for those unhappy electors who laboured under a difficulty in the free expression of their votes. Now, the Bill itself interposed a difficulty in the way of that class of voters who could not read, and it was inevitable that some one should assist them to give their vote unless some ingenious contrivance was adopted by which they might inform themselves. In criminal cases a highly efficacious method had been introduced of identifying persons who had committed a great offence. They were photographed, and he ventured to suggest that a photograph of the candidates should be affixed to their names, for the benefit of those who could not read their ballot paper. The whole Bill was a sarcasm on the alleged incompetency of the mass of constituencies to vote freely, and on Members of the House, to whom it imputed that they had been returned by, if not accessory to, a system of intimidation.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he did not rise for the purpose of repeating the arguments he had used. He thought the Committee, after their decision on Monday on the somewhat broader Amendment of the the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith), could not accept the present proposal. Were it adopted, the presiding officer would either make an inquiry into the educational state of the voter applying for his paper to be filled up, which would involve delay, or would, on his mere statement, fill it up, which would throw a large power into his hands. He admitted, however, that a good deal of sympathy had been shown by the Committee for the position of these persons, and he believed he should carry out the views of the majority if he stated that the Government were prepared to some extent to meet the case. He was willing, with verbal alterations, to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan).

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON said, he was surprised that the Government, after secret voting had been done away with by two divisions, each resulting in a majority against them, should have offered any objection to such an Amendment as this. The strongest objections to the clause in its present shape had come from their own side of the House, and 11 speakers had all favoured the Amendment. He had a right, therefore, to say that the Government had been compelled to yield because their own side would not support them in a clause which he would describe as iniquitous. As to the large power which the Amendment would confer on the presiding officer, why did not the right hon. Gentleman put that forward as an objection in the case of a similar concession which he had made to the Jews? He had acceded to the proposal that if the election occurred on a Saturday the officers should fill up the papers for the Jews, though in London, no doubt, there would be a very large number of them. Surely, then, as much should be done for Christians who could not fill up their papers from not being able to read. He was perfectly certain the people of England would appreciate this Bill when it came before them. Government showed their apprehension of this by not daring to take the sense of the people upon it. He believed that this Bill was repugnant to the feelings of the people of England, as it was to the majority of the Members of the House, and that the Government dared not put it to the test of having their opinions recorded. They had refused to give way and had been beaten; again they had refused to yield until pressed and squeezed by their own supporters, when they gave way to avoid another defeat; and now, after refusing to give way to the Opposition, they had yielded to their own supporters, not because the proposal was fair and just, but because of the quarter whence the pressure came. This was an unfair Bill, and it would be unworkable without alteration.

MR. ELLICE said, he stated at first that the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Charley) would require to be modified in some such way as that suggested by the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) met his view completely, and he should think it would also meet that of the hon. and learned Member for Salford, to whom he would put it, therefore, whether it would not be better to withdraw his Amendment and accept the offer made on the part of the Government.

Sir George Jenkinson

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he hoped the hon. and learned Member for Salford would yield to the appeal just made to him; and in reply to the remarks just made he would say that the position of a person in charge of a Bill was not an enviable one. If he refused to yield on a point which was important, he was called obstinate; if he yielded on one that was not vital, he was called squeezable; and in regard to details it was the business of a person in charge of a Bill to ascertain, if he could, the opinions on both sides of the House, and to give effect to them, so far as he could, consistently with the principle of the Bill. He had come to the conclusion that the general feeling of the Committee was that some provision should be made for persons who could not read and write, and although he was not convinced, he thought it unwise to waste time and resist that conclusion.

MR. DISRAELI said, he had no fault whatever to find with the conduct of the Government in reference to the Bill. As he understood it, they accepted the proposal of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan), and therefore he would recommend the hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Charley) not to press his Amendment; but he should like a clear understanding of the situation. If the proposition of the hon. Member for Limerick was to be adopted, it should be adopted at once—[Mr. W. E. Forster: Quite so]—and without alteration, so that the Committee would know at once what was the decision it had arrived at.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly fair. The only alteration he would make in the Amendment would be to retain the words relating to the declaration and omit those at the end of the Amendment relating to perjury.

MR. JAMES said, he wished to say one or two words before this bargain became a contract. He protested against the proposition being accepted without there being time for full consideration. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) was fatal to secrecy, and it would give to one individual a power which would be objectionable to every friend of the Ballot. Of course, the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) cheerfully accepted it; but he was surprised that the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill did not ask for time to consider it. According to that Amendment, the voter, before he went to the poll, would have to make a declaration which any corruptor or intimidator could make for him; and he would take this declaration with him to the Returning Officer, upon whom there would be no check, and who could therefore give such vote as he liked. The voter would be unable to tell which way the vote was given, for if he were able to tell he would be able to vote for himself. If there were no check on the Returning Officer, he would have the power of disposing of the vote of every illiterate voter; and however honourable a man he might be, there would be sure to be a portion of the constituency who would suspect him. If the Amendment were to be accepted, why should not the vote be recorded in the presence of a third person? If an agent were objected to, let the voter take a friend in whom he had confidence. If this fatal step were to be taken, against the taking of which he protested, do not let them invest the presiding officer with the power of giving votes. He would ask the Committee not to be led away now, but to take time to consider whether the Amendment of the hon. Member for Limerick would not make the Bill worse than useless.

MR. RYLANDS wished to say that the discussion on the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Charley) had been one-sided, inasmuch as the speakers on the Government side of the House sat above the gangway, and the supporters of the Ballot sat below the gangway. For one, he did not hesitate to adopt every word which had just fallen from the hon. and learned Member (Mr. James), and to say that the adoption of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) would strike fatally at the object of the Bill. It would give an immense control over the illiterate voters to the Returning Officer; and although he might be respectable and trustworthy, it should not be forgotten that his deputy was generally merely an attorney's clerk. Under the clause of the hon. Member for Limerick, he would undertake to contest the constituency against him if he could fee the deputy Returning Officers handsomely, and he should be confident of the result, always assuming that the hon. Member did not outbid him. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman would hesitate before he accepted this Amendment on the recommendation of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli), as by doing so he would give the Ballot a stab which he believed it would not survive.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, his hon. Friend must be aware that he had no intention of accepting the present Amendment. He had some cause to complain of the remarks of his hon. Friend, and of the hon. and learned Gentleman who preceded him. The hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands) stated that the ball went from one side of the House to the other, and that a fatal blow against the Ballot had been struck on both sides. But surely the hon. Gentleman and those who agreed with him ought to have interposed and caught the ball. The feeling of the Committee certainly was that this alteration ought to be made, and although he did not conceal the fact that he did not like it, he must altogether deny that it would be such an evil as the hon. Member for Warrington imagined. He might mention that no one was a more ardent supporter of the Ballot than the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke), who nevertheless declared before to the Committee his preference for the Victorian plan, which authorized the presiding officer to fill up the papers of voters who were unable to read and write. Ever since he had to deal with the Ballot he felt this was a very difficult question, and that strong arguments might be advanced on either side. He had put it to deputations of working men, and had by no means got a conclusive answer as to their feelings upon the matter, the answer being sometimes one way and sometimes the other. The hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) was himself a very strong supporter of the Ballot, and what he (Mr. Forster) had said to him was that he would accept substantially his Amendment, but that he must not be surprised to find that there were some alterations or modifications upon the Report. He thought that it was doubtful whether other persons beside the presiding officer and the voter should be present, because those other persons would probably be agents of the candidates, the landlords, or some other person of influence. He hoped, therefore, that the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Charley) would be withdrawn.

MR. COLLINS said, he thought that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Forster) was rather hard on his supporters. They had not discussed the proposal because the hon. Member for Shaftesbury (Mr. Glyn) had passed the word to be silent. He hoped his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Salford (Mr. Charley) would withdraw his Amendment on the understanding that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) was adopted at once, as had been suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli), though it was true that it might require amendment.

MR. CHARLEY, in accordance with the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, said he would not press his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CRAWFORD moved in page 19, line 26, after "Act," insert—

"Or (if the poll be taken on Saturday) of any voter who declares that he is of the Jewish persuasion, and objects on religious grounds to vote in manner prescribed by this Act, shall"

The object of the Amendment was to enable Jews to vote when elections took place upon their Sabbath.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK moved that the Amendment should be so altered as to apply to all persons who on any day of the week might object on religious grounds to fill up their voting papers.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for the City of London (Mr. Crawford) was intended to apply only to members of the Jewish persuasion, who were forbidden by their religious law to write on Saturday, and he could not agree to insert the words just suggested.

Amendment (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) negatived.

Amendment (Mr. Crawford) agreed to.

MR. H. B. SAMUELSON moved in page 19, line 26, leave out "cause," and insert "himself secretly mark." He thought it important that the knowledge of how any man had voted ought to be limited as narrowly as it was possible.

Mr. W. E. Forster

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he hoped the Amendment would not be pressed. It would greatly delay the polling if the Returning Officers were alone empowered to mark the papers where necessary, instead of their clerks, who were also bound to secrecy by penalties, being allowed to assist in the work.

MR. CHILDERS supported the view of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Forster), but urged the importance of subjecting the clerks, as well as the Returning Officers, to severe penalties, if they disclosed the votes or attempted directly or indirectly to influence the voters.

MR. W. E. FORSTER suggested that the power of marking the ballot papers of persons unable themselves to mark them should be confined to the Returning Officers and their clerks. If the Amendment were not pressed, he would undertake to consider the point raised by it, and also the suggestion of his right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers.)

Amendment negatived.

MR. SYNAN, on rising to move formally the Amendment of which he had given Notice, and upon which he had already addressed the House, remarked that a deal of unnecessary heat had been introduced into the discussion by the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Mr. James), who charged him by insinuation with having entered into a secret compact with Her Majesty's Government and with the Opposition for the purpose of carrying an Amendment, the effect of which would be to render corruption easy. He denied the accuracy of this, and declared that his only object was to save the votes and protect the voters. The hon. Member concluded by moving his Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 19, line 26, after the word "box," to insert the words "Provided further, That on the application of any voter who is unable to read, and on the production by him to the said officer of a declaration that he is so unable, the said officer shall cause the vote of such voter to be secretly marked on a ballot paper in manner directed by the said voter, and the ballot paper to be placed in the ballot box; and the said officer shall retain the said declaration and hand the same over to the returning officer."—(Mr. Synan.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. McMAHON opposed the Amendment on the ground that it would inter-ferre with a vital principle of the Bill and render corruption and intimidation much more easy than it would otherwise be.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, out of the 16,500 electors in his county (Cork) he did not think there were 50 who would not be able to exercise their right of voting according to the provisions of the Bill as it originally stood. He wished the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill would look below the gangway, before adopting as he did the proposals of those immediately behind him. The right hon. Gentleman would then be prevented, if that were possible, from making any further mistakes in this Bill. The proposal was, that a voter should be enabled to have his paper marked for him if he made a declaration that he was "unable to read." Read what? There was no Gentleman in that House who could not with truth make a declaration that he was "unable to read" something or other. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman that there was a certain number of Gentlemen sitting upon that side of the House who would not be led away even by the right hon. Gentleman himself, but who would be true to the pledges they had given and still do their best to pass an honest Bill and to prevent the adoption of anything that looked like a sham. There were, under existing arrangements, 10 polling-places in his county. In accordance with the proportion fixed by the Bill these would at once be increased to 110, with an equal number of presiding officers. He contended that the real effect of this Amendment would be to disfranchise a large number of voters. Besides, no provision was made for those electors who were unable to speak English, and each polling-booth would have to be furnished with an interpreter. The principle of the Bill was now torn asunder, and the Returning Officer might be able to turn an election if he chose to act dishonestly.

THE O'CONOR DON said, he was alive to the danger of entrusting so great a power to the hands of the Returning Officer, but they had to consider a choice of evils. Personally, he had approved the proposal to adopt the use of the colours; but the Committee had refused to sanction that plan. He would remind his hon. Friend (Mr. Downing) that the position of the man who could not speak English would not be affected either one way or another by the proposal now under consideration.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, it had been suggested to the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) to omit the declaration "before a magistrate," because it was open to the objection that it would probably entail an expenditure of money on the part of the voter. It might be necessary to make it clear that the declaration was a bond fide declaration by the voter of his inability to read the ballot paper, and he would undertake to insert some words on the bringing up of the Report to effect that object, and he would be happy to receive the assistance of his hon. Friends the Members for Cork (Mr. Downing) and New Ross (Mr. M'Mahon) in framing such a provision. In going to a division he desired it to be understood that the Government, recognizing what was understood to be the feeling of a great number of the Committee, and also the difficulties which beset the question, were prepared to do what they could to meet the case of those voters who were unable to read; but some safeguard would have to be provided against the abuse of power which the Amendment would place in the hands of the presiding officer. To re-assure the mind of his hon. Friend the Member for Cork, he might state that there was only one country where the Ballot was in use where provision was not made for the case of voters who were unable to read.

MR. H. B. SAMUELSON said, he preferred an Amendment of his own, which could come on subsequently, that the candidate's name should be printed on a ground of such colour as he or his agent might select. He should therefore vote against the Amendment of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan).

MR. CRAUFURD said, he thought it right that some one from the North should enter a protest against the course of Her Majesty's Government. They in the North, at any rate, could read and write, and they did not require such a provision as that proposed; and he was surprised that the Vice President of the Council should for a moment have thought of adopting a provision which would render the Bill, as a Ballot Bill, almost useless. He spoke the sense of all those who wished for a secret ballot, that they would rather not have the Ballot at all than have it with this Amendment. If a specimen ballot paper were printed large enough and posted up, even those who could not read would become sufficiently familiar with it to be able to mark it properly.

MR. REDMOND expressed his dissatisfaction at the disposition that had been shown by the right hon. Gentleman to accept the Amendment which would have the effect of lessening the efficacy of the measure. He had just left his constituency, and one of the declarations that he made was that he would support the Government in the efforts they were making to insure that this Bill should be a real and not a sham Bill. He regretted exceedingly that in the first division in which he was called upon to take a part he should have to vote against the Government. To create the slightest suspicion in the minds of the electors of Ireland upon the question of voting would produce the greatest harm possible. What they required was a really efficacious measure, and not a sham.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was desirous that no exaggerated views should go forth to the country, but erroneous impressions would prevail if it were supposed that the Committee was discussing the question of a real or sham Bill. There might be those in the House—though he did not pretend to say that there were—who put down Amendments with the view of impairing the efficiency of the Bill; but such an imputation ought not to be made except on the clearest evidence. It was the duty of the Government to consider impartially every suggestion that was made, and it was impossible for a man of candour to examine the question before the Committee without seeing that it was one of considerable difficulty, though its operation would be on a small scale. The hon. and learned Member for Cork County (Mr. Downing) had expressed his belief that there were not 50 out of the 16,000 voters he represented who could not read and write. ["No, no!"] [MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING: Who are not able to exercise the franchise.] But if so, there were not 50 men who would be entitled to make this declaration, and therefore even supposing it were a declaration before a magistrate, which he apprehended it would be, where was the ground for fearing some great wholesale operation which was largely to affect the character of the election? For his own part, his belief was, that this declaration would not be largely used. The great bulk of intelligent men, if they could not read or write, could count, and they would be able to put their mark against the candidates for whom they wished to vote. There were other securities. It was not a very attractive thing for a voter to come forward and make a declaration that he could not read or write. As a general rule, a man would not do so unless there was a real necessity for it; and, upon the whole, he could not believe there was any reason for supposing that any great effect upon the efficiency of the Ballot was to be produced one way or the other by this Amendment. But, unquestionably, there was force in the appeal that had been made that the Bill should be divested of anything that was likely to have a disfranchising effect. If there were those who required assistance in voting from their inability to read and write, it would be a very odious and invidious reproach, which would be justly made against the Government unless, under an imperative necessity, they consented to exclude from the Bill provisions under which those who could neither read nor write could receive assistance how they should vote. It was a question of considerable difficulty; but he was inclined to hope that they were leaning to a just decision. But whether it was so or not, he hoped they would not allow it to be supposed that they had been engaged in a struggle of life and death, such as to determine whether this was to be a Bill or no Bill; but to approach the question as it really deserved, when he felt satisfied the Committee would come to a just conclusion.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) had done good service in bringing forward this Amendment. He was sorry to say that in his part of the country (Tralee) a great number of voters were unable to read or write, and the Government had simply to choose between disfranchising them, and affording them facilities for recording their votes under this Bill. It, however, should be borne in mind that it was perfectly optional with the voter to exercise this privilege or not.

MR. JAMES said, that once more, not in anger but more in sorrow, he protested against the course that was being adopted by Her Majesty's Government. He hoped he had given proofs of his wish not to throw obstacles in the way of the progress of this measure; but he wished the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill to recollect that the opponents to the Amendment who had stood by him and expressed their views on Monday night last had no knowledge of the Amendment until it was put on the Paper this morning, which had prevented many from knowing what it was until within a few hours they were called upon to express an opinion upon it. And now, when practical suggestions were made, an admission was made by the Government that they intended practically to accept the Amendment. The Prime Minister had told them it was a question of great difficulty; and that being so, the more time was required for consideration before arriving at a decision. Like the right hon. Gentleman, he was unwilling to disfranchise voters; but, on the other hand, he was unwilling to increase presiding officers; and although he had said that only 50 voters need make this declaration, the opponents of the Amendment feared that those who need not avail themselves of it would be induced to make it, for the causes for which the Ballot Bill had been introduced to remedy. The Prime Minister, a few nights ago, warned his Friends not to listen to the cheers of hon. Members opposite; and he (Mr. James) would ask the right hon. Gentleman not to listen now to the grateful murmurs of hon. Members opposite in approval of the concession, but learn from it what he might expect would result from it.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he did not think there was much practical difference between himself and the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just addressed the Committee. He agreed that the power of the presiding officer would have to be very carefully considered with a view to its limitation, and it would be necessary that something should be done with regard to it on bringing up the Report. All the Government wished to determine by this Amendment was, that persons who could not read should not be disfranchised. He trusted that the Committee would go to a division without regarding it as a party division, and that they would have the real opinion of the Committee on that question.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 242; Noes 88: Majority 154.

MR. CAWLEY moved the first of a series of Amendments on the 25th subsection which deals with the subject of personation. As the sub-section now stood, in the case of a voter who tendered his vote—and it appeared that a vote had already been given by another person in the same name—the man who tendered the second vote would have his ballot paper marked with his name and number on the outside, and placed in the list of tendered votes, and in case of a scrutiny the paper would be opened, and it would then be known for whom the person tendering the vote had voted; whereas the vote of the first person, who might be the real personator, would have been put in the ballot box, and would be regarded as a good vote. So that the unfortunate men who had been personated would be the only class whose votes, under the Bill, would become known, while the personator would escape detection. Personation in most cases—and especially in the great towns—would only be made in the names of the dead or the absent; but when it was made in the name of a living voter, the only vote which could be challenged would be that of the legitimate voter who would come up after the guilty personator had voted for him. The Committee had decided that personation should be a felony; and, therefore, under this Bill, a man might be arrested after he had personated, or when he was tendering a personating vote. It was a most anomalous state of things that a man who might be arrested when he had voted, or was about to vote, had still a perfect right under this Bill to have his voting paper put in the box, and his vote would be counted at an election, though he might be tried, and, when found guilty, condemned to serious punishment. He (Mr. Cawley) proposed to insert words which would make the vote of any man which was challenged a tendered vote, and not an absolute vote; but that the way in which the person tendering the vote proposed to vote should not be known, inasmuch as the challenged voting paper should be placed in an envelope, which should be marked, instead of having the voting paper itself marked. In a subsequent portion of the Bill he intended to propose another Amendment, the effect of which was that in cases of personation, as that offence depended on identity, the Returning Officer should be empowered to hear evidence on oath in relation to the charge, and should himself decide it without going through the long and expensive process of a scrutiny before an Election Judge. It was clear that after a vote was given in the ordinary way under the Ballot it would be impossible to strike it off, because the way in which the vote was given would not be known, and, therefore, all challenged votes should be made merely tendered votes, and should not be put into the ballot box, until the charge of personation had been heard and decided, which should be done as speedily as possible before the Returning Officer before the official counting of the votes took place. His first Amendment which he now moved was the insertion, in line 30, of the words "to whose right to vote objection shall be then taken on the ground that he is not such person."

Amendment proposed,

In line 30, after the word "paper," to insert the words "to whose right to vote objection shall be then taken on the ground that he is not such person or."—(Mr. Cawley.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he could not assent to the Amendment of the hon. Member, because it would enable the presiding officer at his own discretion to use a vote, and would, in fact, abolish the present law; because, according to the present law, if a man tendered a vote and the presiding officer suspected that he intended to personate, all he could do was to put the oath to him, and if he answered in the affirmative he was bound to take the vote. He believed that law was passed in consequence of its having been discovered that it was very inconvenient to leave it to the discretion of the Returning Officer to say who was and who was not a voter. The effect of the Amendment would be that the vote of a person to whom objection was taken on the ground that he was not such person would not be counted, and would be put aside by the Returning Officer.

MR. CAWLEY said, the answer of the right hon. Gentleman was entirely beside the question.

Mr. Cawley

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, if the Amendments of the hon. Member were taken as a whole, the Returning Officer, after refusing to take the votes in question on the day of the poll, would be placed in the position of an Election Judge, and would have to determine whether or not they were valid. That would lead to endless delay, and open the door for operations on the part of election agents.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE supported the Amendment. If it were undesirable that the Returning Officer should decide upon the validity of tendered votes the matter might be left to the decision of a stipendiary magistrate or two justices of the peace. Anything that would tend to get rid of the scandal of personation would be a benefit to public morality.

MR. GOLDNEY said, he thought the Amendment right in theory, but it would be difficult to carry out in practice.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 22; Noes 77: Majority 55.

MR. MUNTZ urged the importance of taking precautions against the ballot box being tampered with by the Returning Officer. He was in France about 20 years ago, when a vote was taken on a new system of government, and it was almost universally believed that unfair returns were made; the officials, indeed, being so zealous for their new master that they returned a larger number in his favour than that of the whole adult male population of France. In Paris, Lyons, and other large towns such practices were, no doubt, out of the question, and there Opposition candidates were repeatedly returned; but it was believed that in many of the rural departments duplicate locks and seals were used, by means of which the voting papers were manipulated over-night. He did not suppose English Returning Officers would resort to such devices; but what might happen hereafter could not be known, and it was desirable to prevent the possibility and even the suspicion of trickery. At his last election he had a majority of 5,000 or 6,000; but his opponents expected from their canvass up to the previous night a majority of 2,000 or 3,000, and had ballot boxes then been left for the night with the Returning Officer, who was rather a friend of his, suspicion might have rested on him. It might be said that if 100 presiding officers had to meet in one room and count the votes in the presence of the Returning Officer and of the agents, the process would be a tedious one; but Members of the House underwent the fatigue of sitting till 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning, and a Returning Officer might go through a night's work, for the duty was not likely to fall on one man more than twice in his life. Without such a regulation the public would lose confidence in the Ballot and in their being fairly represented by the Members returned. He therefore moved, in page 20, line 19, to leave out all after "shall," and insert—

"Convey such packets to the Returning Officer, so that the number of votes may be ascertained before the presiding officer of each station or the agents (if any) of the candidates shall have lost sight of the ballot box."

MR. W. E. FORSTER agreed in the necessity of taking every reasonable precaution—in fact, sufficient precaution—against any possible tampering with the ballot boxes, though the Committee might congratulate themselves on the suspicions raised in a neighbouring country being unlikely to arise here. He could not accept this proposition, however, because it was impracticable. In a large borough or county all the presiding officers could hardly be crammed into one room, and before the counting was over sleep would close the eyes of some of the persons who were to watch or take part in it. They would have to sit up one night and perhaps two. His hon. Friend appeared to underrate the precautions embodied in the Bill. The rules stated that at the close of the poll the papers were to be sealed in separate packets with the seals of the presiding officer and of the agents of the candidates, and that the presiding officer was to deliver such packets to the Returning Officer, who could only count the ballot papers in the presence of the agents. If a night intervened, they were to be again sealed by the Returning Officer and agents, while the presiding officers had to account to the Returning Officer for all the papers issued, and he in his turn to the Clerk of the Crown. He thought that was sufficient precaution to prevent any tampering; but he proposed to take the additional precaution in Rule 32 after the word "shall" in the lines "before the Returning Officer proceeds to count the votes he shall open each ballot box," to insert, "in the presence of the agents of the candidates."

MR. AUBERON HERBERT observed that the object of the Amendment was not so much to guard against fraud as to prevent suspicion of fraud. His right hon. Friend had given no sufficient reason for not adopting the Amendment. Surely the mere deprivation of sleep in the case of a Returning Officer for a few hours in one night would be held of little account in that House, where they were accustomed to such late hours.

MR. MELLOR asked whether it would not be possible to count the papers before they left the polling booth?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he thought that would increase the danger.

MR. GOLDNEY said, he thought the checks already provided were quite sufficient to prevent fraud or the suspicion of fraud. He did not see how the return could be made up at all if any additional checks were imposed.

DR. LUSH felt convinced if the suspicion once got abroad that the ballot-box could be tampered with, the secrecy of voting would be entirely frustrated.

MR. SCOURFIELD reminded the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Herbert) that although they often sat until a late hour in that House, it did not prevent hon. Members from going to sleep, which some seemed to enjoy very much.

MR. ANDERSON was of opinion that the ballot boxes should not be lost sight of until the result had been ascertained.

MR. W. E. FORSTER really did not see how they could adopt the Amendment of his hon. Friend (Mr. Muntz). It might be very desirable not to lose sight of the ballot box, but the parties would lose sight of it by falling asleep. Even if the scheme could be worked, it would add largely to the expenses of an election.

DR. BREWER preferred the Schedule without alterations.

MR. MUNTZ believed that there would be no difficulty in carrying out his proposition without adding to the expenses.

MR. AUBERON HERBERT asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would be ready to insert words to allow the agents of candidates, if they chose to do so, to watch the boxes during the night?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would think over the suggestion if his hon.

Friend would put it into a form which could be adopted; but he thought they would want somebody to watch the agents.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. W. E. FORSTER proposed the addition, in line 28, page 20, respecting the counting of the votes, of the words "in the presence of the agents of the candidates."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. W. E. FORSTER moved, in Rule 54, page 24, line 36, at the end of Rule, insert, as a fresh paragraph—

"The expression 'agents of the candidates,' used in relation to a polling station, means agents appointed in pursuance of section eighty-five of the Act of the Session of the sixth and seventh year of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter eighteen."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. M'LAREN said, that in regard to elections, they laboured under very considerable disadvantages in Scotland as compared with England. The Provost of a burgh in Scotland had no power to act as Returning Officer, and there was not a single deputy-officer who was not a lawyer. The practice in Scotland was to pay these officers three guineas, while in England the practice was to pay them two guineas. To that extent there was an additional cost on Scotland. Then the Reform Act of 1831 did not enact that these deputy Returning Officers or presiding officers at the poll should be lawyers—the words used were "The Sheriff or Sheriff-Substitute," and the use of these words had led to the popular notion in Scotland that the men appointed to this office should be lawyers—in other words, a legal officer receiving Government pay, and having a Government appointment. In England there was no such rule, and the practice was now growing up in England to appoint as presiding officers men who were not lawyers, and who received no payment for their services. He therefore proposed, as an Amendment, in page 24, line 40, to add the following words:—

"In the seven cities and burghs, which severally return one or more Members to Parliament, the Lord Provost, Provost, or acting chief magistrate shall be Returning Officer, and in districts of burghs each Provost or acting chief magistrate shall be a presiding officer at the poll in his own burgh, and accountable to the Sheriff as Returning Officer for the district of burghs. It shall be lawful for the Sheriff to appoint as presiding officers at the poll persons not belonging to the legal profession, and no presiding officer shall be entitled to a fee of more than two guineas."

He proposed the Amendment not so much for the purpose of pressing its adoption at the present stage, but in the hope that, after the ventilation of the subject, some such provision might be adopted on the Report.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that with regard to the first part of the Amendment, he was disposed to agree with the hon. Member. In Scotland the Sheriffs of counties were the Returning Officers not only for the counties, but also for the burghs within the counties, and the object of the Amendment was to make the chief magistrates of seven large burghs the Returning Officers for the burghs, superseding the Sheriff; but that the Sheriff of the county in which the burghs were situated should still be the Returning Officer. He should be very glad to consider that proposal, and, according to his present impression, to consider it not unfavourably. With respect to the second part of the Amendment, the hon. Member was quite right in his statement that it was not the law, but only a popular error, that Sheriffs were constrained to appoint lawyers as their substitutes with reference to election matters. That being clearly so, it did not occur to him that an enactment of the Legislature would be a very judicious method of correcting a popular error—an error which certainly did not extend to the Sheriffs themselves, because they, as lawyers, knew very well that it was open to them to appoint competent persons without legal qualification. As regarded the fee of three guineas, that was prescribed as the maximum—the fee was not to exceed that sum—and he thought it should be allowed to stand so, because there were many cases in which three guineas were certainly not excessive.

MR. ORR-EWING expressed the opinion that the country would prefer it if the post of Returning Officer were retained in the same hands as at present.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment made, after Rules 56 and 58, "Sheriff's Clerks" in Scotland, "Clerk of the Crown and Hanaper" in Ireland, to be construed to the same effect as "Clerk of the Crown in Chancery" in England.

MR. H. B. SAMUELSON moved, in Second Schedule, page 31, line 24, after "large," insert "black." Same line, after "form," insert "upon a ground of such colour as the candidate or his agent may select." The proposal was perfectly simple, and as every voter identified his opinions with a colour, the result would be to enable every voter, however illiterate, to record his vote.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that an Amendment of a similar character had already been decided by the Committee, and therefore this Amendment could not be discussed.

MR. H. B. SAMUELSON said, he thought it would have been as well if he had been stopped before troubling the Committee with any observations; but he submitted that his Amendment was not the same as that which had been already disposed of. ["Order!"]

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, he thought it would be well if the Committee knew the rule which governed them in this matter; because, when some time ago the Committee struck from one of the clauses the word "wilfully," his right hon. Friend who had charge of the Bill proposed next day to insert words which were exactly equivalent.

THE CHAIRMAN said, it appeared to him that the hon. Member was about to propose that which had been substantially before decided by the Committee—that in the ballot paper the name of each candidate should be accompanied by some distinguishing colour, and his ruling was, that an Amendment virtually to the same effect could not be put to the Committee.

MR. BOWRING said, that before the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley) moved his Amendment, he would move the omission of the side-note to the Second Schedule, with a view to a subsequent Amendment.

Side-note omitted.

MR. BOWRING then moved to insert in the blank in the Schedule the word "cross" as the mark which the voter was to put in the ballot paper against the name of each candidate for whom he voted. He objected to allow the insertion of any other mark, and contended that it was a very natural thing for an illiterate man to mark his voting paper with a cross.

MR. CAWLEY said, it was no doubt desirable to have uniformity; but a voter might make a mark which was not a cross at all, and he therefore moved the addition of the words "or other mark."

MR. W. E. FORSTER remarked that he had consented to the omission of the side-note—first, because it was not very intelligible; and, secondly, because it was undesirable to let the Returning Officer decide what kind of a mark should be made. Nobody intended that a vote should be cancelled because a man marked his paper with a mark which was not a cross. In his opinion it was of little importance whether the words "or other mark" were inserted or not.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, he thought it was advisable to have simplicity, and could not perceive why any mark should not be as good as a cross.

MR. CANDLISH pointed out that another section of the Bill would prevent any vote from being lost by reason of an informality in making the mark.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, the Committee were arguing about a mere matter of form, as the Government had declared that if any other mark than a cross were made the vote would still be good. On the whole, it would be better to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley).

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, this part of the Bill did not contain enactments, but merely directions for the guidance of the voter, and he did not think it would make much difference whether the Committee inserted "cross" alone, or the words "cross, or other mark." If, however, "cross" alone were inserted, it would be equivalent to advising the voter to use that particular kind of mark.

MR. F. S. POWELL expressed the opinion that the Amendment ought to be agreed to, or otherwise the difficulties prepared by the Bill for the voters would be very considerably increased.

MR. LEATHAM said, it was absolutely indispensable to prevent voters from making such marks as would render the identification of votes possible. If the Amendment of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley) were agreed to, an agreement might be made by a voter to use a particular mark in order that his ballot paper might be identified.

MR. GOLDNEY said, the 13th clause provided that an election should not be declared invalid in consequence of an infringement of the Rules in the First Schedule; but it did not follow that such an infringement would not render a vote invalid.

MR. JAMES remarked that Clause 13 was not applicable to this regulation which was in the Second Schedule. If they told a voter that he might put any mark he liked, how could they prevent him putting his initials, or any particular mark? But the Bill provided that if a voter could not be identified by his mark, his vote should be void and not counted.

MR. W. E. FORSTER was inclined to think that the word "cross" which was inserted in the last Bill should be inserted in this Bill. If the word "cross" were inserted, he would undertake to move on the Report the addition of other words if, upon obtaining legal advice, he found that such addition was necessary.

MR. CAWLEY, on the understanding that the right hon. Gentleman would return to the question on the Report, would not press his Amendment.

MR. F. S. POWELL said, he thought the difficulty suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Mr. James) might be overcome by inserting after the word mark "by which the voter cannot be identified."

Amendment (Mr. Cawley) withdrawn.

Amendment (Mr. Bowring) agreed to.

Schedule agreed to.

Remaining Schedules and Preamble agreed to.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE asked whether the Bill would be reprinted before the Report?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said the Bill would be instantly reprinted and delivered to Members of the House.

In reply to MR. R. N. FOWLER,

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the Report would be fixed for that day week.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Thursday next, and to be printed. [Bill 139.]

UNLAWFUL ASSEMBLIES (IRELAND)

ACT REPEAL BILL—[Bill 72.]

(Mr. Patrick Smyth, Sir Patrick O'Brien, Mr. Symon, Mr. Digby, Mr. Downing, Mr. McMahon, Mr. Maguire.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. P. J. SMYTH*: Sir, in moving the second reading of the Bill for the repeal of the Act of 33 Geo. III., c. 29, I deem it necessary to offer a few words of explanation. The title of the Act—"To prevent the Election or Appointment of unlawful Assemblies"—is calculated to mislead. Its more correct title would be "an Act to create Unlawful Assemblies," for it renders unlawful any assembly of delegates or representatives, how lawful or constitutional soever the object of such assembly may be. It enacts that—

"All assemblies, committees, or other bodies of persons elected, or otherwise constituted or appointed, are unlawful assemblies, and all persons giving or publishing notice of the election to be made of such persons or delegates, or attending, or voting, or acting therein by any means, are guilty of a high misdemeanour."

The House, then, I hope, clearly understands that my object is not to encourage unlawful assemblies in Ireland; but, on the contrary, to elevate the tone of public assemblies by restoring to my country the right of public meeting, in accordance with the forms prescribed by the Constitution, and sanctioned by the custom of England from time immemorial. This Act was passed by the Irish Parliament in the year 1793. It was vehemently opposed by Mr. Grattan. He said its object—

"Was not the peace of the country, but reflection on great bodies, the gratification of spleen at the expense of the Constitution, by voting false doctrine into law. His objection to the Bill was that it was a trick, making a supposed National Convention at Athlone in 1793 a pretext for preventing delegation for ever."

In the discussion last Session on the Phoenix Park Riots, the allegation that there was one law for England and another for Ireland with reference to public meetings was denied; it was asserted, on the contrary, by occupants of the Treasury bench, that the law on the subject was actually the same in both countries. That was an excusable mistake, for very few hon. Members of this House were then aware of the existence of this Act. The leading journal even was not aware of its existence; but the moment its attention was called to it, it did not hesitate to avow its concurrence with the view of Grattan—that the Irish Parliament would have done more wisely had it originally limited the duration of the Act, and that it was no longer desirable to maintain it. Am I guilty of presumption in now asking the Government and the House to give effect to their own declarations to assimilate the Irish law with reference to public meetings to that of England, and to give to Ireland the benefit of that saving principle of the Constitution—the principle of representation—which, operating through public assemblies, has enabled England, without tumult and without disorder, to repeal her own laws and reform her own Parliament? In that same Park debate the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government complained—and not without some show of reason—that while meetings in England were held for purposes of discussion, in Ireland the object seemed to be to produce an effect by the display of large numbers. The difference is not to be ascribed to any preference of the Irish people for tumultuous assemblages, but to this particular Act, which drove O'Connell to the expedient of monster meetings, and leaves to the Irish people now no other resource. Although asking the House to sanction the formal repeal of this Act, I am free to avow the opinion that the Irish people would be justified in treating it as obsolete and not of binding effect, and I will state the grounds of that opinion. While the Act for the disestablishment of the Irish Church was before the House, a Convention in opposition to that measure, summoned by the Primates of Ireland, the Archbishop of Armagh and the Archbishop of Dublin, of delegates chosen and elected from every parish in Ireland, sat day after day in Dublin. A letter addressed by the Most Rev. Dr. Trench to each of the clergy of the united dioceses of Dublin and Kildare violates in every line the spirit and the letter of the Act which I propose to repeal, and the writer of it, and every member of that Church Convention, rendered himself liable, on conviction, to the penalties of high misdemeanour. These gentlemen exercised—and properly exercised, as I conceive—what they deemed to be a constitutional right, and they held their

Convention with the full sanction of Her Majesty's Government. Nay, at the very time the proceedings of that Convention were being published in the Dublin newspapers, the then Attorney General for Ireland, now Mr. Justice Barry, referred in this House to the Act in question, in these terms—

“By a peculiar law of old standing in that country, and framed for a particular purpose, no persons or body could meet by delegation.”

I do not mean to censure the Government for their action on that occasion—far from it—they felt, I presume, that the Act was one which either ought not to be enforced, or could not be enforced. Well, the Act which ought not to be enforced, ought not to be upon the statute book; and the Act which cannot be enforced offends against the majesty of the law every instant that it remains unrepealed. This Act, therefore, stands already condemned by the Government, but it stands also condemned by this House. A special clause in the Church Act places this Act in abeyance, in order to enable the Protestants of Ireland to meet by delegation for the organization of their Church—that is, before an influential section of the Irish community can discharge one of the most important duties that could be committed to any body of men, a special Act of Parliament is required to remove the obstruction interposed by this Act. A stronger legislative condemnation than that it would be difficult to conceive. The Act is general in its scope, embracing all sections, all persons, and all objects; I claim, therefore, in the name of justice and of law, that the right reserved by the Church Act in favour of a section of the Irish community for a special purpose, shall be extended to the whole Irish people, for any and every purpose that is legal and constitutional. It may be said that if this Act is repealed, the Irish people will hold representative meetings for Repeal of the Union, or some form of Home Rule. Granted that they may do so; at present they can hold monster meetings for a similar purpose. The only difference that I can see between the two forms of meeting is, that while the representative principle affords a guarantee for order and regularity, the monster meeting is usually attended with excitement. But either one or the other may be prevented, if convened for an illegal purpose. The Act, moreover, is utterly indefensible. No such Act exists in England, and if maintained, it can only be with the intent of preventing the Irish people from deliberating in an orderly and constitutional manner upon Irish affairs, and petitioning with effect the Crown or the Parliament. I hope the House will not commit the fatal blunder of elevating this infamous Act into the position of the Malakhoff of the Union—if it should do so, that Malakhoff will be captured, and no bridge of fire will save the Sebastopol behind it.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Patrick Smyth.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he was sorry that he was unable to agree to the second reading of the Bill, and he need hardly tell the hon. Member who had charge of it and the House that no one would have more pleasure than he should if he could think that this piece of exceptional legislation with regard to Ireland could be safely repealed. The hon. Member had stated that the Act which he now sought to repeal was intended to restrain the right of public meeting, but against public meeting in that country there was no Act whatever in existence, provided it was convened for a legal purpose; the Act in question only prohibited persons who either were, or purported themselves to be, delegates from other bodies, from assembling in Convention. The hon. Member had further carefully abstained from entering into the history of this measure; but he would not imitate the hon. Member in that respect, but would at once tell the House that it was passed not by the English, but by the Irish Parliament at a time when hon. Members of the hon. Gentleman's mode of thinking believed that Ireland was most prosperous and most happy. It would be a mistake, however, were the Government to treat this Act as being altogether obsolete. Doubtless, it had been passed for reasons which he (the Marquess of Hartington) could not altogether approve, and under very different circumstances from those which now existed; but, unfortunately, it had been found necessary in recent times to put it into operation, and had not the Irish Parliament passed it, it might have been necessary for the British Parliament to have enacted some provisions of a similar character. Thus, in the time of Mr. O'Connell, it was proposed to hold a National Convention, which was announced as furnishing a correct representation of the Irish people; and it was only by means of this Act that that Convention was prevented from being held. In still more recent times the Act had been put into operation. Thus, in 1848, the Irish Confederation announced its intention of summoning a National Council, to be elected by the various local national councils in that country, and, of course, such a Council would equally have purported to be the national representative of Ireland. The late Lord Clarendon, the then Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, believing that such an assembly would be dangerous to the public peace of the country, gave notice that it would not be permitted to meet, and that the Act would be put into force in order to prevent such a Convention being held. Any hon. Member who had read the speeches of Members of the Irish Confederation, in which they announced their ultimate views, would have little doubt that the Government of that day came to a right conclusion in thinking that the permitting of the assembling of such a National Council would not be conducive to the public peace. Those speeches plainly showed that it was the intention of the promoters of that National Council that it should purport to represent the national will and the feelings of the Irish people more completely and fully than Parliament itself, and there could be no doubt that such a Council would have been regarded by large numbers of the people of Ireland as possessing a superior weight to that of the Parliament of England. The hon. Member said that the Act had been condemned by the action of both the Government and of Parliament; but it appeared to him that, in the observations he had made on the subject, the hon. Member had answered himself. The hon. Member had said that the representative Convention of the Church Body in Ireland was an infraction of the Act, and that the Government by proposing, and Parliament by assenting, to a provision legalizing that assembly, had practically condemned the Act in question. But the Government had taken a reasonable and a proper course by asking Parliament to agree to a provision repealing the Act in a special case, which they believed to be a reasonable and a proper one. The general question however they had now to determine was, what would be the immediate effect of repealing the Act at the present time? He was far from saying that the time might not come when this Act might be repealed; but he should not be expressing the opinions which he entertained were he to say that that time had now arrived. The hon. Member was of too practical a turn of mind to wish to repeal this Act without having some ulterior object in view; and, therefore, would not say that in the event of the Act being repealed, a Convention of the Home Rule party would be held; but was it not extremely probable that such an assembly would be held in that event? He (the Marquess of Hartington) did not know whether it would be worth while to preserve the Act merely for the purpose of preventing a Home Rule Convention being assembled; but it was impossible for the Government to shut their eyes to the fact that, although much had not been heard about it lately, and although it was dormant, the Fenian organization was not altogether extinguished. He did not know whether the hon. Member was aware, but he himself was aware, that many members—perhaps not the most prominent, but, at all events, not the least active members—of the Home Rule Association were still connected with the Fenians. ["No!"] Whether the hon. Member who cried "No," was aware of the fact or not, he could inform him that he had not the smallest doubt that many members—perhaps not the most prominent, but not the least active members—of that Association were now or had been connected with the Fenian organization, and their object in taking up the agitation on the subject of Home Rule it was not difficult to conjecture. At the present moment Fenianism was at a very great discount. The failure of the Fenian plans had been complete, and the people of Ireland were fully aware of the hollowness of the proposals and the selfishness of the aims of those who put them forward—in fact, Fenianism might be said to be very nearly dead. But although Fenianism was dormant, it was not altogether dead, and the great object of the leaders of that organization was, that some kind of agitation should be kept up in Ireland, so that, if a more convenient opportunity arose, the Fenian organization might be easily revived. The Home Rule agitation accordingly seemed to open up to the nearly extinct Fenian party the requisite means for keeping up what they called a patriotic spirit, they biding their time till a more convenient season; and he again maintained that, whether the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) was aware of the fact or not, many members of the Home Rule party did at all events belong to the Fenian organization. [Mr. BUTT: No, no!] He would repeat, in spite of the denial of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick, that if that hon. and learned Member was not aware of it he (the Marquess of Hartington) was, that many of the most active members of the Home Rule Association did at present belong, or had belonged, to the Fenian Association. If that was not the fact, let the hon. and learned Gentleman point out to the House what means were taken by the Home Rule Association to exclude Fenians from their body. Let him institute inquiries, and, if he did it honestly, he would find that the statement now made was not an exaggeration. He sincerely wished, as the whole House must wish, that every trace of exceptional legislation in Ireland could be effaced; but the best way to effect that object was not by moving for the repeal of these Acts before the time had come at which they could be repealed with safety, but by removing altogether the cause for such legislation. If the hon. Member for Westmeath and others would exercise their influence with a view to destroy all disloyal and illegal associations in Ireland, the Government would gladly propose the repeal of those Acts; but so long as they knew that treasonable associations had very recently been rife and active in Ireland, and that many men there were only waiting for the opportunity of reviving plots which a few years ago did so much to check the prosperity of Ireland, and caused so much alarm, it was impossible to repeal laws which imposed checks in the way of these associations. While he hoped the time might come when exceptional legislation would cease, it would not at present be either wise or politic to repeal those Acts. He regretted, moreover, that the discussion had come on at a time when it was not expected, and when, therefore, hon. Members were not very well prepared to discuss it. Among other Members absent was the hon. Gentleman who had undertaken to move the rejection of the Bill (Mr. Leeman). In the absence of the hon. Gentleman, however, he should adopt his Amendment, and accordingly would move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Mr. P. J. Smyth

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months." — (The Marquess of Hartington.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. BUTT said, he rose in consequence of the direct appeal made to him by the noble Marquess. He also regretted that the House was not better attended, because he should have been glad to ask a full assembly of English Gentlemen whether, in the first place, these professions of liberality towards Ireland were a reality or a sham; and, in the next place, whether it was the province of any Minister to bring against Gentlemen as honourable as himself charges that they had taken part in the Fenian conspiracy? He gave the most direct denial to the statement just made. If the noble Marquess was of opinion that "some members of the Home Rule Association are members" of the Fenian conspiracy — mark these words "are members" — [Several hon. MEMBERS: "Are or were" was the expression used.] In that case, he would like to know what was the meaning of the alternative? Would the noble Marquess retract, and say that no member of the Home Rule Association was now a member of the Fenian conspiracy? If such men were now Fenians it was the duty of the noble Marquess to prosecute them. If he forbore from prosecuting, it was the duty of the noble Marquess to be silent in that House; and he (Mr. Butt) protested against the conduct of a Minister who, upon the assertion of detectives and spies—who constituted the real Government of Ireland — brought such charges against Gentlemen who were as respectable as himself. "They were members of the Fenian conspiracy." He denied the statement; but if it were true, it would be one of the greatest triumphs of the Home Rule Association that it had won back to peaceful agitation men who had been driven by such legislation as this to pursue their objects by illegal combinations. He would take upon himself the responsibility of calling on the noble Marquess to name the members of the Home Rule Association who "are or were" members of the Fenian conspiracy. To the best of his belief the charge was without a particle of foundation. The noble Marquess asked him, individually, what steps had been taken to prevent Fenians from joining the Home Rule Association? Had he received due notice of such a question, or had he expected such a charge to be made, he would have brought over the rules of that association, which declared that the only object contemplated was to gain for Ireland, under the Sovereignty of the Queen, with a House of Lords and a House of Commons, the right of managing in Ireland exclusively Irish Business, leaving still to the Imperial Parliament the task of dealing with Imperial legislation. That was the fundamental principle of the society, and there was a declaration that it was to be accomplished by peaceful means. A Fenian who joined the Home Rule Association under such circumstances, or, indeed, any man who had any reserve, or any disloyal or revolutionary object, would betray every member of the society when he joined; and, further, he had been present at the meetings of that society and had never heard a word uttered inconsistent with these declarations; but the effect of such legislation as this was to drive many men in Ireland into illegal combinations. He did not expect on such an occasion that he should be called upon to discuss Home Rule; but members of that association believed that until Ireland obtained the right of managing Irish affairs in an Irish Parliament, they would never have peace, prosperity, or content there. He was anxious to maintain the Union, and so were those engaged in the Home Rule organization, including men of high position and large property, who were not likely to lend themselves to revolutionary projects. Their proposals might be wild and impracticable, or otherwise; but they were simply as he had said—that Ireland should have an Irish Parliament managing Irish affairs under the Sovereignty of the Queen, with a veto given to Her Majesty upon every Irish subject; and the supreme control of the Imperial Parliament to be exercised in the last resort. He believed that the whole Irish people would make that demand at the next General Election, in such a form that every Englishman would feel it necessary for the peace and for the interest of the Empire that the demand should be granted. He had not, however, come here to discuss the question of Home Rule, nor ought it to have been raised that evening. An Act of Parliament remained on the Statute Book, which rendered it illegal for Irishmen to assemble, if they presumed to represent any portion of the Irish people; and those who took part in it would be liable to penalties. For example, an assembly of medical men sent up by the medical profession in the various counties would be illegal, and those who took part in it would be liable to penalties. The representative assembly of the Disestablished Irish Church would be illegal, if it were not expressly authorized by the recent statute; otherwise, the Archbishops of Armagh and Dublin would be liable to a prosecution for having contravened this Convention Act. The noble Marquess assigned the Fenian organization as his reason for continuing this Act. Did he think that thereby he would prevent the holding of a Fenian assembly? Would he seek to subject the members of a Home Rule Convention to penalties? He (Mr. Butt) would like to ask a number of representative men to meet together in Dublin, and determine upon a plan for an Irish Parliament to submit to this House; believing that if he did so, he should come here with an overwhelming representation of the intellect and property of Ireland. Such an assembly would, however, be illegal. He would hold it, if necessary, in defiance of all the Convention Acts upon the statute book; but if they met, it would not be under the protection of the law, or with the restraints imposed by the law, but more or less as outlaws, evading the law. Under this Act of Parliament the Corn Law League in Ireland would have been illegal, and Mr. Cobden would have been put in prison; while the advocates of Parliamentary Reform would have been put in precisely the same position. On the part of the Irish nation, he, however, maintained that they desired Home Rule; and claimed the same liberty to express their opinions upon the subject as was now possessed by Englishmen and Scotchmen, who were under no coercive statutes, such as that which it was now sought to repeal. And, moreover, he would warn the House, that if this Act was not repealed, it would cause in Ireland an agitation such as would be likely to endanger the safety of the Empire, and the Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland would stand forth before the eyes of Europe, as a body which held and governed Ireland by an unconstitutional system of coercion. Why, if such a system existed in Naples, the indignation of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government would be stirred, and eloquent and high-sounding despatches would be written upon the subject by the British Minister at Naples, if the King of Italy attempted to hold that province by putting down public meetings. All he wanted, therefore, was that Ireland should be placed under the same law with England; and if the law was violated—if Fenians chose to assemble and to agitate, the common law of the land was sufficient to prevent and punish any such proceeding. The effect of a policy such as that which the Government seemed inclined to act upon in regard to this question must inevitably result in convincing the people of Ireland that they did not stand in a position of equality under the British Constitution, and that, in order to obtain fair play, they must have a Parliament of their own sitting in Dublin; for nothing was more likely to stir up the inhabitants of Ireland who sympathized in any degree with the Fenian movement, to rebellion and acts of violence, than to throw into their face the reproach that the British Parliament was asked by the Government not to repeal an unconstitutional and coercive measure, and to prevent them from meeting to discuss the dearest interests of their own country. He asked the House to believe him, when he said that if this line of policy were persisted in, Ireland would undoubtedly become a scourge for England in days which were not very far distant. God forbid that that should be so. He had struggled long—and should continue to struggle—to prevent such a state of things coming to pass; but the Ministry which would perpetuate an Act of Parliament like the one now under consideration was doing more than any other agency could do to bring about the denouement which he so strongly deprecated. He regretted very much that the noble Marquess the Chief Secretary for Ireland should have opposed this Bill, and he should regret still more to see the Prime Minister taking a similar course; because it would be impossible to inflict a greater blow upon British authority in Ireland, or to throw a greater difficulty in the way of those who, like himself, were anxious to reconcile the Irish people to the authority of the Queen, than would be inflicted by continuing these unconstitutional Acts upon the statute book.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Dowse) said, he did not intend to follow his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) into a discussion upon Home Rule—a matter which deserved separate discussion, and would probably receive attention from Parliament in the course of that or some future Session. He hoped when that discussion took place the voice of the Irish people generally would be heard upon the question, for he felt convinced that, when heard, it would show that the great bulk of the people were not under the guidance of his hon. and learned Friend upon this subject. Irishmen held a variety of opinions upon most subjects, and Home Rule was a matter upon which they were by no means ignorant. He came from the Province of Ulster, which was, whatever else might be said in reference to it, the most prosperous part of Ireland, and he assured his hon. and learned Friend that the people among whom he lived in his early life, and some of whom he represented in that House, held, and would express at the proper time, very decided opinions upon the subject of Home Rule. He did not intend to import into the discussion any amount of heat, but he wished to make one observation in reference to a remark which fell from his noble Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland. His noble Friend said that there were in the Home Rule Association— [Mr. Butt: “Are now” were the words which the noble Marquess used]—he desired permission to finish the sentence before any correction was attempted. He understood his noble Friend to say that there were now or had been Fenians among the members of the Home Rule Association. [Mr. Butt: No, no!] Then, what his noble Friend said was, that at the present time there were in the Home Rule Association persons who were now or had been members of the Fenian conspiracy. He should like to know from his hon. and learned Friend how many members the Home Rule Association had? [Mr. Butt: 700.] 700 men, to represent the property, the intellect, and the patriotism of Ireland! Certainly, their number was greater than that of the men who fell at Thermopylæ; but though it was so small—[Mr. Butt: 70,000]—he certainly should have thought they were more like 70,000—he ventured to think that of the 700 Home Rulers, or at all events of the 70,000, there was some one who at some period of his life had some connection with the Fenian conspiracy. That was substantially all his noble Friend had said on the subject. The real question, however, before the House was, whether in the present condition of Ireland, the Government responsible for the well being of the country ought to give up any of the safeguards that the wisdom of a former age had enacted for the preservation of the country's peace? He was in hopes that the time would shortly come when this Act might be safely repealed; but he did not think—and the Government did not think, it would be safe to repeal it just now. He did not think it would be denied by anyone that a Fenian conspiracy existed in Ireland. It might be dormant, but the Irish were a very lively people, and when asleep it was not very difficult to awake them. No man in Ireland had done more to discourage violence than his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Limerick, who, judging from his speech that evening, was not so far astray as many people thought he was; and he therefore asked his hon. and learned Friend to say, whether it would be wise to give up any of the existing safeguards, in face of a society which boasted its connection with a powerful organization across the Atlantic, openly stated its opposition to the maintenance of the Throne and the British Constitution, and looked forward to nothing less than the creation of an independent Irish Republic as the only means of securing the end they had in view? His hon. and learned Friend had referred to the Act it was now sought to repeal as a somewhat trumpery measure passed in 1793, and said it might be used to prevent certain country doctors from meeting in Dublin to discuss pathological subjects; but so far from this being a correct description of the measure, he (Mr. Dowse) found on reference to the statute, that it was enacted for the purpose, among others, of putting a stop to the holding of meetings convened for factious and seditious purposes. The Act in effect said that all assemblies assuming authority to represent the people of any province, city, town, or district, and elected for, and meeting under pretence of petitioning for or in any manner procuring an alteration of matters established by law in Church and State, should be declared an illegal assembly. It was not the right of public meeting that was aimed at; it was the principle of elections and delegates. He was at a loss therefore to understand how such an assembly of the Protestant Bishops as his hon. and learned Friend had referred to, held in order to protest against an alteration of the law as then established, and not in any shape calculated to effect a violation of the law, or the disturbance of the public peace, could be said to be an assembly convened to procure an alteration of that law. It required all the ingenuity of his hon. and learned Friend—and he (Mr. Dowse) knew how great that ingenuity was—to bring such a meeting under that Act. What that Act however was really aimed at was the assembling of a mock Parliament affecting to represent the people of Ireland, and thus setting up an opposition Business to that carried on in that House. If that were permitted, and a place for the purpose were obtained on College Green, they would doubtless see the county of Cork electing three or four different Gentlemen from those who represented it already in that House. Again, in a borough a different Member would be chosen from the Member who sat for it in that House, and it would be said, “Look on this picture, and on that—here is the real there, the sham representative.” It would not be a case of—“How happy would I be with either, were t’other dear charmer away;” but the pseudo-Member would be decidedly preferred. His hon. and learned Friend himself would not be there as really representing

Limerick, but would probably be President of the body set up in competition to the British Parliament, and which would go on discussing Bills and measures, in order to show how all those things could be managed in Ireland. In the present state of Ireland, with many ill-affected men in the country, armed to the teeth, and Fenianism dormant or smouldering, he did not think it would be safe to allow a sham Parliament to meet in Dublin. They frequently had Naples and the imprisonment of Poerio and other distinguished men mentioned to them; but there was no real similarity between the case of Naples and that of Ireland, and the reference to the former could only be made in these discussions by way of rhetorical flourish. That Act inflicted no practical grievance upon Ireland, which at the present moment enjoyed as much practical liberty as England or Scotland. [“No, no!”] His hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. Henry) objected to that; but he (Mr. Dowse) defied any man to show that anything but the merest sentimental grievances existed in regard to that subject; and, at all events, he contended that that House was the proper place for the ventilation of Irish questions and complaints, for that House had never turned a deaf ear to anything which Ireland had to say. The grievance was a mere ideal one, for he ventured to assert that till this Bill was brought forward there were not 10 men out of every 10,000 in Ireland aware even of the existence of such a law. It was true there was no exactly analogous statute in England; but there were various enactments in England affecting the right of meeting even more stringent than those in force in Ireland, and yet no one asked for their repeal. The people were aware that no resort would be had to these laws, except on occasions when the whole people would approve of their application. In conclusion, he must say that the Government, having honestly considered that subject, felt it to be a duty to Ireland itself and to the entire United Kingdom not to ask for any change of the law at present; and as a consequence of that, they were bound to resist the proposal made by the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. P. Smyth) to repeal that Act. In doing so, however, they wished to give utterance to the sentiment that they were extremely anxious that the time might soon come when there would be no necessity to continue a statute of that description. If all Irishmen were as desirous as his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Butt) to bring Irish questions to the touchstone of discussion and examination in that House, and abide by the result, the Government would not stand in the way of the repeal of that law; but they knew there were many men in Ireland who would not be offended if he called them the advanced thinkers of Irish politics, and who would not be satisfied with anything short of the separation of the two kingdoms. Being anxious, therefore, to allow Ireland time to heal the wounds inflicted on her in past times, and to encourage her people to come to the right tribunal for the consideration and redress of their grievances—the Imperial Parliament, the Government could not at present consent to part with what they deemed to be one of the safeguards of peace and order in that country.

MR. O'REILLY said, that prima facie, the case for the repeal of the Act was irresistible, for Ireland was an integral part of the United Kingdom, and it ought to be governed by the same laws as England and Scotland. A case therefore must be made out for enacting or maintaining such exceptional legislation as that, which, in his opinion, would render illegal the meetings of any representative body of men—say, for instance, the medical authorities from the different Irish counties, if they assembled to petition for a change of the law affecting medical relief. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland had said that no practical grievances had ever been felt under the statute; but under that very Act the committee to obtain the redress of Roman Catholic grievances had been dissolved. That fact overruled the assertion of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. The Attorney General had also thought that an attempt would be made to return Irish Representatives to compete with those now sitting in that House; but was he afraid of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) and his 700 adherents of Home Rule? If the friends of Home Rule were as weak as was alleged, surely, it would be wise to let the true touchstone be applied which would test that weakness? The argument of the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland was based on the assumption that if this Act were repealed the order and stability of the Empire would be endangered. It was because he (Mr. O'Reilly) believed that its repeal and the consequent enlarged freedom which Ireland would enjoy would tend to produce loyalty and contentment, that he advocated its repeal. The same fallacy pervaded the arguments of the noble Lord as had pervaded those of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, when the noble Lord referred to the agitation that existed under O'Connell's direction, when that hon. Gentleman entertained the idea of assembling a National Council in Ireland in opposition to the Parliament of Westminster, whose decisions and decrees were to be looked upon as equal to or possessing greater weight than those of the Imperial Parliament; but if the question had been brought to such a test, the public would have seen a practical difference between the power and authority of a merely voluntary and irregularly elected body, and the power and weight of the Imperial body. Such an assembly would, no doubt, have had great weight in appealing to the Imperial Parliament; but the attempt to bring its decrees in contrast with Acts of Parliament would have simply shown its inefficiency. Penal legislation in reference to the expression of public opinion had never succeeded in any country in the world; but, on the contrary, it had conferred a fictitious value and a suppositious strength on the power against which it was directed. It did not prevent the meeting of Fenian delegates, because conspirators were not deterred by such Acts; but they used them in their appeal to the people as instances of how unjustly they were treated by the Government. The Imperial Government need not dread the Fenian organization; and he should like to see this legislation swept away, in order that the real feeling of the people might be tested. In conclusion, he must protest against the expression which the noble Marquess had used, when he said that unless a very different state of things were to occur in Ireland hon. Members would appeal in vain to an English Parliament to repeal such Acts. Now, if the Parliament of this country were a purely English Parliament, he should not be sitting in it; but it was because it was an Imperial Parliament that he sat in it, and it was to an Imperial Parliament he therefore appealed.

MR. BAGWELL said, that if he had had any doubt before coming down to the House as to the vote he should give, the speech of the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland would have dispelled it. That noble Lord had fairly told the House that this was an Act of the Irish Parliament, but passed under different circumstances to those in which they now lived, and, instead of basing his opposition on that, he had introduced the subject of Fenianism and Home Rule. He need not remind the House that he (Mr. Bagwell) had never been connected with Fenianism or mixed up with Home Rule. He differed entirely with the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt), and he had no hesitation in stating his belief that Home Rule would lead to the utter destruction not only of Ireland, but of the whole country. It would be a simple act of the dismemberment of the Empire—such an act as was contemplated when the Southern States attempted to separate from the United States, and which led to the unfortunate war which took place between them. England, however, would imitate the conduct of the United States, and would no doubt spend her last shilling and fire her last shot before she permitted the dismemberment of the Empire by the separation of Ireland. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland had spoken of that country as being armed to the teeth; but every Irish magistrate well knew it was really not so, in consequence of the stringent working of the various Arms Acts that had been passed; and when a landlord was shot—which was the only thing that was done—he was shot with some such wretched gun that the man who fired the shot ran as much risk of losing his life as the person did who was fired at. The right hon. and learned Gentleman, therefore, could not have got the information upon which he founded his remark from the police of Ireland. If this Act were so harmless as it had been represented, why keep it on the statute book? But the fact was, that he had noticed over and over again, that what was proposed by independent Irish Members on the Government side of the House was opposed by the Government; and, if, after a time, it was proposed by Irish Members on the other side, it was immediately adopted by the Government. He did not think that was a proper course for the Government to adopt, and he, for one would always deprecate it. Were the Government not strong enough to keep down insurrection, or any meetings calculated to lead to riot, when they had a strong law, with an enormous army of superior police to carry out that law? With all these powers, he maintained that it was unworthy of the Government to continue obsolete Acts, passed in former times, and under circumstances different from the present.

MR. PIM, in supporting the second reading of the Bill, said, the continuance of the Act was an exceptional restriction on liberty in Ireland, and, indeed, was no remedy for the evils referred to, for Fenianism worked in the dark, and would not be affected by an Act against open meetings. Therefore, while it was inoperative as respected Fenianism, the Act strengthened the antipathies of the people, and was therefore injurious. But even if a mock Parliament were to meet in Dublin, he did not suppose the Government would think it judicious to enforce this Act; it was more probable they would regard it as a dead letter, as they had done in the case of the Party Processions Act. He thought, therefore, the repeal of the Act was desirable, for there was greater danger in the maintenance of exceptional restrictions than in repealing them.

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN said, he felt bound to support the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland. In doing so, however, he must give expression to the hope and the belief that at no distant period the laws between the two countries would be equal. Before he could consent to the repeal of the present exceptional legislation for Ireland, he must have an assurance from the Executive Government that the country was in such a state as to justify that repeal. It would have afforded him great pleasure to hear that the Fenian movement was no longer in existence, instead of being still dormant, and ready to wake into new life on the first opportunity that might occur, for the House must not forget what it had been obliged to do in order to put down that movement—namely, to suspend the Constitution.

He fully believed what had been stated by his noble Friend, that the Fenian movement existed still, though only in a dormant condition, and every Irish Member in the House was, no doubt, of the same belief. With regard to the Act now under consideration, it was worthy of remark that not one hon. Member who had spoken that night had pointed out a single instance in which the Act had been brought into play inconsistently with the perfect liberty of Irishmen as well as Englishmen; and while he should be sorry to see the Government draw the string too tight, and apply this law on a slight transgression of its strict letter, he thought they were justified in maintaining the law, so that they might be enabled to assure themselves that Ireland was now not only in a tranquil state, but that it would continue to remain so for some time to come. There was a disposition in that House to do strict justice to Ireland, and the determination prevailed on both sides to remedy existing defects in that country. Several measures were already before the House for the purpose, and he believed it was not too much to say that within a few years the Government would be enabled to recommend the House to sweep away all that exceptional legislation, and to govern Ireland and England by the same laws.

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK said, that when the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. P. Smyth) introduced his Bill on this subject last year, the general opinion of the English Press was in favour of the abolition of the Act. Had the Act done any good—had it prevented sedition, treason, or rebellion, its continuation on the statute book might be justified. He might, however, remind the House of the fact, that the Act was passed during the Irish Parliament, and at a time of great political excitement, in 1793. Its object was to prevent meetings for political purposes; but what was the result? Treason and sedition still continued; men who would have been known to the Government had they assembled openly, met privately and plotted against the Government, and five years afterwards, when the delegates met in private, a majority of them were arrested in Dublin. That was the commencement of the Rebellion in 1798. The objects of those men were treasonable, and the men themselves might have been seized and tried, and the rebellion nipped in the bud, instead of leading to loss of life and property. They were told that the Act was again put into operation in 1848; but it did not prevent another rebellion then, though, no doubt, it was a rebellion of very contemptible proportions. The Act, therefore, had not been operative or beneficial in preventing meetings for illegal purposes. If people met openly for illegal purposes, the common law was quite sufficient for dealing with them; but if they met in a legal and constitutional manner, they were entitled to do so in England and Scotland, and they ought to be entitled to do so in Ireland also. In no sense of the word could the continuance of the Act give greater security to the Crown, or prevent sedition if people were disposed to be seditious. He was prepared to support the present Bill on principles totally irrespective of Home Rule, because he believed that the Act the repeal of which was sought for was a piece of exceptional legislation, which, while it offended and annoyed, did not serve any useful purpose. If the Government were wise, instead of adopting the Amendment which had been moved, they would repeal a statute which could do no good and which served but to irritate and excite.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I am glad to observe that this debate has been conducted with moderation; and I am desirous of expressing the lively satisfaction with which I listened to many of the most important propositions contained in the speech of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt). I think it is matter of public importance that the declarations which he has made should have been made at this early period after his reappearance in the House; and that they should go forth as a portion of the debates of this House to the hearing and knowledge of the people of Ireland, because undoubtedly there have been exaggerations—there has been doubt, there has even, perhaps, been either apprehension or irritation on the subject of the views entertained by my hon. and learned Friend and others in Ireland, which, whether we agree or disagree with him, unquestionably the declarations he has made, perfectly explicit as they are, must tend very materially to allay and to remove. My hon. and learned Friend is not satisfied, as Irish reformers or popular leaders have been in former times, by desiring to maintain as the sole link of connection between the two countries the authority of the Crown. My hon. and learned Friend is evidently aware to what risk the authority would be exposed, if upon the Crown alone the whole strain of its continuance were to be devolved. My hon. and learned Friend desires to maintain as explicitly as any one among us the supreme authority of Parliament. What he seeks for Ireland is the management of local affairs, and as Parliament is the supreme and last resort, it follows that with Parliament must rest the definition of the important question as to what affairs are local affairs. That is essentially involved in the declarations which my hon. and learned Friend has made. No doubt he has assumed that that definition would be liberally and fairly made, but he knows very well that you cannot have two supreme authorities in a country; and as in the great American Civil War it was the Federal Government and the Federal Legislature which found it necessary to take into its own hands the circumscription of the liberties of the States, and the solution of the controversy which had formerly been raised on that subject; so it is quite plain that if there is to be an Assembly in Ireland such as he desires, and an Assembly in England also, one of those must be paramount, and the one which has the power of defining and of drawing the line between the provinces of the two will be possessed of paramount authority. My hon. and learned Friend told us explicitly his view of the relations that should exist between the two.

MR. BUTT: I should be very sorry to be misunderstood on this question. I do not suggest that the Imperial Parliament should have power from time to time of defining what the power of the Irish Assembly should be. I propose that that definition should be made once and for ever. Exactly as in the American Constitution, the separate Provinces of the State Legislatures and of the Federal Union were defined once and for ever.

MR. GLADSTONE: My hon. and learned Friend does not mend the matter at all by that, for that is just what the American Constitution failed to define; that is precisely the point that is left in doubt, and dispute, and difficulty, and which no man could solve—the point, namely, as to the division of authority between the Federal Legislature and the Legislatures of the States. That was the subject of controversy between American statesmen for two generations, and it was the solution of that question which was the great cause of the American War. My hon. and learned Friend does not mend his argument in the least when he says he would have federal arrangements made once for all. How is there to be a federal arrangement between this Parliament, which is Imperial and supreme to all intents and purposes, and any other body whatever within the area of the United Kingdom? But I will not endeavour to develop my hon. and learned Friend's thoughts further than he developed them himself; but unquestionably he said—and I am sure he said it in good faith—that the Imperial Parliament was to be supreme in the last resort. Those were his words, and with those words I will leave that part of the question. Then he expressed—as warmly as any of us could express—his desire that the Irish people should be induced and habituated to look to the two Houses of Parliament for the redress of Irish grievances, and he told us also the mode in which he wished to deal on the part of his Home Rule Association with Fenianism in Ireland. He evidently regards his Home Rule Association as the means of reclaiming from Fenianism those who unfortunately have been dragged into it. If he has to deal with Fenians they are converted Fenians, and I have no doubt he will labour assiduously in their conversion. I commend the subject of his American illustration to his further meditations, and I am sure he will find I am perfectly right when I say it is idle to suppose you can have existing in a country two separate Legislatures co-ordinate in power. There must lie somewhere in the last resort an appeal to that supreme authority which in case of necessity holds in its hands the solution of every problem that may arise. No doubt it is the virtue of a truly free country to multiply subaltern authorities, and subaltern authorities not with powers granted in a narrow spirit of egotism, but making local government and local institutions strong to the uttermost point of the strength which they can develop, and finding in that strength of local authorities and in that development of local government the surest source of strength for the Central Government. That is the spirit in which the supreme authority of the Imperial authority would always be exercised. Now I come to a point on which I differ greatly from my hon. and learned Friend and from some of those who followed him, and that is their statement of the operation of the Act, the repeal of which is now in question. That is a very simple matter. I may quote the authority of my hon. and learned Friend himself, who says the Act is intended to prevent the people from meeting together legitimately and legally, and that has been the burden and strain of several of the speeches which we have heard to-night. Those who listened to my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland could not fail to observe that the Act from beginning to end makes no reference to public meetings—it nowhere interferes with them—it does not touch them at all. The nearest approach to it is a declaration to the contrary effect in the 4th section, where it says that nothing in the Act contained shall be construed to prevent or impede the undoubted right of all the subjects of the Realm to petition for the redress of any public or private grievance, and as the right to petition and the right of public meeting are inseparably connected together, it is not too much to say that the right of public meeting is recognized by this very Act. At any rate, let it be understood that we are not debating a question which has any relation to the right of public meeting. One hon. Gentleman said this Act aimed at repressing the expression of opinion; but that is not so. What it aims at is the assumption of authority. The constitution of representative assemblies may be a matter of very small political consequence. I fully admit that; and that when an Act of this kind is passed you may know it is extended to the extreme of its theoretical meaning, and the extension of it applies to organizations which are perfectly harmless. It is not changes in the law which this Act seems to contemplate, but alterations of matters established by law in Church and State. Well, is it really true that political liberty under all circumstances requires that the law should permit of the constitution of these representative assemblies by voluntary delegation? It is plain that assemblies so constituted assume the appearance of rival Legislatures. That is what they aim at; and I think it is too much to state that freedom cannot prevail except where it is possible for individuals to associate themselves by the methods of representation and in the very manner prescribed by the constitution of the Legislature of the country. My hon. and learned Friend says that if there were such a law as this in Naples, we should have the British Minister protesting against it; but, Sir, I am not aware that any British Minister or writer ever made a protest upon such a subject. I believe if he had done so he would have exposed himself to merited ridicule and the interests of this country to serious detriment. Such subjects, however, are entirely beyond our province. The real strength of the case is this—that you have no such law in England, and you say—“If you mean to have equal laws for England and Ireland repeal the law in Ireland.” Well, Sir, England is a country where, happily, not only the laws which belong to freedom, but the habits and usages and traditions of freedom, combined with order, are more firmly established than in any other great country in the world, and under these circumstances England can bear laws which, perhaps, it requires more consideration and deliberation to apply to other countries. I do not say that that of itself is a reason why this should be applied to Ireland; but let us see if there is anything open to just exception in the course taken by my noble Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland. He expressed a hope that the time would soon come when this law could be repealed: is there anything unreasonable in saying that the time has not yet arrived? We are told that we ought to have the same laws in England and Ireland. I rather doubt whether that is a formula which ought to be adopted as entirely secure from danger. That we ought to have laws conceived in the same spirit for England and Ireland is not a formula at all, but a broad and deep principle of policy, and one which leaves you free to take into view the history and exigencies of the country. But when you say there should be the same laws, you almost seem to assent that you will have no regard to those difficulties, but that in a spirit of political pedantry, or with an unworthy regard for popularity, you will literally transfer to one country whatever you find in the other. What have we done in this Parliament? We have not made the same laws for England and Ireland. We have abolished the Established Church of Ireland; we have not abolished the Established Church in England. [Cheers.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite appear to think that I have communicated to them a piece of intelligence of which they were formerly not in full possession. After the Church Act we proceeded to make a Land Law for Ireland. We have no such Land Law for England. I will repeat that the laws for the two countries should be conceived in the same spirit; but it is decidedly unnecessary that they should bear the same shape, and I quote these two great statutes to show that Parliament has not hesitated to give to Ireland laws more popular and liberal than laws which prevail in England. That is an application of the principle of which I speak. With regard to this particular Act, I believe it is too much to say that there is no law in England of the same tendency, and standing on the same basis. But, assuming that this law of Ireland does contain what is not in the law of England, is that unreasonable? Have we been able during the last 25 years, with regard to questions bearing upon public order, to apply the principle of identical legislation? Look back 20 years to the stormy period of Lord Clarendon's rule, when it was found necessary by the Government of the country to apply this law. It has been argued that the law failed because there was a rebellion in 1848; but my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Serjeant Sherlock) might as well argue that the laws against murder had failed because of the murder in Park Lane. It may be true that there was a rebellion in 1848, and also that this law materially diminished the proportions of the rebellion. Not very long afterwards the Fenian conspiracy was hatched, and from the year 1861 onwards, when the American War gave it additional scope, it assumed proportions of public danger. With that danger the strength of the country easily dealt; but it proved itself to be a reality to our fellow-subjects in Canada. My hon. and learned Friend says we do not want an Act of this description to deal with the Fenian representative body; nor do we, if it would avow Fenianism in all its public proceedings. But the argument is, that a representative body of this kind may be used as a cover under which treasonable proceedings may be concealed. I rejoice that we have in my hon. and learned Friend and his coadjutors and allies assistants as earnest as ourselves in the disposition to oppose this mischievous delusion. Let us consider the course which this House has found it necessary to take. In 1866 it was obliged to suspend the law of Habeas Corpus, and in 1868 to extend the suspension, and since then we have been obliged to pass a Peace Preservation Act, which is still in force, and which deals with matters appertaining to political liberty in a manner which is not recognized in England. Therefore, do not let us hug ourselves with impressions that do not correspond with reality. We must admit, with deep regret, that we have not reached the time when we could safely and prudently venture to apply the entire identity of political legislation to Ireland which I believe every man in this House desires. I think it has been shown in the first place, that the question is not one of the expression of public opinion, or the right of the people to meet; and, in the second place, that that assumption of authority, which is an essential property and characteristic of these quasi-representative assemblies, although it may be safe in certain States of highly advanced civilization, is not to be too hastily and universally assumed to be applicable to every country in the world. These are grounds which I hope will be well understood, and which I believe to be entirely consistent with the absolute demands of duty on the part of the Government in the interests of peace and security, as well as with the firmest adherence to the principle of desiring to remove at the earliest moment possible every provision from the statute book which can suggest to the minds of the Irish people the idea of political inferiority.

SIR JOHN GRAY, as an advocate of Home Rule, was pleased to recognize in the speech of the Prime Minister the broad principle on which its advocates based their demand, and would at once admit that this law was wanted in the first instance to meet the revolutionary tendencies of a great part of the Irish people; but that, he contended, was not the purpose to which it had since been applied. He wished, in the next place, briefly to refer to the remarks which had fallen from a former Chief Secretary for Ireland (Colonel Wilson-Patten), who asked for an instance in which the Act which it was now sought to repeal had ever been used for the purpose of suppressing the free expression of opinion. He would inform the right hon. Gentleman that it had been so used in 1812 in the case of the prosecution of Thomas Kirwan for attending a meeting held for the purpose of petitioning Parliament for the repeal of the laws affecting Roman Catholics, Lord Fingall, who was certainly no revolutionist, being in the chair. A resolution was on that occasion moved to the effect that every man had a right to worship God according to his conscience, and that it was wrong for any Government to inflict penalties on him for the exercise of that right. The Attorney General of the day, in commenting on the resolution, spoke of it as an attempt to impress on the minds of the Roman Catholics of Ireland that they were suffering from pains and penalties under the law, and under those circumstances it was that Thomas Kirwan had been found guilty. [Colonel Wilson-Patten observed that what he had said was, that the Act had not been put in force for several years past.] But it might be put in force at any time, and he should like to know whether such a law ought to be allowed any longer to remain on the statute book?

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN thought that that case had happened so long since as to be almost out of date.

SIR DOMINIC CORRIGAN said, the present was not the first time that, looking on a question from an impartial point of view, he had come to the conclusion that both sides in the discussion were in the wrong. He had tried to discover, not which was the better, but which was the less worse of the two. On the one side, he saw no opportunity at present of redressing those grievances; and on the other, he felt, from the manner in which the question was regarded, that there was no man in that House but would vote for what was good for Ireland and good for the United Kingdom. He had, however, a reason for voting for the Motion of the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. P. Smyth)— though the grievance involved was not one of a practical, but a sentimental character—which had not been yet stated. It was that he was anxious to take away from the Home Rule Association their greatest grievance, for there was nothing on which people in Ireland throve as on grievances. He was greatly pleased at the tone in which the subject had been discussed on both sides of the House, and if any danger should arise, as was suggested, from the repeal of the Act, there need be no hesitation in coming to Parliament and asking for its re-enactment. It was said that this was a sentimental grievance; but the same argument would have equally applied against repealing the Ecclesiastical Titles Act. If the Act which it was now proposed to repeal had done no harm and could do no harm to Ireland, let the Government boldly propose a similar measure for England, so as, at all events, to give both countries equal laws. If it was said that there was disaffection in Ireland there was none in England, he would ask hon. Members who dwelt upon the existence of Fenianism in the former country whether they had never heard of Republicanism in the latter? He believed the proposal now made to be inopportune; but if a division were taken, he must vote for his hon. Friend the Member for Westmeath.

Sir John Gray

MR. MAGUIRE said, that the Motion was a challenge to the House to do away with a law affecting Ireland which did not exist in England, and he thought that a fair proposal. He desired to proclaim his connection with the Home Rule organization, and to protest against the unfairness of any sweeping taunt of disloyalty, come from whom it might, being cast against men who were as loyal as any who sat on the Treasury Bench. They were not Fenians—they were not disloyal men; but the demand for Home Rule was one that they would make, and, with God's help, would in time make successfully. Their efforts might form the subject of the Attorney General's jesting; but if the right hon. Gentleman was kept off the Bench for a few years there was every chance that he would shortly change his tone. That the feeling of Ireland was getting stronger and stronger upon this point the continued exclusion of the second Irish Law Officer of the Crown from Parliament was sufficient to prove. When the time was ripe for the discussion of that question they would meet face to face any man on the Treasury Bench, however eminent. The challenge, however, he had now thrown down was neither unjust nor inopportune. The Irish people were not, as the hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin appeared to think, mere grievance mongers. [Sir DOMINIC CORRIGAN: I never said anything of the kind.] That, at all events, was the impression which his hon. Friend's speech had left upon his mind. All that they asked now was that a hardship not inflicted upon the one country should be removed from the other, and he could not help thinking that it betrayed a sort of moral cowardice in England to refuse to accede to a claim which was just in itself, and which might be granted without even the slightest shadow of danger.

CHURCH SEATS BILL—(No. 59.) (The Earl Nelson.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clause 1 (Short Title).

Clause 2 (Promoters of new churches may declare that seats shall be free and unappropriated).

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, he objected to this clause altogether. It might become necessary for the maintenance of the church that a scale of pew rents should be appointed; but if this clause stood part of the Bill there would be a perpetual prohibition of any pew rents. He therefore moved that the clause be omitted, and that the following be inserted in its stead:—

"It shall be lawful for the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, in the exercise and fulfilment of the powers and duties conferred or imposed upon them by the Acts administered by them or any or either of the same Acts, to accept a church site under a grant or conveyance in which it is declared that the pews or seats in the church erected or to be erected on the same site, or some specified portion of the same pews or seats, shall not for the space of thirty years be let for any payment of money, and thereupon it shall be unlawful to let the same pews or seats, or portion of the same, for payment of money during the aforesaid period: Provided always, that at any time during or subsequent to the expiration in any case of the aforesaid period of thirty years, if the bishop of the diocese in which such church is situate shall see fit, a scale of pew rents may be appointed in the same church, by and under the authority of an instrument executed by the said Commissioners with the concurrence of the patron of the church."

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK said, he would support the Amendment of the noble Duke. He objected to the erection of any churches in which the churchwardens would not be able to exercise the power they now had by the law of the land of seating the worshippers in seemly order.

EARL NELSON would point out to the most rev. Primate that the 5th clause of this Bill expressly reserved power to the churchwardens or other authorized persons of regulating the temporary occupation of church seats, so as that due order and decorum may be observed during the time of Divine worship. The latter part of the noble Duke's clause would utterly defeat the object of the Bill, which would entirely fall to the ground if that Proviso were carried.

THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE asked their Lordships how the Bill would operate if a wealthy man were building and endowing a church, laying it down as a condition that the seats should not be appropriated as now by the churchwardens. Any alteration in the law would require careful consideration; but if properly guarded it was a privilege which a number of persons throughout the country anxiously desired, and with the concession of which they should be gratified.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that if their Lordships should create a perpetuity it might cause great inconvenience, and perhaps lead to the scandal of resorting to a special Act of Parliament to set aside the will of some generous benefactor of the Church.

The Duke of Marlborough

THE BISHOP OF GLOUCESTER AND BRISTOL begged their Lordships to observe that while the Amendment of the noble Duke provided that no money should pass, it did not bind the churchwardens to appropriate seats as they presently did.

THE BISHOP OF WINCHESTER thought it was not desirable that the whole area of a church should be open to be scrambled for by the congregation. He said so in the interest of the poor, for no persons were so modest in the way of not taking good seats as the poor. It was, therefore, advisable to keep them from being continually thrust out by the accidental presence of richer and better dressed people. If there was no appropriation of seats poor men and their families would go to the worst part of the church or out of it altogether.

After some further discussion,

EARL NELSON said, he would accept the first portion of the noble Duke's Amendment down to the word "period," but omitting the words "for the space of 30 years." But he could not consent to adopt that part of the Amendment commencing with the words "Provided always."

Original clause withdrawn.

After some discussion, the words "for the space of 30 years" were struck out of the first paragraph of the Amendment; which was then agreed to. The second paragraph, containing the Proviso, was withdrawn, and the following words substituted:—

"Provided always, that if at any time the bishop of the diocese in which the said church is situate shall see fit, a scale of pew rents may be appropriated in the same church for a portion of the sittings, not exceeding one half, by and under the authority of an instrument executed by the said Commissioners with the concurrence of the patron of the said church."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3 (Free and unappropriated seats to be no impediment to acceptance of sites or consecration of churches) struck out.

Clause 4 (Church seats free and unappropriated for three years to so remain).

EARL GREY moved to leave out the clause, and insert—

"In churches in which seats have been let or appropriated, the churchwardens shall be entitled to direct that such seats shall be given to persons unprovided with places if they should remain unoccupied when the officiating clergyman begins to read the service."

Amendment amended and agreed to.

Clause 5 (Saving rights of ordinary and churchwardens to keep order).

REMOVAL OF NAVAL COLLEGE, PORTSMOUTH.—QUESTION.—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE said, he was about to put a Question which was one of considerable importance to naval officers and had direct reference to the efficiency of the Navy generally. It was, whether in the Navy they were to have a high-class scientific and philosophical education at the expense of personal experience? Now, he had a great idea of the importance of imparting a high-class and scientific education to our naval officers; but he did not hesitate to say that if it could only be given at the expense of a practical knowledge of seamanship he would have nothing to do with it. High-class education of that kind never yet made an officer or a sailor; nor would it ever prevent a ship from going on shore. It was commonly said that the status of education among naval officers was low; but he begged to dispute that assertion. They came into the Navy very young, and from his experience as Superintendent of the College of Portsmouth for five years he could say that not more than one boy out of eight who came into the Navy from the large schools could pass in the common examinations of reading, writing, and arithmetic if they went up direct. None of them could pass without a "cram." But it frequently occurred in the case of young men who had served in the Navy for a few years and then left it, that they were next heard of as taking high honours at the University. He did not know how that was done; but he thought it, too, must be done by cramming. He had never known an instance of a high-class University man becoming a naval officer; but he had known many instances of young men who, after having entered the Navy, took high-class honours at the University and attained to the most exalted positions in the Church and the State, and even becoming Members of their Lordships' House. He might point to his noble and learned Friend on the front bench as an example.

LORD CHELMSFORD: I am sure my noble and gallant Friend will forgive me for interrupting him to say that I went into the Navy before examinations were instituted. I underwent no examination.

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE: However that might be, his noble and learned Friend was an example of a man who had attained a high position in the State after having been in the Navy. The Naval College at Portsmouth was an extremely useful institution if it was desirable that naval officers should have an opportunity of keeping up and improving their professional knowledge. The Government, it was understood, were about to remove the College for the education of Naval Officers from Portsmouth, where it had been established for very many years, and which might be called the very centre of the Navy, to Greenwich, which was now totally unconnected with the Navy; and he wanted very much to know the reasons which had induced the Government to form that determination. One of those reasons was said to be that at Portsmouth there was no school of naval architecture; but there had been, although it had been removed. In Portsmouth could be seen everything connected with the Navy; they might see the drawings of ships as sent down from the Admiralty—ships in mould—the first plate of their bottom laid—ships launched, rigged, manned, armed, and made ready for sea. Instruction could be got in gunnery; he could witness the manœuvring of ships, taking them in and out of harbour in bad weather; he might see a squadron getting under weigh, and taking up position; he might observe the foreign men-of-war that visited the port—in short, he might obtain practical insight into every point that a naval officer ought to be acquainted with. At Greenwich all these opportunities would be taken away. It was, as he had said, totally unconnected with the Navy. There had been dockyards there—one on either side—but the Government had sold them, one of them being converted into an immense slaughterhouse for foreign cattle. He thought the removal of the College from Portsmouth to Greenwich would be highly detrimental to the efficiency of naval officers. He therefore wished to ask the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Camperdown), Upon what grounds the Government have or intend to remove the College for the instruction of naval officers from Portsmouth (where they have every opportunity of improving and keeping up their professional knowledge) to Greenwich, where they will be entirely separated from the Navy?

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, he wished to put another Question in connection with the same subject, so that the noble Earl (the Earl of Camperdown) might answer both at the same time. There were three systems of education in the Navy which, so far as he understood, were now to be interfered with. One was for the education of the naval cadets. He believed that was to be materially altered. That system of education was carried on at Dartmouth, and it would be very undesirable to bring it into a large town such as either Greenwich or Portsmouth. Young lads should not be exposed to contamination in large towns; they had, therefore, been placed in a port where their education was going on with much satisfaction; but that, it appeared, was to be altered. Greenwich was so close to London as to be almost part of it. The next Question was, what was to be done with the School of Naval Architecture which had been established at Kensington—the object of which was to admit shipwrights from the dockyards, and to enable young men to be instructed for the general shipbuilding service of the country. When removed to Greenwich would it be open to the private trade as well as to the Royal Navy? The third Question had reference to the officers who were at present studying at Portsmouth. They had now the great advantage not only of studying under scientific professors, but of seeing the practical application of their studies in the dockyard. He did not mean to say that the removal of the College to Greenwich might not be justified on some grounds; but he wanted to know the scheme of Her Majesty's Government with regard to these three departments of naval education.

LORD DUNSANY said, he was not surprised that the Government, finding themselves in possession of a large unoccupied palace, conceived the idea of applying it to naval purposes, and determined to establish a Naval College. But if it were a mere question of economy, he very much doubted whether it would not, after all, be less expensive to enlarge the present building in Portsmouth Dockyard than to adapt Greenwich Hospital to the purposes of a Naval College. Greenwich was too near London to be a suitable place for the College. True it was also near the Admiralty; but that was, perhaps, the greatest of all objections to it. The Admiralty was fast becoming a Department of the House of Commons, and he could not imagine a greater misfortune for the country than that it should have a House of Commons navy out of which the true naval element should have been almost obliterated. It was exceedingly important, when they were constantly building new ships, that fresh experience of them should be obtained by the officers of the Navy, and it was by being on the spot and going out on trial trips that they could ascertain how these monsters were to be handled. Another new department of naval science had recently sprung up—he alluded to the torpedo department; and young men being educated for the Navy would have no good opportunity of gaining practical knowledge in that department, or in seeing how the present large guns were put on board of the ships. As for Greenwich Hospital, it did not follow that if it were not made use of for purposes connected with the Navy, it might not be devoted to some other national purpose.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, that the apprehension felt by the noble Earl (the Earl of Lauderdale) as to the removal of the Naval College to Greenwich, must have been caused by his non-acquaintance with the details of the proposed arrangement, and with the extent to which it was proposed to move the College to Greenwich; and he trusted that the explanation he had to give would have the effect of diminishing some of the noble Earl's objections to the change. During the last 20 years two views as to the proper method of naval instruction had undergone much discussion. One view was that it was absolutely necessary that a naval officer should throughout his career remain in connection with his profession, and be as much as possible surrounded by his brother officers. On the other hand, it was contended that the general education to be obtained during the period when an officer was not employed was not of less value than the advantage to be gained by his being surrounded during his whole career by naval officers and naval associations. The career of education might be conveniently divided into three periods. The first was that when the cadet, having passed the examination for entering the Navy, was obliged to prepare for active duty. The second period was when having attained the rank of acting sub-lieutenant, he was obliged to prepare himself again for examination in gunnery and navigation; and the third period embraced the remainder of his career, and included his going to College and obtaining the instruction provided by the authorities. The question as to the best means and best place for the education of naval cadets had been considered by the Admiralty for a long time, and although he was not in a position to state what measures would be adopted, he might state that one measure which would not be adopted would be sending the cadets to Greenwich. The second portion of a naval officer's education was also a period of compulsory education; because it was not possible that a young naval officer out with the Fleet at sea could come home prepared to pass his examinations without further instruction, and in this part of the education the practical course of study of gunnery would not in any way be interfered with. Those of their Lordships who had been brought up to a naval career would admit that the Excellent constituted the finest school of gunnery in the world, and no persons were less disposed than the present Board of Admiralty to interfere with the practical course of that instruction. The number of the pupils now studying at the College was, on the average, from 25 to 30 young sub-lieutenants, four or five lieutenants studying for commissions in the Royal Marine Artillery, from five to eight lieutenants preparing themselves for gunnery lieutenants, two commanders, and two captains. The Staff connected with the College, though not numerous, had been most active in promoting the education of the young men and officers; but he was perfectly willing to allow that at the present time the provision for the higher education of naval officers was not sufficient, considering the importance of the Navy to England; and without new instruction and additional lectures the desired result could not be properly attained. The noble Earl said that it would be easy to increase the accommodation in the College. However, as the College was situated in a corner of the Dockyard, there would be great difficulty in increasing the accommodation to any extent, and at present it was insufficient for the purpose for which it was wanted. He would not deny that Portsmouth had considerable advantages over other sites for a Naval College, in affording a facility for officers to witness the sea trials of new ships, and in having the Dockyard close at hand; but he did not think that any attendance in the Dockyard was absolutely enjoined. With regard to obtaining the attendance of superior Professors, Greenwich would possess considerable advantages over Portsmouth; and if the expectations of the Government were fulfilled, it was probable that a larger number of officers of various classes would attend the College than had hitherto been the case. Even granting that they were cut off from association with Portsmouth—which would not be entirely the case, because by far the greater number of sub-lieutenants would have to go to Portsmouth to go through their course in the Excellent—the number of persons associated together could not be said to be removed from the influence of their profession. If at Greenwich they would not have the advantage of a dockyard, they would, at all events, have the great advantage of being near Shoeburyness. Officers, therefore, educating at Greenwich would have the advantage of seeing the trials of heavy gunnery—an advantage not obtainable at Greenwich or elsewhere. It was urged in opposition to fixing upon Greenwich as the site of a Naval College that it was too near London, and that the allurements of the metropolis would be too much for the younger naval officers. There was, however, the security that the younger naval officers would be under the necessity of attending lectures; while, in the next place, it had been found by experience that at Woolwich, which was almost equally near London, the officers who went there to be educated were not unwilling to avail themselves of the advantages which had been offered to them. Even granting the justice of all that had been said by the noble Earl on that point, would he, he would ask, undertake to say that there were none of those allurements at Portsmouth to which he objected in the case of Greenwich? He had spoken hitherto only of the executive officers of the Navy; but there was a most important class of officers who were being educated in our Dockyards, and very few of whom had an opportunity of obtaining any higher education, whom it was essential that we should have educated in the most effective manner. He alluded to the engineer officers. As matters at present stood, after open competition at the Dockyards, and after passing a few years there, about eight annually out of about 40 were sent to South Kensington for a period of three years. The probability was that, instead of a small number of those officers being sent to South Kensington in future, they would all in some form or other have the advantage of a higher education at the Naval College at Greenwich. As regarded the School of Naval Architecture, the students were educated at the Dockyards in very much the same manner as the engineers, and only two of the most promising, selected by examination, were sent up to South Kensington. For those persons also it was proposed to provide in the new Naval College at Greenwich. The naval models at South Kensington, which were of the highest interest and value, had been referred to, and that collection it was intended to remove to Greenwich. In that way, by the concentration of officers, lectures, and models, that improvement might be obtained which he thought it was most desirable in the interest of the service should, if possible, be effected. It had been asked whether it was proposed to proceed in the same manner as hitherto with respect to the architects in private trades? He had no doubt the First Lord of the Admiralty would seriously consider the proposal which had been made to him by the committee which had been charged with preparing the new arrangements for the College at Greenwich. He did not, he might add, think it improbable that his right hon. Friend (Mr. Goschen) would accede to the proposition that the same advantages should be held out to those in private trades as to others. The whole subject, he might add, had been most seriously canvassed, both in the naval Press and by the country generally, for the last two years, and it could not, he thought, be denied that on the whole there was a growing opinion that Greenwich was the most eligible site for the establishment of a new Naval College. He wished to repeat that there was no desire on the part of the Admiralty to substitute theoretical for practical education in the Navy. The First Lord of the Admiralty was fully alive to the necessity of promoting in the highest degree the qualities of seamanship and physical superiority among the officers of the service, and he could assure the noble Earl that in any arrangement which might be made the continuance of the connection of a sailor with the sea and with the active duties of his profession would be duly looked after and provided for.

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE reminded the noble Earl that the trials at Shoeburyness to which he had referred were simply the trials of new guns; while at Portsmouth an officer would have the opportunity of seeing the actual practice from the forts, as well as of going out to sea in ships which carried large guns. As to the enlargement of the College at Portsmouth, it was a matter about which there was no difficulty. It might be carried out for a less sum than that which would have to be expended at Greenwich. It had been stated that the general opinion was, that Greenwich was the best place for a naval University. He could only say that he had spoken to a great many naval officers with respect to it, and that he had not heard one of them express an opinion that Greenwich was a better site than Portsmouth.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN repeated that it was not intended in any way to interfere with the practical education of naval officers. He would, however, add, that in the statement which he had made he had perhaps gone further in some respects than he ought to have done, inasmuch as the subject was still under the consideration of the First Lord of the Admiralty. He believed, at the same time, that all that he had stated would be found to be perfectly correct.

EXTRADITION OF CRIMINALS.

ADDRESS FOR RETURNS.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY, in moving that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Returns stating the number and nature of all Treaties or Conventions at present in force with Foreign States for the Extradition of Criminals, said, that public attention had been directed to this subject by the circumstances connected with the arrest of Marguerite Dixblanc in Paris for a murder committed in this country. But, as it seemed to him, hardly a crumb of information was supplied with regard to these treaties. In 1870 the then Attorney General (Sir Robert Collier) brought forward an Extradition Bill, and in the course of his speech stated that while France had 53 Extradition Treaties and the United States nearly as many, this country had only three. Now, so far as he (the Earl of Rosebery) could gather, at the time the Attorney General spoke England had in fact four Treaties of Extradition with foreign Powers—one with Russia made in 1842, one with France in 1842, one with Denmark in 1862, and one with Prussia in 1864. It was quite possible that as their continuance depended on the will of the high contracting parties, some of these might have ceased to be operative; but, at any rate, it was important that information should be supplied as to which of them still remained in force. During the two years which had elapsed since the Extradition Bill was introduced, a new Attorney General had come into office, but the country had obtained a very small increase of information. Their Lordships might possibly be aware that in the course of some recent proceedings in the Court of Queen's Bench arising out of the protracted trial that had recently absorbed so much of the public attention the Attorney General said we had not a Treaty of Extradition with America. Mr. Justice Blackburn, apparently overcome with astonishment, said—"Not with America!" The Attorney General replied—"No; but negotiations are going on, and I hope there will soon be one." Mr. Justice Blackburn asked, whether the time had expired? and the Attorney General said he was not sure, but that a proposal was pending to extend the time. But the Act of Parliament founded on the Treaty with America provided that the treaty should continue in force till one or the other of the signatories gave notice to the contrary. There was no limitation of time, therefore, in the treaty, and the period of its continuance could not be "extended." When such vague statements were made in quarters which they would assume to be well-informed, their Lordships were justified in turning from these doctors who disagreed and in applying to the Foreign Office for information. There could be no object in keeping those treaties secret. Indeed, the events of the last two years had made secret treaties rather out of fashion. The publication of Extradition Treaties must surely be useful and necessary. A forger, for example, if he found that he would leave these shores only to be brought back in handcuffs, would perhaps hesitate before committing such a crime. The knowledge that treaties of this kind existed must have a repressive effect on some crimes, like forgery, which were committed with premeditation. On inquiry it might be found that more Extradition Treaties existed than the Attorney General supposed, and that they had a Treaty with America, for if not they might as well give up the system of Extradition Treaties altogether. He trusted that the Government would grant the modest request he now made for information on a subject than which few were more important, and certainly none were more obscure.

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Returns stating the number and nature of all treaties or conventions at present in force with foreign states for the extradition of criminals.—(The Earl of Rosebery.)

EARL GRANVILLE said, he must express his satisfaction that the subject had been brought forward by the noble Earl—first, because his noble Friend had, as yet, but seldom availed himself of his opportunities for adding to the sufficient, though few, proofs he had already given of his power to take a most important part in their Lordships' discussions; and, secondly, because Her Majesty's Government were willing to afford all the information in their power upon a subject which, at the present time, occupied so much of the public attention. Not knowing that his noble Friend would refer to the Attorney General, he had not been able to communicate with him, and could not, therefore, say what his hon. and learned Friend had stated to the Court of Queen's Bench in reference to these treaties, or whether he had been correctly reported. He (Earl Granville) must, therefore, confine himself to giving the information asked for. Three Extradition Treaties were now in existence—one with France, one with the United States, and one with Denmark. That with the United States comprised charges of murder, attempts to murder, piracy, arson, robbery, forgery, and frauds by means of forged documents. The treaties with France and Denmark comprised murder, attempts to murder, forgery, and fraudulent bankruptcy. There was also a Treaty of Extradition with China; but it was of a different character from those existing with the countries he had just mentioned. The principle on which the three treaties to which he referred rested was that any demand for the surrender of a person accused of crime should be made through the diplomatic agents of the country requiring it, and that the surrender should only be made after the commission of the crime had been so established as that the laws of the country to which the fugitive had escaped would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial if the crime had been there committed. In the case of Denmark there was an exception as to the surrender of natives of Denmark. No such provision existed in the treaties with the United States or with France. As to the former, neither the Americans nor ourselves could hesitate about giving up natives, for the identity of language would make it difficult, if not impracticable, to enforce such a provision. As to the French, the case had never arisen. The belief was that France would be opposed to the surrender of natives—the universal principle adopted on the Continent of Europe being that a native subject of any State could not be surrendered by the State. Besides these treaties, powers of surrendering criminals were exercised between some of our colonies and neighbouring territories; but these were not treaties; they were separate legislative enactments. With regard to Prussia, an Extradition Treaty was concluded in 1864, and in 1852 one was made with France; but in neither case did the Government succeed in obtaining the sanction of Parliament, and therefore the treaties remained inoperative. Two years ago a difficulty arose with France, as to certifying the depositions taken, but by subsequent legislation that difficulty was removed. His noble Friend (the Earl of Rosebery) was correct in stating that no time was limited in the treaty with the United States, that treaty being terminable at any time by six months' notice from either of the two signatories. A treaty with Germany was now almost on the point of being signed; but delay had arisen entirely through the difficulty which English lawyers and foreign jurists experienced in defining the crimes to which the treaty applied; but he hoped that no long time would elapse before those difficulties were overcome. All these treaties were terminable at six months' notice. He had no doubt that other countries would follow the good example which had been set with regard to those treaties, the value of which his noble Friend had not, in the slightest degree, overrated.

PACIFIC ISLANDERS PROTECTION

BILL—(No. 90.)

(The Earl of Kimberley.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that those of their Lordships who had read the Papers which had been presented to Parliament on this subject would agree with him in opinion that legislation had been made imperatively necessary by the circumstances which had arisen in late years. The great extension of communication with the South Sea Islands and their rapid colonization by Europeans had brought about a state of things which did not exist a few years ago. At present there was a great desire that those colonies which were suited to the growth of tropical products should be supplied with labour other than that of Whites, and Polynesian labourers were in great demand for that purpose. This immigration of Polynesian labourers was confined principally to the colony of Queensland and the settlements in the Fiji Islands. The immigration to Queensland had been placed under strict regulations by the law of the colony, which provided on the whole in an effective manner for the protection of the labourers who had arrived in the colony. Some doubt had been expressed on that point; but as far as he had been able to learn from various sources, and especially from his noble Friend the Marquess of Normanby, who had lately gone out as Governor, there existed a real desire on the part of the Colonial Legislature to make efficacious provision for the protection of the labourers, and if further legislation should be required no indisposition would be found to pass more effectual and stringent laws. But, of course, the Legislature of Queensland could make regulations only with regard to the labourers who had come to the colony and the vessels which arrived within their ports and came under their own jurisdiction. But a system had grown up of late by which vessels belonging—he was afraid to a great extent—to the subjects of Her Majesty went to the South Sea Islands, decoyed the natives on board, or frequently carried them on board by force, and conveyed them to the settlement in the Fiji Islands, over which the Queensland Legislature had no control whatever, and where no sufficient regulations for the protection of these poor men existed. He would not weary their Lordships with an account of the atrocities committed in the course of this traffic. The masters of vessels who had engaged to procure a certain number of labourers were not likely to be exceedingly scrupulous as to the manner in which those labourers might be obtained: and if their Lordships could conceive how extremely numerous were the persons engaged in this business, how varied their influence, and how many opportunities they had of evading any regulations which Her Majesty's cruisers might attempt to enforce, they would feel no surprise that very great evils had grown up. He could not help referring here to what he might term the crowning atrocity of the murder of Bishop Patteson. He called it "the crowning atrocity," not because he laid such great blame upon the islanders, though they had been guilty of an inhuman and cruel act, by which they had themselves sustained the greatest loss, as on that system of kidnapping which had led to the loss of a valued friend—for the late Bishop had been a valued friend of his—and he could affectionately testify to the value of his services in the sphere to which he was called. Nothing could have been more melancholy. Here was a man who had devoted his whole life to the spread of Christianity and civilization, and to the improvement in every way of the natives of these islands. We had the strongest testimony that the Bishop was universally loved and regarded by the natives with the utmost veneration, and such was the influence which he had acquired over them that whatever he did or recommended was received with implicit trust. When a feeling of trust of that kind was once established in the minds of these uncivilized people, the revulsion was all the greater when they supposed that their trust had been misplaced. The reason why the natives believed that their confidence had been misplaced was this: These atrocious kidnappers actually made use of signals and disguises to induce the natives to think that the Bishop was about to visit them and to make them come on shipboard: but the result of the stratagem was that when they came on board they were seized and carried off to the Fiji Islands: So that when the vessel with the Bishop on board arrived, the natives, under the miserable and melancholy misapprehension that the Bishop was in reality an enemy, took their miserable revenge and took the life of their best friend. The guilt, therefore, rested not so much upon the natives as upon those treacherous traffickers who had brought about such a state of mind in these unhappy people. And here he must say that he regretted what was stated to have been done when the cruiser Rosario visited these Islands. It was necessary that the natives should be made to feel that a civilized country was strong enough to avenge any atrocity committed on its subjects. But the House would agree with him that a power of this kind should be very cautiously and sparingly used, and he was quite sure that those who had read almost the last words of Bishop Patteson himself would especially lament the steps which he was informed had been taken to avenge the murder. He was quite certain that the commander of the Rosario acted in the belief that he was only performing his duty, and he was not, therefore, disposed to cast too great blame upon him. Those who were employed at a distance from home, and who had to act often under circumstances of great difficulty, had a heavy responsibility to bear, and we should always be exceedingly careful in finding fault with them: but he was bound to say that in his opinion, if what was stated was correct, the commander of the Rosario had in this matter misapprehended his duty, and in his desire to do what he believed necessary for the protection of the lives of Her Majesty's subjects, and from no spirit of cruelty, had proceeded to measures which might leave an impression upon the minds of the natives which it was most undesirable should be produced. The Bill now before their Lordships would, he hoped, give such power to the cruisers sent to those seas as would to a considerable extent put a stop to kidnapping. At the same time, so vast was the number of these Islands, so large the region over which they extended from east to west, and so great the difficulty of detection, that even with the most active measures and the most efficient laws it would be exceedingly hard to extirpate the practice. The clauses of the Bill had been most carefully framed with a view to the necessary powers, and it was proposed to punish kidnappers in the same manner as under the Slave Trade Acts. With the co-operation of the Australian Colonies, and from the feeling expressed there, we had every reason to expect much good would be done. While the Colonial Government and Legislature would feel that a responsibility rested upon us to do whatever might be necessary, they might be fairly called upon to assist us by their laws and by enforcing the regulations which might be required. There were two or three points in which the Bill might be improved. In the passage of the measure through the other House it was pointed out that it would be very desirable that all those engaged in carrying labourers from those Islands should be licensed to do so under bond, so that no vessels not duly authorized should be allowed to take any part in the traffic. Such a provision would give much greater control over the whole system; and though it was not thought desirable to delay the Bill in the other House until a clause to give effect to that suggestion had been framed, he was happy to say he had been able to draw up a clause to carry out that object. As to the establishment of a Vice Admiralty Court in the Fiji Islands, that involved a question of great difficulty, which, he thought, ought not to be dealt with in this Bill. The establishment of such a Court might involve the assumption of jurisdiction over these Islands. He thought that after this Bill had passed we should be able by communication with the settlers in these Islands to establish a satisfactory and stringent system of punishment for these offenders, and he feared it would prejudice the opportunity of making such arrangements if our proposals were anticipated by statute. Her Majesty's Government had this most important subject at heart, and he sincerely trusted that the measures they were prepared to take would have the effect they desired.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl of Kimberley.)

THE BISHOP OF LICHFIELD expressed his thanks to Her Majesty's Government for having introduced this measure—and he might be allowed to state that he had considerable knowledge of the subject, because the miserable traffic it was sought to put down commenced under his own observation in 1848. He regarded the Bill as a useful instalment of means for preventing the continuance of this enormous and disgraceful evil. No doubt there might be some difficulty in carrying out a system of repression; especially as the natives, numbering about 1,000,000, were scattered over 500 islands; but he believed a few examples would be very effective in checking the traffic. The only just principle upon which labourers could be engaged for labour in these Islands was that of fair and well understood contracts between the white and coloured men. He thought a system similar to that adopted on the West Coast of Africa might be successful in stopping unlawful traffic. With regard to the unhappy occurrence to which the noble Earl had alluded, and as to which Papers had yet to be laid on the Table, he (the Bishop of Lichfield) visited the island 14 years ago, and, it being the most friendly in the group, it was deemed a convenient stepping-stone to some of the larger and more difficult islands. Bishop Patteson was accordingly accustomed to visit it; and he felt persuaded that his death was the result of some act of aggression by others—whether kidnapping or slaughter. The island was no larger in area than the site of the Houses of Parliament, and there being no shelter upon it the islanders could not possibly have defended themselves against a boat's crew. Why the Rosario went there he could not understand; but on a boat's crew proceeding up a narrow channel, the natives, no doubt thinking their purpose a hostile one, shot at them, and killed one of the crew, whose lives were thus unnecessarily risked. The reprisals thereupon taken were, he supposed, intended for a retaliation of that act; but this was not the way in which the dignity of the Empire or the majesty of the law should be vindicated. Such acts led the natives to regard us, though professing to be Christians, as more barbarous than themselves, and he would express a hope, as the late lamented Bishop had done, that if a missionary lost his life by violence neither the British nor any other Government would carry out any measures of revenge. Missionaries went on their own responsibility, and desired to leave persons guilty of violence towards them to the judgment of God alone.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

EPPING FOREST BILL—(No. 82.)

(The Duke of St. Albans.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE DUKE OF ST. ALBANS, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that the Bill was originally introduced in the other House, but, owing to the pressure of Business and a rule that no Opposed Business should be taken after half-past 12 o'clock, had been transferred to this House. By an Act of last Session Commissioners were appointed to prepare a scheme for the preservation of Epping Forest, and to inquire into forest lands unlawfully inclosed. It was objected during the progress of the measure that private rights were not sufficiently guarded by it; but this was owing to the absence of the notices requisite in the case of Private Bills, and an undertaking was given that the subject should be dealt with this year. The Bill was a redemption of that pledge, and though in form a Public, it was rather a Private one. The Select Committee to which he hoped it would be referred would have power not only over its clauses, but over its principle, and would be able to hear all parties concerned. The Metropolitan Board of Works had undertaken to carry out the projected scheme, and the Government had no interest in the matter, except that the question should be fully considered and all parties heard. It was unnecessary, therefore, for him to offer any opinion on the claims of the persons holding land in the Forest.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Duke of St. Albans.)

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he was rather disappointed with the noble Duke's statement, for the undertaking on which he had waived his opposition to the second reading, and which accounted for the thin state of the House, was that the character of the Bill should be entirely altered. At present it was most violent and unconstitutional, for it proposed to refer the disputes between the Crown, a number of landowners, and the Corporation of London now pending in courts of law and equity to arbitrators, consisting of three laymen and a lawyer who had never sat on the Bench. There was to be no appeal from their decision. Now, of late years similar powers had been given to arbitrators, but always to men of high position and experience—indeed, he believed exclusively to ex-Chancellors. He had felt it his duty to resist such a proposal as worse even than the recent proposition of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack to refer the appeals of this House to barristers of 10 years' standing. It was, moreover, unexampled to refer suits of the Crown to persons appointed by the Crown and subject to dismissal by it at any moment. The undertaking given him was on the understanding that the Bill should simply suspend all these suits and actions until the Commissioners had reported and Parliament could deal more fully with the subject, and it was on this ground only that he had not persevered in the opposition he originally offered to the Bill. He hoped the Government would adhere to the arrangement for striking out all the other powers.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY disclaimed any intention of departing from the understanding alluded to by the noble Marquess. After being read the second time, it was intended that the Bill should follow the usual course of a Private Bill and should be referred to a Select Committee, and that it should be confined to suspensory clauses, pending an opportunity on the part of Parliament to deal definitely with the question.

LORD REDESDALE maintained that the Bill in its present shape should never have been introduced. Time would be saved and, perhaps, opposition removed by its withdrawal and its introduction in the shape it was intended to retain, and in that shape submitted to the Committee.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY remarked that all the notices involved in the Bill in its present shape had been issued. The Government were willing to meet the objections which had been taken, and the second reading would not hinder its taking the form now agreed on by all parties. To withdraw it would involve delay, and great hardship and inconvenience would result if no Bill was passed.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he was quite satisfied with the pledge given by the noble Earl, but would suggest, as more convenient, that the Bill should be committed pro forma and referred to the Select Committee in the shape agreed upon.

LORD REDESDALE said, he did not object to this suggestion, but thought that as the same objections were taken in the other House, the Government might have remodelled the Bill before introducing it here.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY agreed to adopt the suggestion of the noble Marquess, and that the Bill should be committed pro forma and reprinted.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

WHITSUNTIDE RECESS.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY inquired when the noble Earl proposed the House should adjourn for the holidays, and for how long?

EARL GRANVILLE said, he proposed that the House should adjourn on the 13th till the 31st instant.

House adjourned at Eight o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

INDIA—PUBLIC DOCUMENTS AND PAPERS.—QUESTION.

MR. DICKINSON asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Secretary of State for India in Council will provide the Library of the House of Commons with Copies of the printed Budget Estimates prepared by the Governor General of India in Council, and printed Copies of all Acts and Regulations passed by the various Indian Governments since and including the official year 1870, and of all existing Rules regulating the appointment, salaries, pensions, and furlough of officers employed in the various branches of the Public Service in India or in England; and also periodically, when and as the same are received from India, or as soon after as practicable, Copies of all such printed Budget Estimates, Acts, Regulations, Rules, Reports, and other printed public documents, not of a secret or confidential nature, as may, in the opinion of the Secretary of State for India, be necessary to enable Members of Parliament to understand the administration of the Government of India?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, we shall do with much pleasure what my hon. Friend proposes.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—IRISH POST-MASTERS.—QUESTION.

MR. G. BROWNE asked the Postmaster General, Whether, having regard to the great amount of business transacted in the Post Offices throughout Ireland, he will consent to take into consideration the claims of the Postmasters for an increase of salary?

MR. MONSELL said, in reply, that the salaries of all postmasters in the United Kingdom were regulated according to the extent of the amount of business transacted in their offices, and precisely the same standard was applied to Irish as to English and Scotch postmasters. Salaries were being continually readjusted. Whenever a post office became vacant the salary of the postmaster was either raised or reduced, according to the amount of business transacted. Existing postmasters were at perfect liberty to make applications for an increase of salary on account of an increased business, and whenever they did so their demands were carefully considered.

EDUCATION—ENDOWED SCHOOLS COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK asked the Vice President of the Council, If it is the intention of the Government to renew the Endowed Schools Commission as it is now constituted?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that according to the Endowed Schools Act, the Endowed Schools Commission would last till the end of this year, power having been given to the Government to renew it for a year longer. It would then be for the House to consider what steps should be taken. Her Majesty's Government intended to renew the Commission for one year under the power given to them by the Act.

THE WELLINGTON MONUMENT.

MOTION FOR PAPERS. OBSERVATIONS.

MR. GOLDSMID, in rising to call attention to the prolonged delay in the completion of the Wellington Monument, and to move for Papers, said, he would preface his remarks by reminding the House that the late Duke of Wellington died in 1852, and that in 1856 it was resolved by Parliament to erect a monument to his memory. It was decided that the design for the monument should be obtained by an open competition. A number of artists were thereupon invited to submit models, one of the principal conditions being that the cost should not exceed £20,000, and 83 artists complied with the invitation and sent in designs. Several distinguished Gentlemen, including the present First Lord of the Treasury, Lord Lansdowne, the then Dean of St. Paul's, Sir Edward Cust, Lord Overstone, and Mr. Cockerell, were asked to act as judges, and they decided that Mr. Calder Marshall was deserving of the first premium, whereas only the sixth place was accorded to the design of Mr. Stevens. It was to be regretted, however, that these Gentlemen did not recommend the Government to adopt any one model, but advised them to ask the opinion of distinguished artists, and then decide who should be employed to make a model and erect the monument in honour of the Duke's memory. Nothing further was done till the year 1858, when the noble Lord opposite (Lord John Manners) was First Commissioner of Works. The noble Lord asked Mr. Penrose his opinion as to which was the best model, and Mr. Penrose took a fancy for that of Mr. Stevens. He (Mr. Goldsmid) wished to say nothing to discredit Mr. Penrose, but he doubted whether his judgment was as good as that of the Gentlemen whose names he had just mentioned, and who had decided that Mr. Calder Marshall's design, and several others, were better than that of Mr. Stevens. Acting on the advice of Mr. Penrose the noble Lord, however, appointed Mr. Stevens to execute the monument, one condition being that he was to prepare a model to be erected in St. Paul's, at a cost of £1,600 for the first 12 months, and a proportionate sum for such further time, if any, as was found necessary for its completion. This condition obviously showed that, in the opinion of the noble Lord, the work would probably be executed within 12 months from the day on which the order was given, or in any case very shortly after that time. In point of fact, however, the work was scarcely begun by the end of 1859—18 months after the order was given—and Mr. Stevens was called to account on several occasions by the First Commissioner of Works. It was always difficult to elicit a reply from that gentleman, but in December, 1860, he stated his willingness to complete his model for £1,200 in addition to the £1,600 already paid to him. That sum was allowed him; but it did not appear to expedite matters, as in December, 1862, the correspondence was still going on between Mr. Stevens and the First Commissioner of Works, and, mirabile dictu, it was not till 1867 that the then First Commissioner was allowed to see the model which ought to have been completed eight years before. The cause of the delay was this—In the first place, Mr. Stevens, although that arbiter elegantiarum the Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) thought he was the most able sculptor in the country, was a man of such undetermined character that he could never make up his mind to go on with his work, and constantly fell ill when he had to apply himself to the sculptural portion of it. In the second place, when Mr. Stevens had work in hand he did all the common labourer's work himself, instead of employing labourers to do it, and the result was an enormous waste of time. In March, 1866, Lord Granville stated, in answer to a Question from the Earl of Cadogan, that the model was to be completed in August of that year. They had seen that it was not so completed. Next, in 1867, Lord John Manners, then First Commissioner, stated, in answer to himself (Mr. Goldsmid) that he had every reason to hope that the monument would be completed in about two years from that time. In 1868, he asked a further Question, and was informed by the noble Lord that he could hardly expect all the figures to be in their places before the end of 1869; but he hoped that by that time great progress would have been made. In 1870 Lord Lansdowne said it was expected "that the works would be completed within a year." And in 1871 he (Mr. Goldsmid) was informed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had great hopes that in a very short time—say, in a year or two—the monument would be completed. Still the delay continued, until the present First Commissioner, finding it useless to leave the work any longer in the hands of Mr. Stevens, determined upon entrusting it to some other sculptor. This was a wise and sensible decision, but the Treasury overruled the judgment of the First Commissioner, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer entered into a contract with Mr. Collmann, an upholsterer of Grosvenor Street, to complete the monument within two years, as though it were a piece of paper-hanging or the furnishing of a dining-room. Captain Douglas Galton and Mr. Hunt were employed to report upon the progress of the work, and their report was somewhat remarkable, in that it showed that practically nearly the whole of the work remained to be done. They reported that the merely architectural portion of the design was approaching completion, but that the purely sculptor's work was practically "not commenced." That being so, no one could surely be considered impatient who said that, after a lapse of 14 years, the result arrived at was far from satisfactory. What seemed to him (Mr. Goldsmid) to be particularly requisite was, that the work should have a more strict supervision, and how that was to be attained under the extraordinary contract into which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had entered, any more than under successive Commissioners, he failed to see. His (Mr. Goldsmid's) fears on this point were borne out by Mr. Lowe's reply, given on the 25th of March this year—namely—
VOL. CCXI. [THIRD SERIES.]

"If Mr. Stevens's health is good, I have every reason to believe that the monument will be completed within the contract time."—[3 Hansard, cxx. 592.]

Though, at the same time, he stated that some delay had taken place in consequence of Mr. Stevens being unwell. So the old condition of things was beginning again. So much for the history of the memorial; now, on another question. The very form of the monument did not seem to have been definitely settled at present, for originally it had been proposed to surmount the edifice with an equestrian statue of the Duke; but the then Dean of St. Paul's, not unnaturally, objected to a design which would "represent his Grace riding into the Cathedral on the top of his own monument." Last year, in company with his hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth (Mr. Morrison), he visited the studio of Mr. Stevens, who, being informed that the question was to be brought before Parliament, told him, in a most friendly manner, that he had nearly completed the marble work for the architectural portion of the monument, but he had not completed even the preliminary models of the groups which were to adorn the work. He then agreed with his hon. Friend that if these groups were to be completed as a good sculptor would complete them, there yet remained at least two or three years of work to be done; and, consequently, that the monument could not be finished for a long period, because the castings would have to be done subsequently. Now, this view was probably correct, as that morning he went to the Cathedral, and saw that, while the architectural portion of the design had been nearly completed, the only sign of the castings was a bit of one of the plaques which was to form part of the side of the sarcophagus. On the whole, therefore, if Mr. Stevens made no greater progress than heretofore, he thought the monument might, perhaps, be finished some time at the end of this or the beginning of the next century, when the people would practically have forgotten, in the memory of subsequent great deeds, the accomplishments of the Duke of Wellington. Again, as far as he could judge from the design, the base of the monument would be alone visible near at hand, the summit from the opposite side of the Cathedral, and the whole structure from no single point of view. This was a decided objection to the size of the monument, and would greatly mar any effect it might possibly have produced. Under all the circumstances, he thought himself fairly entitled to ask at the hands of the Government an explanation of what was intended to be done, for he considered it a farce to decide upon the erection of a monument to a great man when the whole arrangement could be muddled in this manner. He believed that Mr. Collmann, the upholsterer, would have no chance of inducing Mr. Stevens to complete his contract, any more than the various Commissioners of Works had been able to do so. He begged, as a formal way of bringing this subject forward, to move for any correspondence that might exist upon this matter, and, in so doing, he might add that, in his belief, the country would be gratified at learning that there was any prospect of the work being terminated, as there was considerable national discredit attaching to us throughout.

MR. MORRISON, in rising to second the Motion, said, he could not but express his regret that the Executive should have betrayed so much weakness in this matter. He also regretted that the matter could not be brought forward last year, when they might have been able to consider the expediency of completing the contract with Mr. Collman, for he believed with his hon. Friend that Mr. Collman would no more succeed in inducing Mr. Stevens to fulfil his contract than others had been able to do so; and, instead of entering into this arrangement, it would, in his opinion, have been better if application had been made in the ordinary way to the Law Courts. The Duke of Wellington died in 1852, and in 1856 there was a competition, in which the judges selected the design of Mr. Marshall. The noble Lord opposite, however, the then First Commissioner of Works (Lord John Manners), assigned the work to Mr. Stevens, who undertook to complete the monument for £14,000, of which £1,600 was to be advanced for the preparations of models. Mr. Penrose was appointed superintendent, and no money was to be advanced to Mr. Stevens beyond the stipulated £1,600, except upon the certificate of Mr. Penrose that the work was progressing satisfactorily. The Board of Works appeared not to have taken any further step till the end of 1860, when they received a communication from Mr. Stevens offering to complete the model for £1,200 beyond the £1,600 he had already received. That offer was acceded to, and nothing further occurred till 1861, when two letters sent by the Board of Works to Mr. Stevens remained unanswered. In February, 1862, the Board of Works again wrote, pressing for a reply, and on the 1st of November they again wrote, insisting upon a reply. That note Mr. Stevens answered on the 2nd of December, stating that he was willing to complete the model for £4,666 within 15 months from the date of the payment of that sum of money. His right hon. Friend the Member for South Hampshire (Mr. Cowper-Temple), who was then First Commissioner of Works, agreed to this arrangement, and the money was paid on the 18th of February, 1862. The matter slept till 1864, when the Board of Works, being anxious to learn something about the progress of the model, sent three letters to Mr. Stevens without obtaining any answer. In reply to a very pressing letter sent in 1865, Mr. Stevens expressed his regret at the delay which had occurred, and said he was making all the haste he could. To a similar letter, sent in 1866, Mr. Stevens said that the model would be ready in five months; but it was not till 1867 that Mr. Penrose reported that the model was partially completed and invited inspection. On visiting Mr. Stevens's studio he expected to find a carefully-finished model, such as would enable a person who was not a sculptor to form some idea of the general effect of the monument; but, to his astonishment, the rough work shown to him was of a very different character. He did not know how long this kind of thing would have gone on but for the fortunate advent to office of his right hon. Friend the present First Commissioner of Works, who, at all events, brought to this question an element of decision which had been sadly wanting in his predecessors. Having been informed that £13,000 had been advanced to Mr. Stevens, and that £15,000 would still be required to complete the work, his right hon. Friend administered a very proper rebuke to Mr. Penrose, at the same time telling him that he was no longer to consider himself as superintendent, and that he would be held liable for all money improperly advanced upon his certificates. And upon this point he should be glad to learn from the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether any further action had been taken with regard to Mr. Penrose, and whether the Law Officers of the Crown had been consulted as to whether he could be made legally, as he certainly was morally, liable for the payment of such sums. Mr. Stevens was at the same time informed that his contract was cancelled. That was the history of the transaction up to last year, when this extraordinary arrangement was entered into with Mr. Collman. He was not then going to discuss the fruitless question as to the value of the monument as a work of art; but in the particular position into which it had been crowded in St. Paul's, it was an eyesore, the fact being that there was no proper situation for such a large monument in the Cathedral. It would have been far better in the interests of art, if what had been done had been destroyed, and the work entrusted to another sculptor. The House of Commons had never been severe with artists, provided the artists did their work. He wished to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, what was the real position of the work, and would Mr. Stevens be able to complete it in the time he had undertaken?

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "there be laid before this House, a Copy of further Correspondence relating to the completion of the Wellington Monument,"—(Mr. Goldsmid),

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had no doubt his hon. Friends had entered into this matter at great length to serve some useful object; but he was quite unable to divine what that object could be, and thought they might have employed their talents for research to better purpose. He would explain how the matter stood upon the present Government coming into office. By the original contract Mr. Stevens undertook to finish the monument for £14,000, and had received £13,000 when the matter came under his (the Chancellor of the Exchequer's) notice, a great deal of money having been spent in making a model, and in enlarging his premises to hold it. Excellent judges had informed him that Mr. Stevens was a sculptor of very great ability. [Mr. Goldsmid: No, no!] He begged the hon. Member's pardon. Did he mean that he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) was not so informed? [Mr. Goldsmid: I deny his ability as a sculptor.] He would remind the hon. Member that he had not said he was. He had quoted the expressed opinion of competent judges. ["Name!"] Mr. Fergusson was one of those who held a high opinion of Mr. Stevens's ability. However, Mr. Stevens, having received £13,000 by the time the work was only half completed, borrowed another £1,000 on his own credit, and undertook private work with a view to continue the monument by means of the proceeds. But it proved to be impossible to do the work for the money, and it was quite manifest Mr. Stevens was unfit to undertake a contract in consequence of his unbusiness-like habits. At the same time the Government was advised by Mr. Fergusson, that if the work were taken out of Mr. Stevens's hands, the result would be serious loss to the country and injury to the monument. The problem was complicated by the fact that, whereas the monument had been designed for the body of the building, it was ultimately resolved to erect it in a chapel out of deference to the views of the late Dean Milman. The faulty character of the site was discovered too late to allow another to be chosen. Under these circumstances, as it was impossible for the Government to enter into any contract with Mr. Stevens, though at the same time it was deemed desirable to retain his services, the Government gave the advice which had been so much criticized. It was agreed that Mr. Collman—who possessed considerable property, was a thoroughly responsible man, and something besides an upholsterer—should accept the responsibility of the contract, and employ Mr. Stevens to do the work. The time fixed for the completion of the work was two years and a-half, and it was arranged that the work should be paid for in monthly payments of £250, upon the certificate of Mr. Fergusson and Captain Galton that it had been earned. The tenth of these payments had been made, and the work was reported to be in a forward condition. Some delay had recently occurred in respect of one portion of the work owing to the illness of Mr. Stevens; but there was every reason to believe the contract time would not be exceeded, and that the work would be done in a year and a-half. It was very easy to find fault with the arrangements, but he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) would like to know what better plan could have been adopted? He was informed the work was in itself most excellent and admirable—in short, a beautiful specimen of the art, and it was on this account that they were advised not to take it out of the hands of Mr. Stevens; but whether the design was good, or the site chosen a proper one, he did not pretend to say. He was not a judge of such matters, but he took credit to the Government for having found a solution of a very difficult problem.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that the question of Mr. Stevens's appointment had been discussed some years ago, and he had hoped that it would be unnecessary for the House to be troubled with these rather remote circumstances on the present occasion, but after what had been said by the hon. Gentlemen who introduced the question, he (Lord John Manners) thought it necessary to advert to one or two points, upon which he thought they had adopted views which the real facts of the case upon examination, would not bear out. They had stated that the First Commissioner of Works for the time being, who happened to be himself, had selected a comparatively untried man, instead of the more distinguished sculptors of the day. The fact was, the work was thrown open to unlimited competition—a course which was designed to bring out latent talent, but which naturally resulted in the absence of the most eminent sculptors from the lists, because they thought it beneath them to compete with obscure artists. The competition, however, brought out a great number of men of comparatively small repute—young men, ardent, and anxious to bring themselves into notice, and Mr. Stephens, if not the first, was at any rate very prominent among them. That was the explanation of how that gentleman came upon the scene. He had no capital, no establishment, and no great position; and that was one of the difficulties with which the Government had had to contend. The judges having recommended that the First Commissioner of Works should consult the surveyor of the Cathedral before either the sculptor or the form of the monument was selected, in compliance with that recommendation, he (Lord John Manners) immediately put himself in communication with Mr. Penrose, and he found, much to his satisfaction, that Mr. Penrose had independently arrived at a similar conclusion. It was not till then that Mr. Stevens was proposed as the sculptor for the work. He wished distinctly to say that Mr. Penrose was a gentleman of the highest character and respectability, whose opinion he would rather take on a subject of that kind than that of any person with whom he was acquainted; and he should regret if anything was said or done in all those transactions which should bear in the slightest degree against Mr. Penrose's position as a very eminent architect and a most honourable gentleman. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had very clearly stated the course which he had taken since he had assumed the management of the business. He himself quite approved that course. It was, he thought, impossible, under the circumstances of the case, to arrive at a more satisfactory solution of the difficulty. He begged leave to confirm what the right hon. Gentleman had said as to their having in Mr. Stevens secured the services of a man of very great genius and ability; and, in his belief, the work, when completed, would be worthy alike of its subject and of the country.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, it rather looked as if the two hon. Gentlemen who had condemned that work had prepared certain speeches on the subject last year, but being unable then to let them off, had delivered them on the present occasion. The great fault which had been found with Mr. Stevens was, that he had attended to the details of his work; but the great fault of modern works of art was that details were altogether neglected. Mr. Stevens, on the contrary, would not allow any portion of his work to come out of the hands of the workmen without giving special attention to it himself; and, therefore, when the hon. Gentleman opposite appeared to be cursing that mode of proceeding, he was really blessing it altogether. As to the assertion that Mr. Stevens was not a sculptor, the most competent judges and those who had seen his works would admit that, as a sculptor, he was second to none in this country, or perhaps in any other. The hon. Member for Plymouth (Mr. Morrison) said it was a fruitless thing to discuss questions of taste in that House; but he immediately forgot his own precept, and passed a series of adverse criticisms upon that monument. He protested against it being supposed that Mr. Collman was a mere upholsterer; he was described as an architectural decorator, and his excellent designs and admirable work might be seen at the Royal Academy in Burlington House. Mr. Collman had received an artistic education, and as he (Mr. C. Bentinck) employed him, and knew others who did so, he was enabled to bear testimony to the high qualifications of that gentleman. He had made inquiries on the subject that very day, and had asked Mr. Collman how the work was proceeding, and it might be satisfactory to the Government and to the House to know that one-third of the time having now elapsed there remained only some of the marble facings to be made, so that there was great hope that the work would be completed in due time, and no doubt more would have been done, were it not for Mr. Stevens's unfortunate illness, which had been referred to. A sculptor's work, however, could not be done by rule of thumb; for at Berlin a monument of Frederick the Great occupied 10 years in its execution, the sculptor being bound by contract to do no other work whatever. The hon. Member for Plymouth said they ought to have dismissed Mr. Stevens and employed a sculptor. But the consequence of that would have been that the money expended on that admirable work would have been entirely thrown away, and they would have called in a man who knew nothing about architecture to make an architectural monument in the greatest building ever erected in this country. In conclusion, he must express his approval of the course taken by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which he trusted would be persevered in, and he earnestly hoped the result would be satisfactory both to the House and the country.

MR. GOLDSMID said, he must explain that at the request of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, conveyed to him through the Secretary to the Treasury, he had not brought the question forward last year before the contract was signed. He only hoped that the work would be completed within the time named.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

INDIA—OLD BANK OF BOMBAY—GOVERNMENT LIABILITY.—RESOLUTION.

MR. GREGORY, in rising to call the attention of the House to the Report of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the failure of the Bank of Bombay, and the position of the Shareholders in such Bank with reference to the Government of that Presidency, and to move—

Lord John Manners

"That, in the opinion of this House, the case of such Shareholders is one for the favourable consideration of Her Majesty's Government," said, that in the years 1840-3 the Government determined to establish Banks in the three Presidencies; but he should confine his observations to the Bank of Bombay, which was established in 1840 by an Act of the Legislature of India, with a capital of £520,000. In that Bank, as in the other two Presidency Banks, the Government became shareholders, and they had the power of appointing—and they exercised the power of appointing—three Directors out of the nine which composed the Board of Direction of each of the Banks. The provisions of the Act establishing the Bank of Bombay were similar to the provisions of the Acts establishing the Banks of Bengal and Madras, and the business was strictly regulated and carried on in accordance with those provisions. The operations of the Banks, therefore, were safe and profitable, and each of the three Banks became a favourite means of investment for funds of all character in India. Indeed, their shares became a special means of investing trust funds and funds for charitable purposes, money belonging to natives, Civil servants, or retired officers in India, who were desirous of making provision for their wives and families and others dependent upon them. So much, indeed, were they recognized as a safe and secure investment, that there was scarcely a settlement known in India that did not give power of investment in these Banks. Such was the state of things up to 1860, when the Government took away the power they possessed of issuing notes; but, in return, and in order to compensate them for that deprivation, Government transferred to them the management of the Government Treasury and the payment of the Government balances. It being, however, considered necessary that a new Act should be passed, in order to place these Banks upon an altogether new basis, steps were taken to bring the matter before the Legislature of India, and new charters were accordingly passed for each of them. The Act for the Bank of Bombay was passed in 1861, and was framed by the solicitor of the Bank, under order of the Directors. And here he must remark that it might be objected that six of the Directors being appointed by the shareholders, the latter were not in a position to complain of the acts of their representatives, who not only neglected their duty, but abused the confidence that was placed in them. He admitted that; and he also admitted that the shareholders had grossly neglected their duty. But he submitted that that did not displace the moral responsibility of the Government, which had been guilty of acts both of omission and commission. And he would proceed to show what were the acts of omission and of commission of the Government of India in relation to this subject, the powers they possessed, and in what respect they neglected to exercise those powers. With respect to the Government itself it was well to bear in mind, during the consideration of this question, that the Government in India was despotic. It acted by itself and for itself, without external influences, or any representation of the people subject to it; but as a condition of being a despotic Government, it must necessarily be a paternal Government. It must exercise control over the affairs of those subject to it; a close supervision over those dependent upon it, and attention to the duties and responsibilities which were inherent in a despotic Government. After the Act was framed by the solicitor of the Bank, the draft was submitted to Government, and the Law Officer of the Government directed that it should be submitted to another official, who was practising as a barrister at Bombay. Now, the old Act contained a clause which limited the power of the Bank to advance money on certain specified classes of shares only, and then only to the extent of three-fourths of their value, and a clause with similar restrictions came before the Directors as part of the new Act; but very unwisely and very improperly they struck out the restriction. On the 19th of March, 1862, the Act was forwarded to the Government of India; and they unfortunately intimated that it should not go through the Legislative Council of India, but that it should be passed by the Government of Bombay itself. The previous Act had been passed by the Government of India, and if the present Act had also gone through their hands, he (Mr. Gregory) believed more attention would have been paid to it, and the subsequent evils would not have arisen. Well, the Act was referred back to the Legislative Council of Bombay, and here it might be necessary to state what was the sort of tribunal to which it was referred. The Legislative Council of Bombay consisted of twelve Members, six of them being officials, three of them partners of mercantile houses, and three of them native gentlemen. They were named by the Government, and they were, to all intents and purposes, the Privy Council of the Government, and, in fact, the Government in itself. On 12th May, 1862, the Government of Bombay forwarded a copy of the Act to the Secretary of State for India, and the Secretary of State then recommended that the business should be restricted to legitimate operations, such as those in the Bank of England or the Bank of Bengal as heretofore constituted. If the Government of Bombay had listened to this recommendation he (Mr. Gregory) would not now have been addressing the House. Unfortunately, the Government of Bombay did not listen to it; but they sent the despatch to Mr. Bickersteth, who was Government Solicitor, and Mr. Bickersteth gave the very cautious opinion upon it that, so far as he was aware, the powers intended to be conferred by the Act were more extensive than the powers of the Bank of Bengal, but did not exceed those of the Bank of England, but that his knowledge on this subject was very limited. The Government of Bombay had its attention therefore directed to this point, both by the Secretary of State for India and by their own legal officer. Under these circumstances, the Act came before the Legislative Council, and was placed in the hands of Mr. Robertson, who, if he was not mistaken, was the Secretary of the Government. The Directors nominated Mr. Michael Scott, who was one of their body and also a Member of the Council, to look after their interest during the progress of the Act. Mr. Robertson, it appeared, in bringing forward this measure, never called the attention of the Council or the public in any way to the point to which he had just referred. In fact, while he entered into very minute detail in describing the general character and nature of the provisions of the Act, he never touched upon a point which was so material to the interests of the Bank. The Act passed the Council, and was sent in due form to the Governor General, and approved of by him. It was also sent home to Sir Charles Wood, and on the 4th December, 1863, he wrote to the Governor General that the Act had been amended, and might come into operation. It was, therefore, sanctioned by the three branches of the Legislature—the Government of Bombay, the Governor General, and the Secretary of State. It made material alterations in the constitution of the Bank as compared with the original Act of 1840, for it gave power to the directors to make advances to any amount to any individual on promissory notes, and on the security of shares in public companies, whether guaranteed or not. It also gave them power to increase the capital without the consent of the Government. The Act as first drawn contained by-laws, which restricted the operation of those powers; but these were struck out by the Legislative Council, a proceeding in itself reasonable, for otherwise they could not have been modified without a fresh Act. A power of making by-laws was substituted; but that power was never enforced, the Government never taking the trouble to see that it was exercised. Another very proper provision, giving them the right of calling for accounts and inspecting documents, was also allowed to remain a dead letter. Thus, the Government permitted the passing of an Act which gave power of speculative transactions to any amount; and striking out the schedule of by-laws they never required by-laws to be made, or called for accounts. The President of the Bank was Mr. Birch, a Government Director, who was an official high in the Government of Bombay. The second officer was Mr. Blair, the Secretary of the Bank; and the next was Mr. Ryland, the Deputy Secretary. No time seemed to have been lost in acting on the liberty which the new Act allowed, and in entering on a system of reckless and desperate banking. It was now necessary that he should introduce to the notice of the House the name of Premchund Roychund, who played an important part in the subsequent history of the Bank. Premchund was the son of Roychund Deepchund, a man of humble origin in Bombay. Premchund was a small cotton broker in the beginning of his career, and subsequently became a shareholder and promoter in nearly every company which was started in Bombay. In 1863-4 the capital of the Bank was increased, under the powers of the new Act, to £2,000,000 sterling. During that time the American War was going on, and India became the great source of the cotton supply. Money became plentiful, and reckless speculation prevailed. Two schemes—the Back Bay Reclamation Company and the Financial Association of India—were most fatal to the shareholders of the Bombay Bank. Lacs of rupees were advanced without consulting the Directors, on no other security than a promissory note, and the principles of ordinary banking were utterly neglected. He regretted to say that Mr. Birch received allotments of shares, by which he realized something like £37,000; and Mr. Robertson, another Director, also realized large sums by similar means. Premchund, too, became a large debtor to the Bank. He appeared to have obtained loans for himself amounting to £420,000, and for other people amounting to £669,000; and by this means a loss ultimately fell upon the Bank of £434,547. He also obtained money for speculative purposes of £295,893, whereby a loss arose of £130,240; in fact, as the Commissioners stated in their Report, Premchund had the Bank entirely under his control. He now came to a transaction that was very serious, to say the least of it. It appeared that the Directors of the Bank were not satisfied with the loss that they had sustained, and they determined to establish a branch in Bombay itself. They did, in fact, establish such branch; but it was illegal to do so, according to the charter, and should at once have been checked by the Government. Instead of that being done, however, the consent of the Government was specially given to the establishment of the Bombay branch, and the establishment of this branch resulted in a heavy loss to the Bank. In 1865 Mr. Birch resigned, and on the 12th of April, 1865, the Directors of the Bank came to this most extraordinary resolution—that they would advance money, not only upon shares they held or were to hold as securities, but upon the premiums which the shares commanded in the market, and they agreed to advance from £50 to £175 upon the premiums that the shares commanded—that was, that if the shares were at a premium of £200 the Bank would advance £175 of that premium. Such transactions were contrary to every system of banking which had existed in the world, and it was needless to say that they resulted in a loss to the Bank of not less than £134,716. On the 29th of April Mr. Blair resigned; and at this period the Bank had lost £1,531,340 by operations of which the Commissioners gave a summary in their Report. A new phase of the history of the Bank commenced in 1865, when the attention of the Government at home was directed to the transactions going on, although the Government of Bombay seemed to have been utterly blind to them, unless it had countenanced them throughout. On the 3rd of March, 1865, Sir Charles Wood wrote to Sir Bartle Frere, expressing alarm at the possible consequences of the speculations, mentioning disagreeable rumours, praying that the affairs might be looked into, and urging how desirable it was that the Government should stand clear if anything went wrong. That was a most proper letter to write, and it was only unfortunate that the Bombay Bank ignored it; for if they had acted upon Sir Charles Wood's recommendations, the losses which had been sustained would not have been experienced. Upon receipt of the letter Sir Bartle Frere communicated with Messrs. Chapman and Lushington, directing them to look into the affairs of the Bank, which they did. There was a meeting of the Directors, at which it was resolved that no customer of the Bank should be allowed a credit of more than £30,000 without the special sanction of three Directors. That was all very well if it had been acted upon two years before; but the loss had been already sustained, and, moreover, the transactions were continued, notwithstanding the resolutions, the secretary being Mr. Robertson, who had been a party to Mr. Blair's proceedings. At last, a creditor at the Bank named Cama, failed, and he owed the Bank £177,168, but without security. Then ensued a panic and a run on the Bank, which had less cash in hand than safety required. In that emergency they applied to the Governor of Bombay, and on the 5th of June, 1865, he sent a telegram to Lord Lawrence, to ask whether the Government would advance 150 lacs of rupees. That telegram and what else took place showed that the Bank was not looked upon in the light only of a financial concern, but as a political agency also, for the run on the Bank ceased when it was found that it was to be supported by the Government, and the necessity for rendering pecuniary assistance never arose. The Governor General, however, had his attention called to the transactions, and he wrote to the Governor of Bombay desiring the Bombay Government to look after the Bank, which he understood was making advances on shares, contrary to the charter of the Bank, and on the 18th May Sir Charles Wood also wrote, warning them that their transactions were contrary to all banking systems. The note of the Secretary of State was referred to the Government Directors, and, as disclosed by the Commissioners, the following was the method of the Directors in dealing with it:—Their Report stated that £417,000 had been advanced upon the securities of certain shares which were mentioned; but that advances of this kind had been for some time discontinued—a statement which was manifestly incorrect. The inference which he drew from all the circumstances was, that not only was there neglect on the part of the Government of Bombay, but that they deceived the Governor General and the Secretary of State, and further that they deceived themselves and were willing to be deceived. Later than this, securities which they held so largely, rose in the market, and they might have realized without that enormous loss which subsequently accrued; but the Bank, unfortunately with the assent of the Government, adopted a policy of forbearance, and the interests of the shareholders seemed to have been sacrificed by the Government of Bombay for political considerations. No advantage was taken of the rise in the value of shares, and therefore the ultimate loss was sustained. On the 8th September Sir Charles Wood acknowledged the receipt of a despatch of the 8th July, and he said that the statement of the proceedings of the Bank was sufficient to show how unjustifiable they were, and he directed that in future there should be no advance upon shares which were not guaranteed. The Bombay Government took no legal action upon that recommendation; they referred it to the Directors, by whom it was practically ignored. The Government of India not being satisfied, required an examination into the affairs of the Bank, and that was also referred to the Government Directors. On the 31st March they reported that there was £321,000 outstanding on loans at the head office; that £79,000 had been realized; that £126,000 was due; and that there was £116,000 not accounted for. It might have been thought that, at this period, considering the state of his account, the recommendations that had been received from the Secretary of State and the Governor General, and the remonstrances that had been directed to the Government from time to time, that at all events there would have been a suspension of any dealing with Premchand for the future. That, however, was not the case. In April, 1866, application was made by him for a loan of £250,000, and he offered as security some title deeds to landed property, and some other property, on which he put a nominal value. One of the Government Directors called upon Sir Bartle Frere, and spoke to him on the subject. According to the Report of the Commissioners, Sir Bartle Frere expressly sanctioned this advance, on the ground that the transaction was at the time being carried out, and was not complete. Now, that would have been a very sufficient ground for stopping it. He should have said—"I refuse this application at once, knowing the state of the accounts, and the affairs of the Bank." But he approved of the transaction because he believed that it was going on, which was a most extraordinary reason. If it had been concluded, he might have said that it could not be helped; but he (Mr. Gregory) was at a loss to conceive why he took the course he did under the circumstances. It turned out, when looked into, that, of course, the securities were worthless, as might have been expected. That, however, was not the only proof of the reckless way in which the business of the Bank was conducted. Another proof was found in the fact, that they permitted themselves by sheer carelessness to lose upwards of £96,000 in connection with the Asiatic Bank. In 1866, His Excellency the Governor General of India caused a communication to be addressed to the Government of Bombay, asking that inquiries might be made as to the conduct of the Bank; but the Bombay Government took upon itself to consider that the inquiries were of such a character that a bank carrying on business ought not to be called upon to answer them. Again, the Governor General asked for information, specifying the points upon which he desired to be informed, and after much delay the Directors reported a loss by advances on shares alone amounting to £116,000, and a further loss by advances on promissory notes to one firm amounting to no less than £801,000. In 1869 the Directors reported a total loss on their trading of £1,500,000; but a subsequent fuller investigation disclosed a loss of £1,889,933, involving ruin and desolation on all hands. The conduct of the Directors of the Bank was without doubt culpable, but no less culpable was the conduct of the Government, which by neglecting to make inquiries, enabled the Directors to circulate reports giving an altogether false colour to their transactions. Having thus pointed to errors of omission and commission in the conduct of the Directors as well as of the Government, he therefore asked a favourable consideration for the Resolution he was about to propose. He knew he might be told that recommending the case of the shareholders to the favourable consideration of the Government implied an advance of money to recoup them for their losses, and that that would fall heavily upon an already severely taxed people. That was true; but it must be borne in mind that the loss was due to the neglect of the Government of the Presidency to investigate the affairs of the Bank when their attention was called to the manner in which its business was being carried on—that in 1864 and 1865 they threw into the market a great quantity of land for which high prices were paid, and for the purchase of which large advances were made by the Bank of Bombay; and that the people of Bombay were amenable for the acts of the Government, and must be prepared to make good any losses occasioned by those acts. He asked for the favourable consideration of the Government on behalf of those who had been induced to place their money in the Bombay Bank as a Government investment, on behalf of trustees of public charities, and on behalf of Civil servants of the Crown, and others who had wasted their health in the public service, and had made provisions for their families by placing their money in an institution which they thought safe and secure, because it was under the control of the Government of the Presidency. In conclusion, the hon. Gentleman moved the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

COLONEL BARTELOT, in rising to second the Motion, expressed his belief that the case of the shareholders in the Bombay Bank not only deserved, but would receive, the sympathy and the consideration of the House. He had refrained from bringing their case before the House last year only because he could not at that time foresee any practical result. The transactions connected with the Bank were as bad as any of which he had ever heard, and all the facts tended conclusively, to his mind at least, to show that the Government at Bombay were responsible for the action of the Directors whom they placed in charge of the affairs of the Bank. He was exceedingly glad that his hon. Friend the Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) had taken up the matter, because with his knowledge of law and legal ability he was enabled clearly to state the case from end to end, and show how far the Government of Bombay was connected with all those transactions of the Bank that had occasioned such serious injury and losses to all who had anything to do with it. This Bank was started in 1840, and for a period of 23 years, when it was under a wise and prudent charter, it was well and honestly conducted. It did all that the shareholders could desire, and paid good and regular dividends. The Bank was so generally esteemed that moneys of all kinds and from all quarters were deposited in it. That state of things went on until the 13th of January, 1868, when it came to a frightful collapse. The Government of that day thought that was so serious a matter that they sent out a Commission under Sir Charles Jackson to inquire into the affairs of the Bank. Two Reports emanated from that Commission, but one of them only was made public. Where, he (Colonel Barttelot) asked, was the other Report made by the Commissioners? Was it because it was condemnatory and damnable of the Government of Bombay that

Her Majesty's Government were afraid to produce it? The inference naturally was, that by the keeping back of that Report there was something in it which the Government did not like to see made public. In 1861 the notes allowed to be issued by the Presidency Banks were stopped. But in lieu of those issues, there were placed in their hands the Government balances. A new charter was thereupon obliged to be made. This new charter was one very much of the same kind as that before in force in regard to the Banks of Madras and Bengal. The charter of the Bombay Bank, however, differed materially from the other two, and although the attention of the Government of Bombay was called to the nature of the charter to be granted to the Bank by the Secretary of State for India and the Law Officers of Bombay, nevertheless the 37th clause of the Act of 1863 was passed, which gave power to the Bank to lend money without security upon any scheme that might be propounded, whether such scheme was guaranteed by the Government or not. From that moment speculations took place in all directions in connection with the Bank; various companies were established; shares were bought up, and numerous projects were set on foot. All this state of things ended in a frightful collapse of the Bank. But, in the meantime, the Government of Bombay were warned, in emphatic language, that things were going to the bad in regard to the Bank. They were warned by the Governor General of India, and by responsible parties in Bombay itself. Still the Government of Bombay did not make any effort to stop the reckless proceedings that were taking place. Out of the proceeds of these transactions, it was stated in a Report that two of the Directors of the Bank had made large sums of money—namely, £37,000 and £26,000 respectively. He wished to know whether the statement was true that those Directors did realize such large profits out of the Bank to the detriment of the shareholders? He now came to the case of Premchund Roychund. That man obtained advances from the Bank, and he became at last, by his influence over the Directors, master of the Bank. At a time when he was indebted to a large amount to the Bank, and when he was insolvent, he asked for a loan of £250,000. Sir Bartle Frere, instead of refusing this application, allowed the Bank to continue its course. That money was consequently lent upon the most worthless securities, and this man, Roychund, failed for a large amount. The charter granted to the Bank strictly prohibited the establishment of another Bank in Bombay, but a branch Bank was established at Kalbidavi, by which £190,000 was very soon lost—and lost without the hope of redemption. The whole of the Government Directors united together to prop up this Bank, and not to allow the public to know what was going on inside. After some speculations, the shares of certain companies did show a rise, and the Directors, if they had availed themselves of that opportunity, might by careful management have got the Bank out of its difficulties. Those shares, however, were left precisely as they were, and no effort was made by the Directors to retrieve the unfortunate position in which the Bank was placed. Sir Bartle Frere, seeing a run upon the Bank, telegraphed to the Governor General of India that unless £1,500,000 was sent to its assistance the Bank must stop. The Governor General wrote to say he would be answerable. The Bank went on, but without any proper supervision. Some loans were again made, the same irregularities and the same culpable negligence being manifested. In the end, in five years the capital of what had been the safest and soundest bank in India was raised from £500,000 to £2,100,000, and when it failed, on the 13th of January, 1868, it was found that a loss of £1,998,833 had fallen upon the shareholders. He maintained that that was a state of things which demanded very serious consideration. Something was surely due to the shareholders, and he hoped that his hon. Friend would get up in his place and state that, whether the Government were prepared or not to do anything for their pecuniary benefit, they would say that in their opinion gross and culpable neglect attached to the officials in Bombay and to the Directors of the Bank. In relation to this subject, it should be recollected that the Government of Bombay had sold a powder magazine for £400,000, and certain esplanade lands for £541,000; that would be a sum of £941,000. The Government had also had, but had not taken them up, 400 Back Bay shares, which had realized over £1,000,000; and they had a right to ask on behalf of those long-suffering people—the widows, orphans, and others, many of whom were retired officers and Government servants—who had trusted the men in high position, and who ought to have been men of honesty and integrity, that their cases should receive that earnest and attentive consideration which the Resolution asked from that House.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the case of the Shareholders of the Bank of Bombay is one for the favourable consideration of Her Majesty's Government,"—(Mr. Gregory),

—instead thereof.

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, I am sure I regret as much as does the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Barttelot) the misfortunes of the shareholders in the Old Bank of Bombay; and if this Motion had been brought forward several years ago, I should most probably have accepted it, substituting, perhaps, the word "anxious" for the word "favourable." To accept the Motion now after the affairs of the Bank have received the fullest, the most careful, the most painful consideration from the Government without its seeing any way to meet the wishes of the shareholders, would, I fear, be to excite false hopes and so to inflict a new evil upon persons who have had evils enough already. For this Motion, if it means anything, means that Her Majesty's Government ought to direct the Government of India to take a sum of money out of the pockets of the people of India and put it into the pockets of the persons who lost money by the failure of the Old Bank of Bombay or their representatives. But what defence could there be for such a proceeding? Is not the proposal that we should adopt it an admirable illustration of the saying that A never sees B in distress without wishing C to relieve him? If this were a Resolution to the effect that the Bombay Government of six or seven years ago was very injudicious as regards the Bank, and that it is the bounden duty of the Home Government of India to take care that, as long as any connection remains between the Government of India or any subordinate Government and the Presidency Banks, greater care should be used to protect the interests of Government in those Banks, then I should not have a word to say against it. But that is not, I apprehend, what is meant. This is simply—I will not say a demand, for the hon. Gentleman's Resolution is in terms as mild as his tone is courteous—but I will say the expression of a wish for money, and that money we cannot honestly give. Why is this Motion made here in the House of Commons at all? It is made here, because in this, which is a mere question of private right, it is notorious that no Court of Justice would decide in favour of the shareholders. Aware, accordingly, that they have no legal claim, they fall back on what they call a moral claim; a moral claim to get money from the people of India, £110,000 of whose money—far more than was lost by any single shareholder—was lost by the failure of this ill-starred Bank. The hon. Gentleman says that the Government of Bombay was responsible. Yes; but to whom was it responsible? The Government of Bombay was responsible, not to its fellow shareholders, but to the Government of India and to the Secretary of State in Council for looking after its own shares in the Bank and its deposits with the Bank. Let us see how the facts stand. The Court of Directors always set its face as a flint against giving any guarantee to the Presidency Banks. In the year 1806, the Government of Bengal recommended it to establish a Bank at Calcutta, the solvency of which was to be guaranteed by the Government. The Court, which had already rejected a similar proposal from Madras, again carefully re-considered the whole question and eventually refused to agree to the recommendation. The grounds of the Directors' refusal were—first, a determination not to guarantee any Bank; and, secondly, a dislike to being partners in any Bank. On the latter point they did not stand very firm, giving the Government of Bengal a latitude to subscribe £100,000 to the capital of the proposed Bank, if it could not be founded without that help; but on the former they stood perfectly firm. They would hear nothing of any guarantee. Nor did the Court depart from this wise policy in sanctioning the establishment of the Old Bank of Bombay. It is quite true that the money subscribed for the shares was paid in the first instance to the sub-Treasurer of the Bombay Government; but it is not less true that the Act of Incorporation provided that the amount so subscribed should be delivered to the Directors of the Bank; that the receipts granted by the sub-Treasurer of the Government of Bombay should be cancelled, and that a certificate signed by three Directors of the Bank of Bombay should be delivered to each proprietor. If the Government meant to hold itself out as in any sense adopting or guaranteeing the Old Bank of Bombay, what in the world was the object of this ceremony? Why were the receipts of the sub-Treasurer cancelled? Why were the receipts of three Directors of the new institution carefully substituted for them? Continuing its policy of recognition and allowance, the Government became a shareholder in the Bank, and the Government being a shareholder, became, of course, just as liable as any other shareholder in a chartered bank to all the depositors and creditors of the Bank. There is no kind of dispute about that; and no creditor or depositor has lost a penny by the Bank's failure, though the Government, like other shareholders, has lost nearly the whole value of its shares. But it is one thing to be liable to depositors and creditors, quite another thing to be liable to fellow shareholders; and unless it can be proved that in some mysterious way the Government became liable to its fellow shareholders the present Motion has no basis. On what ground, then, can it be maintained that it was liable to its fellow shareholders? Is it because the Government had three Directors on the Board? That only proves, what no one denies, that Government was a very influential shareholder, and meant to take, though unfortunately it did not, very good care of its own interests. The function of those three Directors was to watch over and protect the interest of the Government. In the latter years of the Bank's existence most of them proved to be very inefficient, selected as they were, and must in the nature of things have been, from men who had no experience in banking; but they were put there to look after the heavy stake of the Government, qua shareholder, not the interest of its fellow shareholders, who were represented by six Directors of their own, able at any time to out-vote the Government Directors, and who, as commercial men, were likely to know more of commercial matters, as, in fact, they did. But it is attempted to fix responsibility on the Government, because the Act of Incorporation of 1840 entirely precluded the Bank from being engaged in any business of an unsafe or speculative character. In the first place, the fact is otherwise. The Act of 1840 left it open, for example, to discount any amount of bad bills. If the Bank had had the misfortune to fall, in the earlier years of its existence, into the hands into which it fell in the latter years of its existence, its ruin might have been ante-dated by nearly a quarter of a century. In the second place, even if the fact had been as alleged, it would not have supported the inference. The Government, even if it had made it impossible for the Bank to discount bad bills—an impracticable feat—would only have done so in its own interest, or rather in the interest of those for whom it was acting—the great public of taxpayers, not the little public of shareholders. Such being the state of things under the Act of 1840, was there anything in Act 10, of 1863—once so popular with the Bank shareholders, but so much attacked after that event—or was there anything in the circumstances connected with its passing that altered the relations of the Government to its fellow shareholders? I think not. And here let me pause to note a most strange fact, that the very people who wished for the legislation of 1863, accepted the new charter, and took all the advantages under it, including dividends at the rate of 12½ and 16 per cent, are actually coming whining to Parliament and complaining of the result of their own actions. There may be some ground for saying that the Bombay Government, or even the then Secretary of State, should have so far distrusted the wisdom of the mercantile community of Bombay, as to have forbidden the slightest relaxation in the terms of the old charter. But is it for the people who accepted the new charter to complain? Who was it initiated the changes in the Act regulating the Old Bank of Bombay? It was the Board of Directors, not the Government? Who prepared the draft Act? The solicitors to the Directors of the Bank, not the Government solicitors.

Who was it who struck out of the original draft the words, the absence of which afterwards led to so much mischief? Were they Members of the Government? Were they appointed by the Government? They were not Members of the Government. They were two commercial Directors, Messrs. Scott and Foggo. They were appointed to be a Committee for the preparation of the Act by the Directors, not by the Government. Who was it ratified the striking out of these important words? Was it the Government? No; it was a special general meeting of the shareholders called on 28th November, 1861, not by the Government, but by the Directors. It was not till after the affair had gone a very long way, indeed, that the Government had anything whatever to do with it; and when the Government did appear on the scene it erred, not like the shareholders who were making haste to be rich by commission, but by omission. Observe, I am not defending the Bombay Government which, although it took the best banking advice within its reach—which is not saying much—failed to secure the interests of the people of India, which were represented by £120,000 embarked in the Old Bank of Bombay; but its fellow shareholders are not the persons to cast stones at it. They were far, far more culpable; and if it is said that some of them were living at a distance and could not exercise effectual control, might not the same thing have been said of hundreds and hundreds of persons who lost their money in the numerous great concerns which went crashing down here in England in 1866? The people at a distance were concluded by the acts of the people on the spot, who were largely engaged in the wild speculations of the time, and the House must not forget that many of the Bombay Bank shareholders were concerned in the very speculations that ruined them as shareholders; but even as to those who had neither part nor lot in the wilder speculations, is it not true that persons who put their money into banks, if they are in their senses, make their arrangements accordingly? They expect high interest, but they do not expect security equal to that of the funds or of other steady-going investments. Much is made in all discussions of this kind of the losses of the widow and the orphan; but those are not the true friends of the widow and the orphan who encourage them to get 16 per cent for their money. There is another point to which, I think, the hon. Member has hardly paid sufficient attention. Supposing, even, that a moral claim were made out for some persons, who would the persons be? Would they be the persons who happened to be the shareholders at the moment the Bank went wrong, or would they be the persons who hold shares of the Old Bank of Bombay at this moment? I think the hon. Member would find that even if he succeeded in forcing the Government to commit the great wrong of robbing the people of India to pay the Bombay Bank shareholders, the persons benefited would consist largely of persons who had bought the shares for a mere song on the chance of something being done by the Government. To sum up, it seems to me that the Bombay Government was overtrustful and injudicious, as well as most unfortunate; but that with regard to its fellow shareholders, its conduct was damnum absque injuria. How was it that the commercial Directors, who were twice as numerous as the Government Directors, never found out the kind of man they had for a secretary? Each of the parties concerned—the Government of Bombay and the shareholders—had great powers, which powers, if properly exercised, might have saved the Bank, and each party neglected its respective duties; but the people of India did no wrong, while they lost a great deal; and the least reasonable course that could be proposed would be to compensate one of the guilty parties, not out of the pockets of the other—for nobody proposes to confiscate by Act of Parliament the property of the persons more or less connected with the Bombay Government who had to do with the misfortunes of the Old Bank of Bombay—but out of the pockets of perfectly innocent persons, who had neither directly nor indirectly anything whatever to do with the whole transaction. I repeat, I am not defending the Government of Bombay. I am defending nobody and nothing but the pockets of the people of India. The Government of Bombay was in 1866 in the hands of a man who well knew how to defend himself—a man of the highest merit, although in this one instance unsuccessful. My hon. Friend must remember that he is looking at these affairs after they have been examined and thrashed out by a Commission which sat for about a year. The Bombay Government, which had many other things to attend to, was looking at them while a great number of persons were interested in deliberately hoodwinking it, and while many more were as much blinded by sanguine hopes as were people in England at the very same time, and up to the great Overend-Gurney crash.

MR. EASTWICK said, he wished to say a few words in support of the Motion, notwithstanding the speech which they had just heard. The Under Secretary of State for India had endeavoured to repudiate the responsibility of the Government Directors by saying that they were at the Board simply to look after the interest of the large sum of money which the Government had invested in the Bank; that the Government Directors were there as any other Directors might have been; and that the shareholders had no reason to look to them for protection more than to any other of the Directors. It was, however, impossible for the representatives of the Government to be connected with a Bank, and to stand upon the same footing with other Directors elected by the shareholders, for shareholders would be hoodwinked by seeing the Government taking a share in the concern, and would trust to that fancied security, notwithstanding all the cautions common sense might suggest to their minds. Hence it was that the authorities of the East India Company manifested such extreme repugnance to allowing the Government to be mixed up with banking concerns. In treating of the conduct of the Government Directors, and also the Government of Bombay itself, he hardly knew how in words adequately to describe the way they had conducted the affairs of the Bank. Had there been mere mismanagement on the part of the Government Directors, he should not have asked for the losses resulting therefrom to be made good; but there had been more than mismanagement on the part of the Directors of the Bank—there had been that which some persons might be disposed to term swindling for their own benefit, and an utter neglect of the interests of the shareholders. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India had asked why the people of India should be called upon to pay for this scandalous and flagitious conduct? But he (Mr. Eastwick) said it was in the interests of the people of India themselves that he asked that part of the money lost by the shareholders should be made good, because the confidence of the Indian community had been rudely shaken in all banking establishments with which the Government was connected, and if the matter were entirely passed over in silence by the Government of India, the people of India would never again have faith in any banking establishment whatever. He asked, in the first place, for money to prosecute the delinquent Directors; and, secondly, for money to make good all trust funds invested in the Bank. He gave a cordial support to the Motion.

MR. DICKINSON said, he could not support the Motion, for while admitting that the fact of the Government of India having become shareholders of the Bank of Bombay had given that establishment an importance which it would not otherwise have possessed, and had induced private persons to invest their money in it, he thought that there was no ground for asking the people of India to pay the losses that had been incurred through the misconduct of the Directors and their officers. If the Indian Government were to be held pecuniarily responsible because the Directors whom they appointed failed in their duty, the Home Government might be held responsible too for having appointed those who, as Members of the Indian Government, had misconducted themselves. And if the Indian Government were to be held responsible because shareholders believed that they had Government security for their capital, persons subscribing to Indian Government Loans would claim to hold the British Government responsible if India were lost, because they believed that they had such ultimate security to fall back upon. He did not see how anyone supporting the Resolution could stop short of those conclusions. The Legislative Council of Bombay had given a dangerous power to the Bank; but it was a novel proposition to him that the people of a country were to pay because those to whom the Legislature had given certain powers exercised those powers improperly. Even if the Bank Directors were culpable, that was no reason why the shareholders should call upon the general community to bear their losses, more especially when the Government were represented by three only out of a Board of nine Directors. If the Bank had become insolvent the creditors, under the unlimited-liability principle, might have come upon the Government as the richest shareholder in the concern to pay; but the Government in that case would have been entitled to come upon the other shareholders to make good their proportion of the contribution. But in this case the Bank had simply lost its capital, and there was no reason why one class of shareholders should come upon another to replace the lost capital. The conclusion of the Commissioners, which had not been read, was that the losses were due to these causes—First, the Act of 1863 removed restrictions that were contained in the former Act; second, the abuse of power by weak and unprincipled Secretaries, acting under the influence of native Directors; third, the President and Directors of the first and second periods were negligent of their duty; fourth, the exceptional nature of the times required more than ordinary vigilance and care; fifth, the President and Directors of the first, second, third, and fourth periods were not cognizant of banking business, and were incapable of managing such an institution in difficult times; sixth, the absence of sound legal advice—these were the grounds of the losses which it was asked that the people of India should make up; and he protested against the adoption of so dangerous a precedent, for which none of those causes afforded any legitimate ground.

MR. DENISON said, he was unable to support the Motion, but did not regret that the discussion had been held. He thought the House would be of opinion that a more scandalous revelation of the conduct of a great institution like the Bombay Bank had never been placed before Parliament; and, if he cared to do so, he might exhaust the English language in finding terms strong enough to reprobate the conduct of those who were responsible for all this malfeasance. But it became a very different matter when the House was asked to interpose between the shareholders of a trading concern like the Bank of Bombay, and to pledge the credit of the Government of India for the wrong-doing of those who were primarily responsible. He could take no such view as that, and he thought the passing of the Resolution would be most mischievous; and that it would, in fact, be offering a premium for any future amount of misconduct on the part of those who managed these banks, if in times of prosperity the shareholders in a concern like the Bombay Bank were to take advantage of everything which prosperity brought them, and then when the day of adversity came they were to come down on the State, in order to be guaranteed against any losses which might have arisen from their mercantile speculations. He did not know by what reason it could be urged that the directors of a bank who, by their own misconduct and wrongdoing had reaped failure, should then turn round and say that the taxpayers of the country ought to make up their deficiencies; and he was sure that such a doctrine as that would not be entertained by that House. It would be altogether a wrong conclusion to say that, because the Government were shareholders in the Bank, they were to be held responsible for any losses that might arise, for the Government of Bombay was completely hoodwinked by those who ought to have kept them informed of the position of the Bank, and the Governor of Bombay was misled by inaccurate reports. The Government of Bombay, however, committed one great error which had not been explained, and that was that for 10 months it withheld the information asked for by the Government of India. He quoted the Report of the Commissioners on the point; but he did not make the same deduction from it as did the supporters of the Resolution. They had now to look at the dry legal bearings of the question; and such a Resolution as that proposed would not only be mischievous in itself, but it would be an interference with the action of the law, and possibly prejudice the position of Parliament as the ultimate Court of Appeal. He hoped, therefore, the House would pause, and not pass the Resolution. Although he had as much sympathy as any Member of that House for the interests of those who were unable to look after their own affairs, he believed this was a question not of sentiment, but of dry legal justice. The House could not, if it had regard to that consideration, pass the Resolution, and he hoped his hon. Friend would not press it to a division, because by withdrawing it he would do more good to those whose cause he advocated.

MR. CANDLISH said, it was not alleged that the Government of India were legally liable for the losses of the shareholders of the Bank of Bombay. If there had been a legal claim the question would not have been raised in that House, but before another tribunal. The question was, whether the Motion was not founded in reason, and was there not ground for the fair consideration of the claims of those who had suffered from the failure of the Bank? Everyone must condemn the action of the Government of Bombay, through whose wrong course of conduct a vast number of innocent persons had been brought to poverty. Would it, then, be wrong to make the people of India pay for the misconduct of their Government?

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. CANDLISH resumed, and said that he should have been glad if the Government had seen their way to accept the proposed Resolution; or if they had promised to make further inquiry with a view of mitigating the sufferings of those who had experienced such heavy losses; and especially so, when they considered, as no doubt was the case, that the persons suffering believed they had the virtual guarantee of the Government for the security of their deposits. He should like the House to say to those innocent and unfortunate people who had suffered so grievously, that the persons through whose culpability the suffering arose should be compelled to make good the loss.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he thought the reasons of the hon. Member for Sunderland ought to lead the House to a conclusion opposite to that at which the hon. Member had himself arrived. The hon. Member said some of the shareholders in the Bank believed that they had the security of the Government for their capital; but he (the Solicitor General) could not comprehend how people who were receiving interest at the rate of 16 per cent per annum upon their investment could possibly arrive at the conclusion that in addition to this they had Government security also. It was clear that they could not have a Government guarantee in addition to so high a rate of interest. He agreed, however, with the hon. Member, that the innocent ought not to be punished for the guilty; but he had not heard a word to show that it was the shareholders who were innocent and the taxpayers who were guilty. The accusation of the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) against the Government of India was that, without the knowledge of the shareholders, the Government caused an Act of the Legislature to be passed which was not in accordance with the instructions sent out by Sir Charles Wood; and that the Act gave ampler powers to the Bank of Bombay, than were formerly entrusted to it, and ampler powers than it was either necessary or proper for the Bank to possess. On both of these points he differed from the hon. Member. Those powers were sought and obtained by the Directors on the instructions and with the express authority of the shareholders, as expressed at a General Meeting held on November 28, 1861, and they were, therefore, alone responsible if the powers obtained were too wide. He could not, on the other hand, conceive on what tenable ground it was sought to place the responsibility upon the Government of India, and he was of opinion that but for the fact that it turned out by accident there had been a difference of opinion between Sir Charles Wood and the Government of Bombay, the House would never have heard of this question. He could not, moreover, concur with the hon. Member for East Sussex that the powers given to the Directors were too great for any bank to possess. It was no sufficient ground of complaint against them to say that they were larger than those conferred by the old charter, or larger than those possessed by the Banks in the other Presidencies, unless it could also be shown that they were improper powers. Why, the Bank of England existed under a charter which conferred powers only limited by the discretion of the Directors, but would anyone say that the Government of this country was in any way bound to indemnify the stockholders against any want of prudence on the part of the Directors? The next complaint was, that as the Government of Bombay, which had a large stake in the concern, had appointed, out of a Board of nine, three Directors who had neglected their duties, they were therefore liable to make good any loss which had followed upon such neglect. It was to him, however, an entirely new legal principle that the shareholders who elected Directors were to be held responsible to the other shareholders for the laches of the persons they elected. The three Government Directors neglected their duty, some of the shareholders' Directors also neglected their duty, and the remainder did something worse. Now, supposing the principle he had just mentioned were a just one, the loss should fall not upon the Government, but upon those shareholders whose nominees on the Board had been guilty of something beyond simple negligence, for it had been decided over and over again in England, that directors who had taken no part in the commission of breaches of trust were not liable, but that the liability rested simply upon those who had been engaged in the commission of wrongful acts. An observation had been made on the question of providing a sum of money to cover the expense of prosecuting some of the Directors, but the Report of the Commissioners only mentioned two of the Directors as having been guilty of moral misconduct, and as far as even they were concerned he failed to see how a criminal prosecution would lie. It was also said that there were certain cestuis que trust, who were specially deserving of sympathy. But either the trustees of these persons were authorized to invest in Bank shares by the terms of their trust-deeds, and the persons taking the advantage of the investment must also take the risk; or if the trustees were not so authorized by the trust-deeds, they were personally responsible for any loss which might accrue. On what principle, moreover, was it sought to tax the innocent people of India for these losses? They were said to be responsible for the government of India. But if anybody was responsible, was it not the people of England? They elected representatives in Parliament, who in substance nominated Ministers, who again appointed the Government of India; and the Government of India again nominated certain gentlemen to be Directors of a concern in which the Government had a pecuniary interest. These gentlemen neglected their duties; and the logical consequence, if followed out, would be that the people of England should be responsible. If any hon. Member thought that a legal, rational, or moral ground existed for such a claim, he ought to vote for the Motion; but he (the Solicitor General) doubted whether anyone would get up in this House and make that claim.

MR. HENLEY said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down had argued the question on legal grounds alone; he (Mr. Henley), however, would remind the hon. and learned Gentleman that the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) had not put it upon such grounds at all, but had pointed out that if there had been legal grounds to go upon, an appeal would not have been made to that House. He (Mr. Henley) quite agreed that if persons embarked in such concerns, and took profits on ordinary grounds, they must bear the losses; but the question there was, whether, in that particular case, there had been matters so exceptional—so completely exceptional—as to take it out of the ordinary rule? He thought there was, for the following reasons:—In the case of the first Bank charter, which gave powers of issue to the Bank, would anyone suppose that the Government Directors were not at the Board to watch over the issue, and its relation to the currency? They must remember that the public in India looked on Government with a very different eye from the people of England, and attributed a very different degree of responsibility to any matter in which Government had a finger. The hon. and learned Gentleman had illustrated his argument by the Bank of England, stating that it had the same power as the Bank of Bombay. But there would be rather a call out against the negligence of the Government here supposing the Bank of England to-morrow were to omit to publish their monthly return of the specie, and the Government took no heed of it. The hon. and learned Gentleman had further argued that the shareholders were to look to their Directors, and the Government were to look to theirs. But when putting forward that argument he had omitted a very important point—he had omitted the audit which the Government had power to call for, and which they did not call for.

Was that not lâches? But was that all? Twice the Bank had got into difficulties, and what did Government do? To prevent great inconvenience, panic, and loss to the whole community, and to the taxpayers of India, they advanced money, and pulled the Bank through. Was that done once? No; it was done twice. And what was the result? If the Government had not done that, the Bank might have been wound up; and the loss to the shareholders would not have been one-half what it had been since. That the hon and learned Gentleman entirely omitted. There, he thought, the Government had failed. His hon. and gallant Friend below him (Colonel Barttelot) had said that the Government of Bombay had not done their duty, and that they almost threw dust into the eyes of the Government of India, by keeping up the supposition that the concern was a going concern, when, in point of fact, if they had looked into it, they must have seen it was in a dangerous state. Considering how the people of India looked to the Government—that they were led by the lâches of the Government into false belief of the solvency of the Bank—he could not but think that the Government was highly to blame, and believing that, he also believed that the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for East Sussex was a fair Motion, for it had been said—he did not know how truthfully—that the Government took advantage of the state of things, and, to use a common phrase, made hay while the sun shone, and sold a great quantity of Government property at very enhanced prices. Much had been said about the people of India and of England, and it had been asked, why should they be taxed to make good the deficiency? Unfortunately, the saying was too true—

At the present moment the Government had landed them in a mess with America which they would have to pay for. Therefore, if the Government of Bombay had committed lâches, the people of India must suffer for the carelessness of the Government. He could not but think that the Government here had not looked after their own agents, and that they had not taken advantage of the power the law gave them to insist on an audit, and for those reasons he should support the Motion of his hon. Friend.

MR. M. CHAMBERS said, he had listened with some grief to the speech of his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General, who had argued this important, national, and honourable case upon strictly legal, but not upon either equitable, humane, or Christian principles. He did not wish to go into minute details, but to lay down an honest and honourable principle which was this—that whenever the Government appointed agents, and gave Government guarantees to persons who had invested their money, when the money was lost they ought to come forward and say—“You have trusted in us, you have been deceived, and many of you almost ruined; we shall take care that you shall be indemnified.” The history of the case was this—the Bank of Bombay, as he conjectured, was originally a private speculation; but after a certain time it became a partnership between the Government and the private speculators. The Government took a certain number of shares and obtained the privilege of nominating three Directors to look after the interests of the shareholders, in common with the other Directors. What was the result? The poor people who were inclined to put their money in the Bombay Bank said to themselves—“We are sure to have our interests guarded now, because, substantially, it is a Government Bank.” It was true, according to the nice, comfortable statement of the Solicitor General, that these people had the privilege of choosing their own six or seven Directors; but the result was, that the public and the shareholders trusted to the solidity of the Bank, and believed that they had got Government security for their money, whether invested in shares or lodged on deposit; and the result was, that the shares in the Bombay Bank must have risen, and did rise, to a high premium, as soon as it was known that the Government had joined the Bank and appointed three Directors. The instant the Government joined the Bombay Bank, it became in the estimation of the public a solid, substantial Bank; and the answer of the Solicitor General that these poor investors bought shares under the idea that they would receive 16 per cent, and all such nonsense, had nothing to do with the question. The fact, however, was that many sufferers were not original shareholders, but had purchased their shares at an advanced price, relying on Government security. He had often heard in the House of Commons, especially from the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the time being, such an expression as this—“What a dreadful hardship has been inflicted, but where is the money to come from to mitigate that hardship?” A great grievance had been inflicted by the impropriety—though not intentional—of the Government, and his answer to the question who ought to pay in this case was more to the point, and more honest—namely, that the money should come from those who inflicted the evil. [Laughter.] They certainly ought to pay, and he thanked the Prime Minister for smiling assent to that honest proposition. That smile fairly trumped out the appeal addressed to the House by his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General. It had been suggested that India or the district of Bombay ought to pay. If India was to blame, let India pay. But if ruin had been inflicted on these wretched investors by the default of agents of the English Government, they were honourable enough and rich enough to say—“We will pay.” The agents appointed by the Government neglected their duty of auditing the accounts of the Bank, and of seeing that it was properly conducted; and for the consequence of that neglect Her Majesty’s Government were responsible, and he would say the same thing if the present Government were Tories. He did not like to talk shop—namely, to refer to principles recognized in the Courts in which he practised; but to show that Her Majesty’s Government were responsible for the default of the three Directors whom they appointed, he must state the Common Law maxim—that he who did a thing by his agent did it by himself. His hon. and learned and technical Friend, who was an Equity Barrister, said the Government were not at all responsible; but if he went into a Common Law Court he would find that a very different opinion would be entertained of the case. He (Mr. M. Chambers) might be regarded as an impetuous, and sometimes as a romantic man; but he hoped the House would forgive him, if he said that he could come to no other conclusion than this—that our national faith would not be elevated if some kind of compensation were not made to these unfortunate shareholders, who relied on that faith when they invested their money. This was something more than a common-place Motion; it involved a question of national honour, and should be treated accordingly.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he could assure the House that there was no intention of treating this case lightly, and that there was no want of sympathy with those unfortunate persons whose case had been brought forward; indeed, in his opinion, those cases required the most serious and tender consideration. The matter was one for very grave consideration not only because a considerable number of persons were affected, but also because it undoubtedly involved to a certain extent the question of national honour, upon which they ought to speak freely and without reserve, and because also there were questions of policy which it was not, perhaps, possible to go fully into then, but which he hoped upon a future occasion would receive the attention they deserved. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India had laid the question before the House in a manner that entirely precluded the necessity of anyone else following him at length, and what he said was said with great judgment, fairness, and ability; but he (Sir Stafford Northcote) felt bound to address the House, because some part of these transactions took place whilst he was at the India Office, and the Commission to which reference had been so frequently made, was issued by the Government of India upon his recommendation, and he wished to explain the views that led to the issue of that Commission. They should look at this matter dispassionately, laying aside for a moment those natural feelings of compassion which they did not wish to stifle, and they should endeavour to see how far the Government of this country or that of India could be held responsible for what had taken place. He did not think that what they had heard about the connection between the Government and the Presidency Banks had given altogether a fair impression upon the subject, for the impression given was that the Government had taken upon themselves a much greater amount of responsibility for the management of those Banks than was really the case. He had no hesitation in saying that the connection between the Government and the Presidency Banks was a mistake; and he earnestly hoped that the time might not be very distant when the matter would be taken into serious consideration, and when something would be done to remedy it. The matter, however, was one of no inconsiderable difficulty, and its consideration would take some time. But what was the connection? The Government did not only not guarantee the solvency of those Banks, but they had in former times distinctly declined to do so, although the Government certainly did enter into certain terms and conditions with them. It kept its accounts with them, and it gave them certain advantages in reference to the issue of notes; and, moreover, Government advanced a certain amount of capital in the form of shares, and claimed the right of appointing a certain number of Directors to sit at the Board. The Government Directors, however, only constituted about a third of the Directors of the Bank of Bombay. Still, in so acting, the Government did take an important and very prominent position in connection with those Banks, and did to a certain extent incur responsibility in the eyes of the public. Still, he must say that the Government could not be held responsible to its co-shareholders for any mismanagement or fraud in the conduct of those Banks, unless such fraud were distinctly traceable to the action of the Government Directors; but not simply on the ground that the Government Directors, if they had been more active, intelligent, or competent men, might have prevented it. No doubt, it might have been an inducement to take shares in a bank of that description, that it was known that the Government were interested in the conduct of its affairs, and had certain representatives upon the Directorate; and that if those representatives did their duty and were efficient men it would be extremely improbable that any misfortune would arise. He contended, however, that what the Government had done did not amount to a guarantee, or even a moral guarantee against loss. Look at the number of the Government Directors, and the mode in which they were associated with their co-Directors, and it would be seen that this could not be so. If the Government had intended to secure the Bank from going wrong,

Sir Stafford Northcote

would they have been content with having a mere minority among the Directors, or would they not rather have secured a complete control? The source of the mischief that had occurred was trusting men who ought not to have been trusted, and advancing money upon improper securities; and the duty of seeing that those who applied to the Bank for advances were men of substance devolved upon the commercial Directors, who were acquainted with the commercial affairs of the country and the character of those who applied. The Government Directors were not competent to do this. They held important posts in the service of the Government, the duties of which occupied much of their time; and even if they could have devoted all their time to the Bank, they would have lacked competence for this part of the duty of a director from want of commercial experience. Not only were they not competent to judge of a man's commercial character, but their incapacity was well known; and the shareholders had no right under the circumstances to trust to the supervision of men whose time was occupied by their official business, and who could go down to the Bank for only a day or two now and then to see what was going on. They, in fact, had neither the time nor the capability of controlling the management of the Bank. The Commissioners had reported, in extenuation of the want of vigilance on the part of the Government, that the returns sent by the Bank to the Government were of "a delusive character." And from the evidence given by one of the commercial Directors it appeared that he was alarmed a few days after he became a Director, upon the discovery that the Bank was involved in loans to men who had speculated largely; but Mr. Tracy told him "they had better not discuss the subject then, as the Government Directors were only too apt to take alarm." That showed how inclined the commercial Directors were to keep things back; but at the same time, he was far from acquitting the Government Directors from blame in not having pressed to the utmost for the fullest information. People ought to have known that the Government did not undertake the duty of protecting them. The Government held out no such expectation, and the mode in which they exercised their power showed that they did not attempt to do this, and could not do it. He, therefore, entirely agreed with nearly all that had been said as to the want of due diligence and of the reasonable or even moderate care on the part of those whose duty it was to have watched the affairs of the Bank; and he was not disposed to defend anybody, though, probably, circumstances might be urged in excuse of the conduct of particular individuals. After the wide-spread ruin which the downfall of the Bank had caused, there was a natural tendency to see more clearly the faults which had been committed by those persons; but at the same time, their chief fault seemed to have been want of judgment, and a desire to prevent great calamities which might, as they thought, be averted by supporting the Bank. He was bound to say, further, that in his opinion the conduct of the Bombay Government was very injudicious at that time, and if this were a Motion of Censure upon them, he could not ask the House to free them from their share of blame. But a Motion to commend the shareholders to the favourable consideration of the Government really meant an addition to the taxes of India, and for such a Motion there was no foundation. What were the faults that were charged against the Government of Bombay? One of them was of a rather remarkable character. It was said that a great fault was committed by the Legislative Council of Bombay, in permitting a new Act to pass without inserting the safeguards which had been inserted in a previous Act; but the Government could not be held responsible for all that was done under that Act. To maintain that view would be to lay down a very serious principle, and one that it would be difficult to follow out to its consequences. Stress had been laid on the fact that under the old Bank Act, the Directors were allowed to make advances on shares in undertakings guaranteed by the Government, but that in passing the new Act through the Legislature, the words "guaranteed by the Government" were struck out. No doubt, if those words had been kept in, the advances could not have been made; but it was not because those words were struck out that there was a necessity for the advances to be made; and the doctrine that the Legislature, or those whom they represented, were to be responsible for all that might be done in consequence of the want of proper precautions, was a doctrine which could not be maintained. He would take, by way of illustration, the relationship between the Government and the savings banks. The House had heard something said about the breaking of the Bank of England, and the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) said he thought the people would make a great stir if the Bank of England did not publish their weekly accounts. They had heard sometimes of savings banks, and they knew that the humbler classes invested in the savings banks, under the impression that because the Government had something to do with them they were quite safe; and they had heard of poor people having lost their all, and then complained because the banks in which they had invested were Government savings banks. And what had been the answer? They had been told that they were wrong. The case of the unfortunate shareholders in the Bombay Bank, however, was not so strong as the case he had put. The depositors in the Bank of Bombay did not lose a sixpence, the Government being responsible to them; but in the savings banks at home it was the depositors who suffered. As to the shareholders in the Bombay Bank, they did not offer to share with the Government any of the advantages they gained from the Bank when things went well, and how, then, could they expect the Government to bear the loss when things turned out ill? There was no charge that the Directors had improperly appropriated money for their own purposes, but that they had made reckless advances upon unsound speculations. They did so, doubtless, in the hope that these speculations were good ones, and there was no reason to suppose that they had not the interests of the Bank at heart. They hoped to do a good, dashing, speculative business, which would bring in large profits. Under such circumstances, it was unreasonable to say that the Government, who never shared the profits, ought to bear the losses. While, therefore, sympathizing with many of those unfortunate shareholders, he was forced to the conclusion that no case was made out for their relief which it was possible to recognize, and it would be equally impossible to make any distinction between different classes of shareholders, such as cestuis que trust. The hon. Member for Penrhyn (Mr. Eastwick) asked the House to undertake the cost of a prosecution, but the Motion did not raise the question of prosecution. He, (Sir Stafford Northcote) moreover, failed to see that it was a case for a criminal prosecution, and he was afraid it would be a delusion to think that the House could do anything in that way. He therefore thought that the only thing that could be done was to express sympathy for the sufferers. With regard to the allusion that had been made of the keeping back of the Report, he had asked the Commissioners to report on several points, and these being matters of opinion, not of fact, it was found more convenient that they should furnish separate Reports. He had been favoured with a sight of them, for they arrived after he left office, and he could assure his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Barttelot), that they contained nothing respecting this case which could have led to their being kept back for a purpose. They touched, indeed, on the matter in illustration of the views of the Commissioners on the future and general policy, but not on the question of compassionate treatment of the shareholders. In conclusion, he must say, that as the discussion would be equally useful to those for whom his hon. Friend had brought the matter forward without a division, which could lead to no practical good, he hoped, therefore, the House would be spared the pain of dividing on the Motion.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he wished to allude to an observation of the Under Secretary of State for India, which apparently propounded a doctrine utterly inconsistent with sound sense, and which he protested against. His hon. Friend said that the House could not entertain this question with justice or propriety, because it would probably involve a heavy payment by the taxpayers of India for the misfeasance of the Directors of the Bombay Bank. It appeared to him (Mr. Bouverie) that such an argument came to this—that whatever might be the misconduct of the Government of Bombay or their agents, involving pecuniary responsibility, they ought not to be saddled with that responsibility, because the taxpayers of India might be obliged to suffer for it.

MR. GRANT DUFF: I never said anything of the kind. I said that such a course might possibly tend to such a result.

Sir Stafford Northcote

MR. BOUVERIE did not mean to quote the precise words of his hon. Friend, but only to show that he argued against the question being entertained on grounds which led unavoidably to such a conclusion. Now that, he (Mr. Bouverie) submitted, was a doctrine which could not be maintained for one moment. The question was a very simple one. Having looked into the matter last year, it appeared to him that the Government of Bombay had incurred a grave responsibility by the misfeasance of their three Directors of the Bombay Bank. Those gentlemen, indeed, did not form a majority of the Board; but they held high and responsible situations in the Government, and as such they ought to have resisted the gambling propensities of their fellow-Directors on the Board, instead of co-operating with them in their monstrous speculations—their gambling—he would almost say swindling transactions. Why did they not inform the Government, and call their attention to what was going on? The main question, however, was, what was the opinion of those eminent officers of State who had the fullest means of acquaintance with the facts of the case, and with the responsibility of the Bombay Government? Now, Lord Lawrence, the Governor General of India, at the time, said in his Minute of the 12th July, 1867, that the circumstances which led to the ruin of the Bombay Bank were the result of the neglect and absence of the most reasonable precautions of the Bombay Government—that if ordinary care had been taken and a proper supervision established, the Bank would have surmounted all its difficulties. Mr. Massey, the then financial Minister of India, writing at the same time, said that in the summer of 1865 the Bombay Bank was hard pressed—her shares had fallen below par—but no sooner was it announced that the Bank was supported by the unlimited credit of the Government, than the depositors brought back the moneys they had withdrawn, and the shares rose to 60 premium. He said that it was in consequence of the action of the Governor General replying to Sir Bartle Frere's application for assistance to prevent the Bank from instant ruin, that the people of Bombay were induced to repose confidence in the Bank, though at that time it had actually lost half its capital. Mr. Massey added, that he did not think the Government could take any other course at that time, because the Government of Bombay had by their conduct made themselves partners and Directors of the Bank—that the difficulties of the Bank were caused mainly by the unpardonable negligence of the Government Directors, and, consequently, the Government itself must be responsible for the action of its agents or nominees. Whenever the Government took part in such proceedings it assumed the duty of honourably conducting them; and when they were dishonestly conducted, the Government were necessarily responsible. Such responsibility, in fact, formed the unanswerable argument against Government connection with banks, and it was on that account that the Government of India objected to the provincial Governments being connected with banking companies. A Government which accepted responsibility was responsible pecuniarily as well as otherwise, even though the taxpayers would unfortunately be the sufferers, and the remark of the hon. Member for Penrhyn (Mr. Eastwick), that this was analogous to the Alabama case was unanswerable. If the Government incurred responsibility, the taxpayers must meet it; and there had never been a stronger case of gross misconduct, imposing on the Government a responsibility which ought to be exacted by this House to the uttermost farthing. He would go further, and say that it was the bounden duty of the Government of India—if they wished to vindicate their own character, and, at any rate, by their subsequent proceedings to set themselves straight with the Indian and the English public—to have prosecuted the men who, as Government officials, had been parties to those swindling transactions. Was it not true that those gentlemen who were placed on the direction of the Bank by the Government of Bombay, to protect the interests of the public and the Government of Bombay, and to see that the affairs of the Bank were conducted in a proper and legitimate way and according to the ordinary rules of business, had put large sums of money into their own pockets, at the expense of the shareholders and the public, by neglecting their duty? A more discreditable series of transactions than was disclosed in those Papers never appeared in any Blue Book, and it was a shame to the Indian Government that they seemed never to have taken a single step to prosecute those officials, but had left that to be done by the unfortunate shareholders who had been ruined by their gross misconduct. Therefore, he did not think that the Government of Bombay could be acquitted in the easy, airy manner adopted by the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State; for, to judge from the opinion of their conduct expressed by Mr. Prinsep, one of the Indian Council, and a man of great Indian experience and knowledge of business, they were not only parties to those transactions, but had endeavoured to screen those concerned in them as much as they could. Indeed, it would appear that the public, and those who represented the public, had never been able to get at the bottom of those black and flagitious proceedings.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS said, he must enter his protest against the Resolution which the House was now asked to affirm. There was a great fallacy in the arguments adduced in support of the Motion, because the position of the depositors and creditors of the Bank had been confused with that of the shareholders. As a lawyer, having some experience of mercantile transactions, he thought that even if all the allegations made to the House that night concerning the Bank were true—and he denied that there was any foundation for the majority of those allegations—still a case was not made out for passing that Resolution. Assuming that the Government of India were partners in those transactions, partners had no right to come there and complain of one another, when they had more than an equal share in appointing the persons who managed the business; and if the shareholders had been defrauded, it was the fault of the Directors whom the shareholders themselves had appointed; and the shareholders were responsible for the acts of their agents. No doubt, a certain kind of sympathy must be felt with those who had been subjected to misfortune; but, beyond that, he protested against sympathizing with shareholders who invested their money in dangerous ventures, and then turned round and asked for assistance, saying they had been cheated. He would say that nothing was safe but the Three per Cents. If people would make investments, in the hope of getting a return of 5, 10, 15, or 20 per cent, they must look out for themselves; and he protested against paying taxes for those who chose to speculate without a proper knowledge of what they were doing. If the question went to a division, he should vote with the Government.

Mr. GLADSTONE said, that speeches had been made that night from which it might have been supposed that that was a case in which the Government of Bombay had borne no liability, and that it was sought by them to throw their own share of liability on the shoulders of the shareholders. That inference might have been drawn especially from the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Devonport (Mr. M. Chambers), who, by the way, had contrived throughout to treat an extremely serious and mournful subject with a degree of hilarity that he had never witnessed on any similar occasion. However, they were all agreed as to the general inexpediency of that connection of Government with banks, and that one of the great objections to such a connection was its tendency to mislead the shareholders. Yet that tendency was not sufficient to exempt the shareholders from their responsibility, and to throw it on the shoulders of the people for whom the Government were bound to act. The responsibility of the Government in respect to the Post Office Savings Banks was distinct and clear; but in regard to many other savings banks, where there were many circumstances which might have had a tendency to mislead, the House had on various occasions when the question was raised there, steadily refused to acknowledge its liability. Moreover, if the present were a Motion to make provision out of the taxes paid by the people of England for the losses sustained by these shareholders, he suspected that very few hon. Gentlemen would be found voting for it; and ought they to deal more severely with the people of India than they would with their own constituents? In fact, if there was any liability resting on the Government at all in that case, considering how completely the Indian Government was a derivation from the will of the people of this country, it was difficult to determine whether that liability attached to the people of this country or to the people of India. Again, it was too much to assume that shareholders were entitled to all the delights of dividend mounting up to 16 per cent, and then on the strength of vague presumptions to claim the benefits of a Government guarantee. It was said the Government Directors were wrong, and so they were; but the wrong they did consisted in their passive conduct, and they were, moreover, the minority; while the Directors appointed by the shareholders were the active wrong-doers, and also the majority. Was the responsibility, then, to be carried over to the passive minority? The right hon. Gentleman behind him (Mr. Bouverie) had imported into the discussion a new and important element; he had said that the House ought to be influenced by the opinions of the distinguished Civil servants of India, who were upon the spot, and who were conversant with the whole bearings of the subject; and, in particular, he had referred to some remarks of Mr. Massey in relation to the question. [Mr. BOUVÉRIE explained that he had not made the extract himself.] He was perfectly certain of that, and he would advise his right hon. Friend not to employ the person who had made it for him again. What his right hon. Friend referred to was this—

"So much I presume must be conceded, although there is no legal liability upon the Government, beyond that which attaches to the other shareholders; but does not this moral obligation rest there? An officer of high rank, the representative of the Government, deliberately asserted the claims of the shareholders to an indemnity at the hands of the Government."

But his right hon. Friend had not noticed the concluding words of the sentence, which were—"But I am far from admitting that such a claim can be sustained." The extract should have concluded thus—

"But I do say that it is unseemly and impolitic of the Government to place itself in such a position that a question of this kind can be raised."

In that view he entirely concurred, and he must, therefore, oppose the hon. Member's (Mr. Gregory's) Motion.

Mr. CRAWFORD said, he must protest against the terms in which his right hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Bouverie) had spoken of the connivance of the Government with what he had termed "such misconduct and acts of rascality." He felt bound to say that persons might search in vain in the concluding words summing up the Report to find anything which justified the application of such terms to the commercial Directors as a body. One or two names were mentioned, but there was nothing to justify the application of such wholesale terms. He denied that the language used by his right hon. Friend behind him could be justified, and he thought that, as far as the commercial Direction was concerned, it was wholly uncalled for. He had listened with extreme pain to this debate, because he had lived long on terms of intimacy with many of the unfortunate sufferers, and whatever opinions he might entertain, he must say that it would not be consistent with his feelings to pursue the question any further. He fully admitted the hardships that had fallen upon the unfortunate shareholders, but expressed his concurrence in the views of duty taken by the Government.

MR. W. M. TORRENS said, he admitted in the fullest sense that it was the duty of the House to look narrowly to the circumstances of the case, simply with the view that justice should be done; and he also agreed in the danger of laying down a rule that might lead to evil consequences. This, however, was an exceptional case, and without deviating from their usual line of duty, they could do an act of justice. The First Minister had asserted in unqualified terms that, on no occasion had Parliament interposed by its advice in such matters, or that the Government had ever attempted to alleviate the burden of individual losses out of the Public Treasury. The right hon. Gentleman had challenged the production of any precedent; and he had specially noted the frequent refusals of claims made on behalf of local savings banks, whose funds had proved insufficient to pay the whole of their depositors. But the right hon. Gentleman's memory was not infallible; and he (Mr. Torrens) held in his hand a volume of the transactions of that House which would be found to contain a case in point, which the First Minister appeared to have forgotten. After the panic of 1847 many savings banks failed, particularly in Ireland, and in 1850 a Committee was appointed to inquire whether they had any claims upon the Treasury. In the majority of cases the Committee properly decided in the negative; but in one instance they unanimously came to the Resolution that, while they did not admit the legal right of shareholders in a bank having claims on the Government, they recommended to the favourable consideration of the Government the case of the depositors in one of the banks that had failed, with a view to mitigate, but not remove, the calamity that had befallen them. And the reason why the Committee made that recommendation was because Mr. Tidd Pratt had advised the bank to keep open, after it had found that it was insolvent. That was precisely the case of the Bombay Bank. The House had no business to be humane at the expense of the taxpayers; but it was its duty to be just when Government officers had been guilty of neglect, and had suppressed the truth. If the Bank had been stopped in time the loss would have been less, and the responsibility for that additional loss rested with the Government; and, moreover, the loss incurred by the shareholders up to the time when the unsafe condition of the Bank was discovered, was easily to be discriminated from its state when the final crash came. There was not the slightest doubt for belief in the fact that the Madras, Bombay, and Calcutta Banks were the creation of Government by charter, and they were not private banks; and the Treasury of India having profited by the successful advances and speculations that were carried on by those Banks, they should be held liable for the losses that had occurred. The terms of the charter were altered without giving fair notice to those who were chiefly interested; and the Government, by allowing the Bank to continue open after its insolvency was discovered, made it evident that it was an assenting party throughout of what was done—one change being the repeal of the clause of the charter which provided safeguards when bills were discounted over £7,000 in amount for any firm or individual; and it was not the shareholders, but the Direction and the Government who were to blame for the terrible run that had accompanied the stoppage of this Bank.

MR. T. E. SMITH said, that when he visited Bombay, he was informed by the commercial community there that the Bank had been grossly mismanaged, not by the Government Directors, but by the shareholders' Directors. It had been attempted to confuse the question by representing the position of the depositors and shareholders to be the same.

That, however, was not so. If the depositors had lost their money, no doubt the Government would have been to a certain extent, if not wholly so, morally responsible; but not so with regard to the shareholders. He should vote against the Motion, which he trusted the House would have no difficulty in rejecting.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he wished to say a word in explanation of the extract which had been referred to as the opinion of Mr. Massey. He certainly should not have brought it under the notice of this House if he had been aware of the context as subsequently read to the House by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. He ought to have been old enough and wise enough not to depart from his usual practice of making and verifying his own extracts. As it was, he had given it as it was handed to him after his arrival in the House, and he was very sorry that he had done so.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 116; Noes 78: Majority 38.

Main Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. FAWCETT, in rising to call attention to the remuneration of the Law Officers of the Crown, and also to the grave inconvenience arising to the public from their being able to devote nearly the whole of their time to private practice; and to move, That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable to adopt some new arrangements with regard to the Law Officers of the Crown, with the object of securing for the public the undivided attention of those who are primarily responsible for introducing measures of Law reform, and for tendering legal advice to Her Majesty's Government, said, the subject had been allowed to remain dormant so long that he determined, in deference to public feeling, to call the attention of the House to it; but he wished them to understand that he was in no way actuated by the desire to make a personal attack upon anyone, and more especially upon the Law Officers of the Government. His object was merely to attack a system, and not persons; and in proof of that assertion, he would at once admit that the Law Officers of the Crown had done nothing which had not been done by their predecessors, as they had done nothing which would not also be done by their successors, unless Parliament intervened to change the present system. So cumbrous, inconvenient, and ineffective was the present system that the greatest evils arose from it. So far as the House of Lords was concerned, the duties discharged by the Lord Chancellor were so multifarious—he occupied at least four important judicial offices—that there was but little chance of his giving anything like due attention to questions of Law reform, or of his tendering legal advice to the Government on the most important matters, involving in some cases principles of International Law. Turning, however, to the House of Commons, the state of things was far more unsatisfactory; for while the Lord Chancellor in the other House could, as a Member of the Cabinet, give direct advice to the Government, the Law Officers of the Crown in this House, not being Members of the Cabinet, could give advice to the Government only in a circuitous way. Then the Lord Chancellor had the whole of his time occupied with public duties, while with regard to the offices of Attorney and Solicitor General, if the holders of these offices were accomplished lawyers and great orators, briefs fell rapidly in upon them, and by the etiquette of the Bar either the Attorney or the Solicitor General became the leader in any case in which he was engaged; and the leader in a great case, as everyone knew, had all his faculties engaged, and quite enough to occupy his time, however strong he might be, either physically or mentally. It happened, therefore, when both these Law Officers were eminent in their profession, that all the time they had for discharging their public duties was what was left after their services had been competed for by rival attorneys and clients. At the present time both the Law Officers of the Crown, fortunately or unfortunately, occupied high positions. It was, however, notorious that when a Law Officer of the Crown was appointed who had not much private practice—as had been the case sometimes—his public duties were found so multifarious and so engrossing that he had quite enough to do to discharge them without attending to any private practice at all. The Attorneys and Solicitors General were primarily responsible for introducing measures of Law reform to the House of Commons, and there was no country in the world whose legal system was so complicated as ours, or in which the process of obtaining justice was so dear and so slow. Why, only yesterday, the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Mr. James) declared to him, that if a merchant of the City of London had a suit at Guildhall he would guarantee, by using the delay which the law placed at his disposal, to prevent the case from being decided for four years. It often happened in civil suits for the recovery of a sum of money that far more money than the sum in dispute was rapidly consumed in legal costs, and the parties found that they were only engaged in throwing good money after bad; and the feeling that that was so had spread through the country, and acted as a sort of premium upon fraud. In addition to that point there were great legal reforms waiting for accomplishment, and until they were carried into execution every man, woman, and child in the country might be considered to suffer. Why, on Wednesday last the Attorney General stated that the laws of this country relating to the property of married women were more worthy of a barbarous nation than of a civilized one; and it would not be difficult to prove that if a lawyer would devote himself to making the conveyance of land cheaper, more simple, and more expeditious—even looking at the subject from an economical point of view—a greater advantage would be conferred upon the country than would result from a free breakfast table or from a remission of the income tax. What chance would there be of passing any great Government measure if those who were responsible for the preparation of such a measure had nearly the whole of their time absorbed in other pursuits? The passing of the Irish Church Act was mainly due to the mastery of detail and perfect knowledge of the subject displayed by the Prime Minister; but if the Premier had been less completely master of the subject, they would have got into a state of inextricable confusion, and the Bill, very possibly, would not have been passed at all. But the Prime Minister was eminent for his financial skill; and if he gave up that skill to be competed for by rival mercantile companies, what chance would there be of his ever introducing another great measure into that House? If, then, it was thought absolutely intolerable for the head of any other Department to give up nearly the whole of his time to other business, he did not see why such a thing should be less intolerable on the part of those who were at the head of the Bar. But that was not the strangest part of the case. The Law Officers of the Crown were primarily responsible also for tendering legal advice to Her Majesty's Government, and there was scarcely a measure ever introduced into the House by a Government which did not contain some difficult legal questions, in dealing with which legal advice was required. But at any moment the Government might be deprived of the assistance and guidance which they should obtain from the Law Officers of the Crown, who might find their whole time and energies absorbed in some private suit. The Prime Minister had admitted to the House that the Alabama Treaty was not even submitted to the Law Officers of the Crown; probably, the right hon. Gentleman had too kind a heart to put the additional strain on men who were so overworked. And what had happened this Session in dealing with the Ballot Bill? Why, in many cases, where the House had wanted a legal interpretation of some clause or Amendment, they had obtained assistance from the Solicitor General, who, when he had risen, had only made confusion more confounded. It was, however, not only with regard to Government measures that complaints might be made, for on Wednesday week, when the measure introduced by the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for the county of Clare (Sir Colman O'Loughlen), relative to the mortmain laws, was under discussion, there were no Law Officers of the Crown present to give the House an authoritative opinion as to its legal effect; and on turning to The Times of the following day, he (Mr. Fawcett) had found that the Attorney General had been engaged on that occasion in the Court of Queen's Bench, arguing a case of "Skinner v. Usher," connected with the hiring of a cab from a railway station, which arose out of a cumbrous and invalid Act conflicting with other Acts, which was passed in 1869, when the hon. and learned Gentleman was one of the Law Officers of the Crown, and which no ordinary mind could understand. Thus the Attorney General and the Solicitor General were so absorbed that they could not give proper attention to Acts passing through the House; and in consequence of the wretched way in which statutes were drawn, long and expensive law suits resulted, in one of which the Attorney General was engaged at the moment when he ought to be in the House giving legal advice to hon. Members. What security had they that another Alabama case would not arise, if the Law Officers of the Crown were absorbed in private business? Again, it was equally unsatisfactory that the Law Officers of the Crown should be practising barristers, and, at the same time, to some extent, public prosecutors. Two years ago a serious question presented itself to the Government, who had to decide whether they could prosecute in the case of the directors of Overend Gurney and Co., and, at that time, their Solicitor General happened to be retained for the very persons against whom the prosecution, if it had been commenced, would have been directed. It was scarcely necessary to refer to a recent trial, which had occupied attention for many months, but that presented the reverse of this case in a striking manner. The Attorney General, who was the counsel engaged against the Claimant, now came forward as the adviser of the Government to prosecute the man, and spend an incalculable sum of public money in the prosecution. The consequences produced in the country were very mischievous. When the Government came to that House and asked for the money they required, they would find that much discontent existed in regard to the expenditure; not because the money was grudged, but from the peculiar relations of the Attorney General with that case, the public had got an idea that there had not been exactly fair play. No one, probably, would regret more than the Attorney General that that feeling should have arisen; but as when engaged in the case, he had found it necessary to brand the Claimant with every opprobrious epithet the dictionary contained, commonplace people thought it hardly satisfactory that he should afterwards become the prosecutor on behalf of the Government and the nation. The present system, moreover, could not be defended on the score of economy. By a Treasury Minute, lately issued, the Attorney General received £7,000 and the Solicitor General £6,000 a-year, simply as retainers, and were to have 20 per cent more for contentious business; and if that Treasury Minute were not severely scrutinized, hon. Members would have to tell their constituents that the fine promises about economy uttered at the hustings were idle words. It was an aggravation of the grievance to say that the salaries of the Law Officers of the Crown were simply paid out of patent fees, because these fees were the most obnoxious and unjust form of taxation which could be levied on industry. He held that the country did not obtain an adequate return for the money spent in that direction. The Law Officers of the Crown were paid higher salaries than the Prime Minister and the Secretaries of State, whose time was wholly at the disposal of the public; and he had no doubt that eminent lawyers could be induced to devote themselves entirely to the public service for smaller salaries than was generally supposed. The legal Member of the Legislative Council of India received £8,000 a-year, and most persons would admit that that was not so tempting as £5,000 in this country, yet there had been no difficulty in securing eminent jurists for that post—among them Lord Macaulay, Sir Henry Maine, and Mr. Fitzjames Stephens, the last of whom had as yet only held the office three years, but had already introduced more comprehensive measures of reform than any one could hope to see introduced in England in double that time. If he was asked what system he proposed to provide for the present one, he would say that in the first place, it was most important that the judicial and political functions of the Lord Chancellor should be separated. In the House of Commons, moreover, what they required was a Minister of Justice, who should be at the head of the Department of Law and Justice, primarily responsible for measures of Law reform, always ready to give a legal opinion on legal questions arising in the House, and whose whole time should be devoted to the public service. Such an officer might receive a salary of £8,000; but even if it were fixed at £10,000, he believed it would be the cheapest money ever voted, if it secured them the services of an eminent lawyer as Minister of Justice. It might also be arranged that the holder of the office would, after a certain number of years, be appointed to a judicial post, or to a seat in the Supreme Court of Appeal. As to the duties in Court now discharged by the Attorney General and Solicitor General, arrangements might be made to retain certain counsel when the Government had to appear in Court, just as was done by the Government of India, by the Bank of England, and most great corporations, and it would probably be an advantage that such counsel should not be Members of the House of Commons. He would not further detain the House, except to say that he hoped this question would soon be taken up by some lawyer of eminence; but, if not, it was too important to be let drop, and he promised that he would pursue it with persistency and perseverance. A great authority had declared that the well-being of a community might be estimated by the extent to which justice was cheap and expeditious; but on that ground assuredly, England could not be pronounced at that present moment as ranking among the most happily situated nations in the world.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: * Mr. Speaker, I have thought it best to interpose thus early in this debate, not at all because I wish to render it a personal matter, but because I have really no interest or desire whatever but that the House should have, as soon as may be, the best and fullest materials before it upon which to form the judgment it is invited to express to-night. Of the tone and temper of my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) I will not say a word. It is a most important question, I admit, which he has taken in hand—more practically important, perhaps, than he or anyone who has not been engaged in actually working the machine of the Executive Government can appreciate or understand. It is a matter also well worthy the attention of the House of Commons how best to secure the highest legal ability for the service of the country, that in time of war and tumult the Executive Government may have the soundest counsels to direct them; and in time of peace may have those changes suggested to them which the law of England is always needing; but which, unless they are wise and thoughtful and well-instructed changes, often, in a complicated and unscientific system like our own, create more evils than they destroy. Sir, I will not say that my hon. Friend has not taken the trouble, but he has not succeeded in informing himself accurately of the state of facts; and his speech has been made, and the language in which his Motion is clothed, has been chosen, under a complete misconception. He says, in effect, that grave inconvenience had arisen from the Law Officers of the Crown being able to devote almost the whole of their time to private practice—a statement which assumes that they do in fact so devote it. Nor does my hon. Friend stand alone in this matter. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford City (Mr. Harcourt), made a striking speech in the provinces last autumn, which he was good enough to send me, and which it became my pleasure as well as duty carefully to read. The speech was a most useful one; for it put into popular language and rendered generally accessible a scheme of the Judicature Commission, which was entombed in a Blue Book read by very few, but which, adopted and rendered popular by my hon. and learned Friend, was no doubt read by many more. But my hon. and learned Friend contributed some original matter of his own; and he stated, if I recollect the expression rightly, that the Law Officers of the Crown are accustomed “to pack away”—that, I think, was the phrase—the Public Business of the country into those nooks and corners of time which a large or moderate private practice may leave undisposed of. Now, nothing can possibly be less founded in point of fact. And though I am sure neither of my hon. Friends intended it, I ask the House and I ask them to consider how grave an imputation they make not on me and the Solicitor General only, but on the long line of distinguished—some of them really illustrious—men, who have been our predecessors—men, I dare to say, as upright, as high-principled, as honourable, as ever adorned any profession in the world. It is a great honour, I suppose, to fill these offices; it is, I am sure, a far greater responsibility; and no man of common character who takes them does, or can, or would dare to "pack away" into corners of his time the great and heavy duties which he has undertaken, to be discharged at hap-hazard and chance-medley fashion, in the intervals of his professional labour. I can assert, for my own part, that it is not the fact. I know that the work of these offices has not been well done by me—no man knows it better; but it has not been from want of will, but from want of power. The work may have been done badly, but it has not been done carelessly, it has not been done indolently, it has not been subordinated to my private practice. I can say the same, I am sure, for Sir Robert Collier, with whom I served so long and so happily in office. I did not serve with Sir John Karslake; but I have the honour of his private friendship, and I know I can say the same for him. I have not the honour of the private friendship of Lord Cairns; but I have often heard, and I believe, that he strictly and sternly limited his private practice during all the time he held office as a Law Adviser of the Crown. If I do not mention my hon. and learned Friends the Solicitor General and the Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer), it is because they are in the House, and can speak—if they please it—for themselves. The foundation of fact, therefore, on which the Motion of my hon. Friend rests, fails him altogether. Sir, I had hoped to discuss this matter without any personal topics being introduced into it. But the speech of the hon. Member for Brighton does not allow me to pass by altogether some such matters; and I allude to them because character is precious to every man, and because in an Assembly of Gentlemen, the character and conduct of even the humblest Member of it can scarcely be considered a matter to which any other Member is indifferent. As to what the hon. Member has said of my connection with a late great trial, and the prosecution arising out of it, the House should recollect that I had no choice as to accepting the conduct of a prosecution, ordered by the Lord Chief Justice under an Act of Parliament, and directed by the Government, without any reference to me. And what has been sacrificed during the progress of a trial utterly unparalleled—I believe, at least, in England—is not the Public Business, which I have done to the best of my ability, but the whole, or almost the whole, of my own private practice. I am sorry my hon. Friend has adverted again to the case of Overend and Gurney. We have had that matter out before, and I do not desire to recur it. He knows that I was engaged in that case 18 months before I took office, and that upon no rule, whether of his devising or not, could I, as matter of common sense and honesty, have done otherwise than as I did. As to the case of Skinner and Usher, to which he has somewhat bitterly alluded, I appeared in that case as Counsel for the Treasury, and argued it as Attorney General. Unless he desires to prevent an Attorney General from appearing in Court for the Government, I am unable to understand what he means. But I must protest against his notion that it is the duty of the Attorney General to draw or to scrutinize the Bills which a Government Department passes for the regulation of the cabs of London. One word only as to my present position. When the change as to the payment of the Law Officers was in contemplation, the Government were kind enough to consult me upon it, telling me that in any event it was not to be applied to me, as I had taken office on other terms. I proposed some modifications in the scheme of the Government, and desired that if they were adopted, the scheme might be at once applied to me, not thinking it proper to suggest for another man what I would not accept myself. The Government, no doubt for good reasons, declined to adopt my views, and so the matter remained upon the old footing. These, then, being the general and personal conditions on which we have to argue, what is it that you want? You want the very best and most eminent men in the profession who can obtain a seat in the House of Commons. I am stating the question in the abstract; and it will be no answer to me to say that in this, that, and the other case, you have not got what you desire. I know that well enough. But this is what you aim at. And you want not merely a clever man, you want a man of ascertained position and considerable experience. Remember that he has to advise the Government and the House itself on subjects of which the importance cannot be overstated; so that he must have judgment, which, as a rule, is the result of experience and the growth of time, and he must have an ascertained and great professional position, so that he may not be overborne by the weight of greater authority in the House itself when he is called upon to speak on legal subjects; as to which, if he does his duty, he will always remember that it is a real opinion, not a party argument, which the House is entitled to expect at his hands. Farthermore, he has often to bring in and to conduct through Parliament Bills of a purely legal character; and for this and in order to legislate with effect, and to do good rather than harm, he ought to have at least a competent knowledge of practice, and a competent acquaintance with the system with which he undertakes to meddle. Now, to discharge with any degree of effect these great and delicate functions, it would never do to have men unknown to the profession, nor men without great business in it. It is probable such men would not be fit, in point of fact, for the duties of office: it is certain that they would be thought unfit; and, as a general rule, the men at the head of the profession are there because they deserve to be there. I know there are exceptions. Some men not fit for it attain success by luck; some men fit for it fail of it from ill chance. But as a general and rough practical rule in the law, as in every other intellectual profession, success is the test of merit. You must have, then, for the reasons I have given, these successful and distinguished men, if you can get them, to fill the posts of Law Officers of the Crown. They will be men, in most cases, with no private fortune to begin with, who are striving to make one, but who have made no large provision for their family, and who simply cannot afford to relinquish practice. My hon. Friend proposes that on acceptance of office they should be compelled to do so. I tell him that if he hopes to get the great men in the profession to accept these offices, his proposition is utterly unpractical; it is not disrespectful to him, because he is speaking on a matter of which he has no practical experience, to tell him that his proposition is absurd. There have been, since the accession of William IV., 20 Attorney Generals; the Solicitor Generals have been more numerous; so that little more than two years is the average duration of the office. Is it not absurd to suppose that a man at the head of his profession would give it up for an office so precarious? Would a great physician, or a great engineer, or a great attorney, think of doing so to become the physician, or the engineer, or the attorney to a Government, and to lose his office when the Government lost theirs? The notion is absurd. But with us at the Bar, business is even more fleeting and precarious than with the professions I have referred to; and yet, even as it is, large sacrifices have to be made. I speak with more knowledge of common lawyers; but I believe the same is true of those men who practise in Courts of Equity. A common lawyer gives up his circuit and large classes of his private practice which he never can resume. If he holds office but for six weeks, he never can go back to the practice he has left. But even the business we retain suffers not a little. A Law Officer, it is known, may be called away at any time by the public service, and cannot refuse to go. Those who employ him do not believe that he packs away the Government Business into odd corners of his time, and they rightly and properly go elsewhere. As it is, a man continues in the profession, and when he leaves office, if he has anything in him, his business generally, to some extent, revives. But if a man were absolutely cut off from all practice in his profession for private clients for three or four years, I believe that any man's business, however great or powerful the man might be, would be utterly destroyed. It must be remembered, too, that at the Bar the conflict is very close, and the differences between man and man are often very slight. A man in business can perhaps maintain his position now; but let him quit it for three years or so, and new connections are formed, not easily displaced, and his former position, if he strives to return to it, he finds to be filled by a man always, perhaps, equal to him, and now, owing to three years' disuse by the Law Officer of general practice, really his superior. These last words suggest a consideration which ought not to be omitted. It is a bad thing for the public service to withdraw a lawyer who is to serve the public from general practice. A man who is withdrawn from general competition and is confined to one class of work, becomes almost inevitably inferior in knowledge and in influence to the man whose practice and competition and studies remain varied and general. I know if office had been offered me on terms like those proposed by my hon. Friend, I should have positively declined it. As it was—will the House forgive me these personalities?—I lost between a third and a-half of my private practice by taking office; and I am confident that men much fitter than I for office would absolutely decline it on such terms as these. I doubt if my hon. Friend would find that he was a good economist for the country if the best men in the profession of the law declined its service. Sir, it may be said that I have omitted one great inducement to the acceptance of these offices—namely, that they are the natural avenues to the Bench. It is true that I have done so, and I have done so on purpose; and I will tell you why. I pass by the fact that to many men—and those I think the best men—for many reasons, some of which it might be invidious to mention, the Bench is not the same object of desire which it was some 30 years ago. But I wish to draw pointed attention to the fact that these offices are not now the only, no, nor the more usual avenues to the Bench. The Bench has been so largely increased of late years in point of number, that almost every man of fair ability and moderate success is sure in his turn if he cares for it, to secure a seat upon it. I am not, however, content to rest on general statement; I challenge inquiry into the facts. And the facts are curious. There are now 30 Superior Judges, from the Lord Chancellor at £10,000 a-year, to the Judge of the Admiralty at £4,000. Of these 30 Judges, only eight have ever been either Attorney or Solicitor General. Of the whole number, only 13, including these eight, have ever been in Parliament at all. If you take in retired Judges, there are four ex-Lord Chancellors who have held office, against six ex-Judges who have not. So that the House will see I am justified in saying that if the Bench is what a man desires, he is even more likely to attain it by remaining out of Parliament and declining office, than he is by entering Parliament and accepting it. Sir, my hon. Friend has used the stock argument of the salaries of our great statesmen; but there is no real parallel between Law Officers and ordinary statesmen. The statesman on taking office, it must be remembered, as a rule, gives up nothing. He is making nothing by his statesmanship; and though I do not suppose that one public man in a hundred ever thinks of it in that connection, he actually gains the moderate income which his office brings him. Besides, a man who devotes himself to public life is, as a rule, a man at ease in his fortune: he has inherited one, or he has made one, or he will succeed to one, or he is in a position to be indifferent to one; and making money by politics is, happily for us, not a common, nor, speaking generally, a successful line of life. In all these matters, the lawyer is in a different position. As a rule, he is a man to whom money is not indifferent: he begins from little or nothing; he is many years before he makes anything; his time of great practice, at least at the Common Law Bar, is generally short; and the fortunes which common lawyers, at any rate, can make from the practice of their profession is generally moderate indeed. Moderate, I am sure it is, compared to that which many men enjoy who seem to grudge the lawyers their success, and are never so happy as when carping at their gains, and suggesting all manner of ill-natured thoughts as to their conduct and their character. The House will forgive me for saying these things, because I know they are true, and because the House ought to know them too. I am not ashamed of my profession; I glory in it; but I should be ashamed of it if we were the sort of fellows, and led by the sort of motives, which and by which the vulgar gibes of our detractors endeavour to make out we are. So much for the inconvenience which results from our private practice, and for the possibility of cutting us off from the practice of our profession. But there is another matter, wholly different from this, and, as I think I shall show, quite unconnected with it, on which, speaking as I ought to do, not as an advocate, but as a man of experience, and giving, as I ought, information to the House, my hon. Friend appears to me to have much more to say. I cannot, and I will not, contend that the prospects and condition of law reform are what they ought to be, and what I earnestly wish they were. But it is not the private practice of the Law Officers, but other matters of a very different nature, which bring about the present unpromising state of things. The Law Officers are not Members of the Cabinet; and, except on points of law incidentally arising, they scarcely ever attend its deliberations. Law Bills are generally, not always, initiated by the Lord Chancellor, and the Law Officers are by no means, as a rule, consulted upon them. We have now, indeed, a Chancellor, between whom and the Law Officers, ever since I have known office, there has been personally the most cordial feeling—a Lord Chancellor whose political opponents even respect and regard him as a man of blameless life and winning character, and who, I suppose, has not an enemy in the world. But it has not always been so. The constant differences between Chancellors in the other House and Law Officers in this are of very recent memory. There is nothing in the nature of things to prevent their recurrence; and, indeed, the greater independence of the times in which we live, and the more free expression of opinion which is usual amongst us, render a wide divergence of opinion more and more likely to arise between men often so widely separated in age and in position as the Lord Chancellor in one House and the Attorney and Solicitor General in the other. It would not be possible now-a-days for an Attorney General, with any sense of self-respect or regard to the opinion of the profession, to support a legal measure which he did not approve, and as to the scope and object of which he had been allowed no sort of influence. It is not often that the Law Officers are called upon to originate legal measures; and if they do, time and opportunity are too generally wanting to carry them through the Houses of Parliament. And yet there are great subjects before the very feet of any man filling my position, and with the power to deal with them, which might, indeed, be handled with enormous public advantage. Once before this Session I have mentioned the subject of an English Code, the object of every reasonable man's desire, and which ought not to be so difficult to attain. But short of the great subject of an English Code, there are the Criminal Law and its administration, the Law of Evidence, the Law as to Jurisdictions, the Law of Written Pleading, the Law of Entail, the union of the two systems of Law and

Equity—above all, the Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords. These, and the like of these subjects, need handling without delay. They must be handled by a lawyer; but it is not easy for a Law Officer, as to matters so important, and standing as he does, external to the councils of the Government, to take them in hand or to prosecute them with effect. Something, however, has been done, even since I took office in 1868, to show that we are not altogether idle. The Bankruptcy Bill, which I have always felt, owing to the fact that the Chief Judge under the Bill was very soon afterwards appointed Vice Chancellor, has hardly had a fair trial; the Law of Naturalization, the Foreign Enlistment Act, the Law of Master and Servant; these, and other measures, are measures which I can look back to with some degree of satisfaction. But I think that if he is fair and candid, my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton must needs admit that one great, and just now, perhaps, well-nigh insurmountable difficulty in the way of law reform is the strongly political character of the House of Commons, and the far greater interest felt on both sides of the House in party struggles than in legal questions. Why, the other day my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, with his great position in this House, with all the weight of his character and the power of his eloquence, could barely keep alive a House of 40 Members to discuss the important subject of Legal Education, while every minute detail in the long roll of the clauses of the Ballot Bill has been fought over for hours upon hours, and decided upon in full divisions by eager partisans. Sir, there is another matter which it would be disingenuous and unmanly if I were to pass by in silence. It never ought to be forgotten that obstruction to law reform does not depend only on the temper and constitution of the House of Commons. We must remember always that there is another House of Parliament, where, in the hands of noble and learned Lords, Law Reform has before now been turned into a party question, and the struggle, at least to bystanders, has seemed to be, not so much as to what is to be done, as to who shall do it. No candid mind, I think, can refuse to see that of all the difficulties which lie across the path of the law reformer, this is, perhaps, the greatest and most lasting. Sir, I thank the House for the patience with which it has heard me. I hope I have not shown myself a foolish optimist as to the position and character of lawyers in this House or out of it; still less, I hope, have I descended to any poor and whining apology for my own shortcomings. But I oppose the scheme of the hon. Member for Brighton because I am convinced it is unpractical, unfounded in point of fact, and likely to be mischievous if put in practice, because, I am sure, if it ever became the rule, it would lower the character of the profession and weaken the power of the Executive Government.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM said, there was great justice in the complaint of the hon. Member for Brighton with regard to the frequent absence of the Law Officers of the Government from the discussions in that House, for he himself had noticed that their attendance in that House was not nearly so regular as it was 10 years ago; and although believing the Tichborne claimant to be one of the greatest impostors ever known, he thought it was to be deprecated that the leading counsel against the claimant in the late civil suit should be employed to prosecute him in the forthcoming trial. In short, it appeared that the intention was to persecute as well as prosecute him.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he should think himself unworthy of the office he held if he did not serve the Government to the best of his ability. There was nothing so disagreeable as to discuss a personal question of this kind; but it was an untrue statement, so far as he was concerned, for any man to assert that he devoted himself to private practice to the prejudice of the duties of his office. The truth was that when office was offered to him he decided on giving up, and had actually given up, more than two-thirds of his private practice. No inconvenience arose to the public as far as he was concerned from his attention to private practice, because he had made it a rule to give a preference to public business. His private practice did not occupy half his time, and certainly his official duties could not be discharged if he devoted the greater portion of his time to private practice. His hon. Friend had an erroneous idea of the true position of the Law Officers of the Crown. The initiation of law reform did not rest with them, but with the Cabinet, and it was their duty to give assistance and advice when asked for it. The real reason why law reform did not progress was that important political measures left no time for law reform. Important measures of law reform had been prepared and printed and laid aside in former Sessions, and it would be useless to suggest new measures until the old ones had been disposed of. The duty of a Law Officer of the Crown was to act as counsel for the Crown, and to conduct its litigious business in the Courts, and in order to be qualified to do this he required continuous practice—to advise the Crown and to assist in legislation.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, he wished his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had adhered to his professed intention to argue the question upon general grounds, instead of introducing personal considerations. As a member of the legal profession he desired to protest against one phrase used by the hon. and learned Gentleman when he spoke of the distinction between Law Officers of the Crown and other political Ministers accounting for the difference in their remuneration. He said that no man could occupy a great office of State who did not possess an independent fortune. He hoped that was not true, for such a statement was one of the most mischievous and revolutionary that could go forth from the Treasury Bench. The hon. and learned Gentleman said men who were not lawyers did not enter the House to make money by statesmanship. On the part of the legal profession he protested against that profession being made an exception to the rule, and he protested against the statement that there was any class who entered the House to make money by statesmanship.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in explanation, said, the distinction he drew was between persons who gave up professional practice and persons who gave up nothing.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT, in continuation, questioned the statement that a Law Officer of the Crown could not return to the practice which he had abandoned on taking office, and said that if the Attorney General left the public service his services would immediately be in great requisition. Another protest he had to make was against the Solicitor General's disclaimer of the responsibility of the Law Officers of the Crown for the initiation of law reform. True, they did not belong to the Cabinet; but, if they were not responsible, from whom would the House of Commons receive the views of the Government on the question of law reform? In the speech of his (Mr. Harcourt's) which had been so severely criticised, by which he certainly never meant to give offence, he ventured to suggest that there should be a Member of the Cabinet specially charged with the question of law reform; and if there were, the House would not witness the spectacle of the two principal Law Officers of the Crown getting up and washing their hands of all responsibility of it. Did not that account for the melancholy collapse with respect to law reform, which had been witnessed during the last four years? Measures with the object of reforming the laws were brought into the House of Commons, and they were cold-shouldered by the Attorney and Solicitor General of the day, who said—"It is no child of mine." Now, he considered that the first duty of the Law Officers of the Crown ought to be to attend to legislation in that House, and he himself, if no one more competent would undertake, would pledge himself to call attention before long to the whole condition of law reform in this country which at present afforded a spectacle of legislative impotence which reflected discredit on both Houses of Parliament.

MR. LOCKE must take occasion to say that his experience led him to believe that, while there was a great deal of cry about law reform in this country, very few in reality seemed to want it. His hon. and learned Friend who had spoken last but one talked a great deal about the subject, but he did nothing. The hon. and learned Gentleman was one of those who sought to set everybody right; but it would, he thought, be as well if he would first right himself. If he would only do something worthy of his great abilities in the direction of law reform the House, he had no doubt, would entertain a better opinion of him than it did at present.

MR. NEWDEGATE said he would point out, as one of the reasons why law reform had of late made no progress, that the Government did not seem disposed to proceed on those old constitutional principles on which alone the country desired that any such reform should be based.

PACIFIC ISLANDERS PROTECTION BILL.
MURDER OF BISHOP PATTESON.

EXPLANATION.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he wished to make an explanation in reference to a few words used by him on Friday evening, when moving the second reading of the Pacific Islanders Protection Bill. He was understood to have said that the commander of the Rosario had fired on the Natives in the Island of Nukapu in order to avenge the death of Bishop Patteson. That statement was not correct. The commander entirely disclaimed the idea that he went to the island to avenge the death of Bishop Patteson. What occurred after the arrival of the Rosario was stated to have taken place in consequence of a poisoned arrow from the shores having wounded one of the boat's crew. The Papers on the subject would shortly be laid before the House, and their Lordships would have an opportunity of arriving at their own conclusions.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.
TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA).
THE INDIRECT CLAIMS.

ADDRESS (EARL RUSSELL). POSTPONEMENT OF MOTION.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, before going to the Orders of the Day I hope your Lordships will allow me to renew an appeal I have already made to my noble Friend (Earl Russell) whose Motion stands first on your Minutes. Your Lordships will remember that last Monday my noble Friend postponed his Motion till to-day, in order to give your Lordships time for more consideration. Your Lordships will not have forgotten that on Thursday I stated to your Lordships that we had received from Mr. Fish an answer to my Note of the 20th of March. I described the character of that answer; and I also added that although I could give no positive assurance to the House, yet Her Majesty's Government had grounds for hoping that a settlement would be arrived at which would be satisfactory to the country. At that time, my Lords, I acknowledged the great forbearance shown by this House—and certainly I might have added the great forbearance which the House of Commons had also shown—and I expressed a hope that for a short time longer that forbearance would be extended. I had some hope that my noble Friend (Earl Russell) would give an intimation that he intended to postpone, at all events for a few days, the Motion of which he had given Notice. I appealed to my noble Friend in private, as I now do in public, not to press his Motion to-day. My Lords, it is a very painful thing for me personally, as your Lordships will understand, that there should be a Motion on your Minutes in the name of my noble Friend that Motion being a Want of Confidence in Her Majesty's Government. I may add that it is also extremely painful that such a Motion being on the Minutes of your Lordships' House, I should be in the position of trying to have that Motion postponed instead of being in a position to encourage its being brought forward at the earliest possible moment. But we are dealing with a very large and a very important question of an international character, and personal feeling is entirely out of the question. It is our bounden obligation to act as we think our public duty requires; and therefore I do not scruple to tell my noble Friend that in my opinion, and in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, it would be adverse to the public interest that the matter should be discussed to-day, when your Lordships have not got that information which the Papers that must be in a short time presented to your Lordships will give, and also when Her Majesty's Government, through a sense of duty, would be prevented from taking a full part in the debate. My noble Friend has been good enough to answer me that it is already announced that this House will adjourn on the 13th of this month and will not meet again till the end of the month; and he remarked that a fortnight after the latter time has been appointed for the meeting of the Arbitrators at Geneva. Your Lordships will remember that on Thursday a noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Cairns) put a Question to me as to what day I could fix for laying the Papers on the Table, or making a statement. He asked that Question without Notice—under the circumstances it would have been impossible for him to give Notice—I answered—what indeed was obvious—that in negotiations of this sort it was impossible to specify the exact day on which we should be prepared to make an announcement to Parliament. My Lords, I believe your Lordships did not think that was an unreasonable answer. On the other hand, I do feel that it was not a mere phrase when I thanked your Lordships for the forbearance you have shown. But there are limits to that reticence which we think it our public duty to observe, and which we think, so far, has been useful to the public service—and we doubt whether it would be fair to ask Parliament to separate for any long time at this moment, while leaving you entirely in the dark with regard to the state of affairs. I have therefore to state to your Lordships that I shall be prepared before Parliament separates either to present Papers or to make a statement as to the position and prospects of the negotiations now going on. I can hardly think that under those circumstances my noble Friend will refuse to listen to my appeal—for I am confident that noble Lords on both sides of the House would rather pique themselves on their fairness to the Government, and would be disposed to give it their best assistance when it has to deal with grave international questions.

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, I gave Notice of my Motion for the 22nd of April. I then put off the Motion to that day week—the 29th. On the latter day, when I found that the despatch had only just arrived, I further postponed my Motion till this day. In the interval before this day arrived I found my noble Friend (Earl Granville) had given Notice that on the 13th—which is just one week from this time—he would propose the Adjournment of the House for more than a fortnight. Now he tells us that on the 13th he will either make a statement or lay the Papers on the Table of the House. My Lords, I am sorry to say that I do not think such an announcement meets what is due to Parliament. It appears to me that if the Papers were laid on the Table, or any arrangement were come to that they should be produced on the 13th, it would be quite impossible that the House, adjourning on the same day for more than a fortnight, could pronounce any opinion on the arrangement come to or on the nature of the Papers produced. It might happen that your Lordships would agree with the arrangement made, or that you might think it a compromise which did not appear to be consistent with the honour and the interests of this country. If my noble Friend would say that he will not propose the Adjournment till some later day than the 13th, I imagine the House would approve the arrangement proposed. This is a very important question, and one on which the Government have expressed a very decided opinion. If they were now to give way and make an unworthy compromise such a course would occasion great anxiety and, I may say, would excite great indignation in the country. Unless, therefore, my noble Friend proposes to alter the day for the Adjournment, I shall feel it my duty to proceed with my Motion.

EARL GRANVILLE: In any difficulty I have ever experienced in the course of my long connection with your Lordships' House, I believe I may say that I never have been guilty of anything that could be thought unfair; and I have no hesitation in saying that if it is the generally expressed wish of the House that after any declaration which I hope to make, or after laying the Papers on the Table, we should not adjourn for a few days later than was suggested, I, for one, as a matter of convenience to your Lordships, should not be disposed to throw any obstacle in the way.

EARL GREY: Before my noble Friend's Motion is postponed, I hope my noble Friend the Foreign Secretary will give some assurance that in the meantime no course will be adopted by the Government which will pledge the country to any mode of proceeding inconsistent with the course sketched out in the Motion of my noble Friend (Earl Russell).

LORD REDESDALE: I think it would be a great convenience if your Lordships were to come to a decision as to whether the discussion on this subject should be taken before the holidays or after. You might say that you would not adjourn before Friday week, in order that the debate might be held on Thursday week. I cannot help referring to the Notice which I have given on the subject of these Claims, and to which I called the attention of the Government last year, and also since the commencement of the present Session. If the question which I raised were brought into the Arbitration, it would precede the consideration of any question of damages whatever.

It is one as to the right of the American Government to demand damages for acts committed by or on behalf of the South during the war now that the North and South have united. I have abstained from any interference in the hope that something would be done to render it unnecessary; but I think this negotiation is now drifting into a hopeless state, and I beg to say that I have not relinquished my intention of bringing the question again before your Lordships.

THE EARL OF DERBY: May I ask the noble Earl (Earl Granville) whether he can undertake, for himself and his Colleagues, that the Papers shall be delivered on Monday next? There is now a proposition that we should not adjourn till Friday week; and if the Papers were produced on Monday, so as to be distributed on Tuesday morning, we should still have time to consider, and, if necessary, to discuss them before the holidays. That is an arrangement which I think everyone would feel to be satisfactory. A shorter interval than that would not be convenient. It is certainly desirable to discuss the question with the Papers rather than without them. At the same time, it is clear that if we only had them 24 hours before the Adjournment that would be useless for the particular purpose we have in view.

EARL GRANVILLE: I will either present the Papers or make a full statement of the intentions of Her Majesty's Government, so that the House may be in full possession of the state of things before it is called upon to express any opinion.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: What we desire is, not only to be in possession of the Papers, but to have time to discuss them before we separate for the holidays. I hope my noble Friend will assure the House that he will not only present the Papers on Monday, but that they will be in such a state as to be ready for distribution on Tuesday morning.

EARL GRANVILLE: At the earliest moment I will either submit the Papers or make a statement as to the proceedings of Her Majesty's Government. I beg your Lordships not to suppose that I have the slightest wish to preclude the House from discussing the question should it think fit to do so.

LORD CAIRNS: There is still some difficulty, notwithstanding that the noble

Lord Redesdale

Earl has replied to more than one Question. When the noble Earl first addressed your Lordships I understood him, while adverting to the circumstance that the House was to adjourn on Monday, to undertake that he would either lay the Papers on the Table or make a full statement with respect to the negotiations before we separate. Now, if it is proposed that the question of the Adjournment of the House should be kept open, and that the House, if necessary, should sit until Thursday or Friday in next week, I ask him whether he will adhere to his original promise and either make his statement or put us in possession of the Papers on Monday. If he does that, then I think there will be ample time to propose any Resolution that may be necessary.

EARL GRANVILLE: I have to apologize to the House if I did not make myself understood. I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that the answer which the noble and learned Lord assumes to be my answer is the correct one; but I wish your Lordships to understand that I do not propose to postpone the Adjournment unless it should be the general wish of your Lordships.

EARL RUSSELL: As I understand, my noble Friend (Earl Granville) is prepared to say that before the House is adjourned he will either produce the Papers or make a statement as to the negotiations; and that if your Lordships should be disposed to think that you ought not to separate immediately for so long a period as he proposes, that then he will yield to the wish of the House, and allow a discussion upon the new terms which, we imagine, are to be proposed by the Government. If that is the understanding, I think I should be taking too much on myself if I were to bring on my Motion to-day, and not allow my noble Friend the short time he asks for in order to make a statement which may be an announcement of the termination of this unfortunate difficulty. However, it is always to be recollected that my noble Friend, on the 12th of June last year, declared to this House solemnly and decidedly that the whole of these Indirect Claims were swept away, and that they no longer formed part of the new agreement, although they might have been admissible under a previous one. It should also be recollected that my noble Friend was one of the Ministers who advised Her Majesty in a document of the gravest form—in her Speech to Parliament at the opening of the present Session—to declare that Claims were put into the American Case which we understood not to be part of the Treaty. If my noble Friend will say that he adheres to those words—if he will abide by the assertion that the Treaty of last year put an end to the Indirect Claims—and if he will say that, adhering to those declarations, the Government will make no engagement inconsistent with them, I shall be prepared to postpone my Motion.

EARL GRANVILLE: I have answered a good many Questions to-night; but in reply to my noble Friend, I may say that I am not aware that there is anything in the statement he has just made to which I object. I am perfectly ignorant myself of any intention of departing from any declaration I have made either last year or this on the subject of the Washington Treaty. The only thing I wish to guard myself against is the idea that I shall produce anything new at the end of this week or the beginning of next.

EARL RUSSELL: I only wish, with your Lordships' leave, to refresh my noble Friend's memory as to what he said on the 12th of June last year. These were his words on that occasion—

"These were pretensions which might have been carried out under the former arbitration; but they entirely disappear under the limited reference—which includes merely complaints arising out of the escape of the Alabama."—[3 Hansard, ccvi. 1852.]

If my noble Friend adheres to those words, I am content, and am quite ready to postpone my Motion.

EARL GRANVILLE: I do not wish to seem wanting in the slightest degree in respect to my noble Friend, and therefore, even at the risk of wasting your Lordships' time, I beg to repeat the answer I have already given, that there is nothing I said, either last year or this, which I wish to retract or in any way modify.

EARL RUSSELL: I will, then, postpone my Motion until this day week, on the understanding that either then or before that time my noble Friend will be prepared to state the exact condition of the negotiations.

RAILWAYS—TELEGRAPH BLOCK SYSTEM.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

LORD BUCKHURST, in moving for Returns relating to the use of telegraph block systems on Railways, said, he would ask their Lordships' attention for a very few moments to the subject in connection with railway accidents. In the Report of the Board of Trade laid on the Table of their Lordships' House last Session, and which contained an investigation into a considerable number of railway accidents, very frequent allusion was made to the telegraph block system as a great safeguard against accidents. Their Lordships were probably aware that the object of what was known as the telegraph block system was to secure intervals of space between trains following one another instead of intervals of time; and it is worthy of remark that out of 61 accidents by collisions of following trains noticed in the Report, 36 were more or less attributable to a want of securing better intervals of space. He might, perhaps, read the words of Captain Tyler in the Report—

"The principle of securing intervals of space in place of time intervals between trains, which has now become generally known as the block system, is one improvement on which much has of late been said, and the extension of which the inspecting officers have had occasion constantly, and too much in vain, to recommend during many years."

It was also very noticeable in the Report—though he did not wish to lay too much stress on this point, as there might be other causes—but it was certainly remarkable that on those lines where this system was most completely adopted there were fewer accidents by collisions of trains. On the South-Eastern line, where this system was made use of, no accident was mentioned as requiring investigation; while on some other lines which had not this mode of securing intervals of space, a very large number of accidents were recorded. As their Lordships were so frequently engaged on questions relating to railways, he had ventured to suggest that the information which this Return would supply might not be without its use. He begged to move for a Return of Railways in the United Kingdom, showing those which are worked by telegraph block systems.

Motion agreed to.

APPELLATE JURISDICTION.

NOMINATION OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

LORD CAIRNS moved that the Lords following be named of the Select Committee on Appellate Jurisdiction :—

Ld. Chancellor.	L. Rosebery.
Ld. President.	L. Chelmsford.
D. Somerset.	L. Lyveden.
D. Richmond.	L. Westbury.
M. Salisbury.	L. Houghton.
E. Derby.	L. Romilly.
E. Stanhope.	L. Colonsay.
E. Powis.	L. Cairns.
E. Grey.	L. Penzance.
E. Morley.	L. Acton.
E. Beauchamp.	L. O'Hagan.
L. Redesdale.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he could not reasonably object to the name of any noble or learned Lord who took an interest in the subject; but he could not help remarking that the Committee as proposed by his noble and learned Friend would have 14 noble Lords from one side, against 11 from the other. The crowded state of the benches on the Opposition side of the House indicated that the subject was treated more as a party question than as a matter for deliberate judgment; and he could not but remark further that of the Members selected from the Government side of the House there were two noble and learned Lords who had expressed themselves strongly against his proposition.

LORD CAIRNS said, the list of the Committee had been prepared after the usual communications between the two sides of the House. There was no intention on his part to do anything unfair.

EARL GRANVILLE thought the objection made by his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack a reasonable one, and suggested that the nomination of the Committee should be postponed till to-morrow.

LORD CAIRNS protested against three things which had been done by his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack. First, it was out of Order to speak a second time in the same debate. In the second place, his noble and learned Friend was out of Order in referring to what occurred in a former debate. In the third place, his noble and learned Friend had no right to say that the crowded state of the Opposition benches on Tuesday evening showed that the opposition to his Bill was a party one. He now told his noble and learned Friend that he conscientiously believed he could not have found 20 Peers on the Government side of the House who did not disapprove his Bill.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he would like to know how the noble and learned Lord had arrived at that result if he had not made any inquiries as to who were likely to oppose the Government on this question?

LORD CAIRNS said, he was sorry the noble Earl should have interrupted him by so irrelevant a question. He repeated that the list of names had been prepared in accordance with the usual custom in such cases.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he must join in the protest against the accusation made by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack. The Opposition had not regarded the question of appellate jurisdiction as a party subject—the Bill of the noble and learned Lord had been condemned because it appeared to noble Lords to be an objectionable and a bad measure. His noble and learned Friend (Lord Cairns) and those who supported him were justified by the fact that not a single noble Lord on the Government side had said a word in favour of the Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY hoped it would not be assumed that every Member of the Committee who came from the Opposition side of the House would oppose all schemes for the improvement of appellate jurisdiction. He also trusted that the practice adopted when "packed juries" were required would not be introduced in that House.

EARL GRANVILLE said, the very thing he objected to was a jury packing system. He thought the proposed Committee bore a party complexion.

THE EARL OF DERBY objected to the assumption that this question of appellate jurisdiction was one of a battle between two parties. The inquiry of the Committee was not to be limited to the scheme of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, but was to embrace the whole subject of appellate jurisdiction.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he had to express his gratitude for the information the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) had just given him and the House—namely, that this was not a party question. Certainly, from the state of the Opposition benches on the Tuesday night, and from the speech of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Cairns), in which it was suggested that his Bill would be regarded as the first step towards the abolition of the House of Lords, one might have been pardoned for supposing that the debate on his Resolution and his Bill was a party one, and that the subject itself was looked upon in the same light by his noble and learned Friend and those who usually acted with him.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, he would remind the noble Duke that at an early period of the discussion his noble and learned Friend on the Wool-sack accepted the proposal to refer the subject to a Select Committee.

LORD CHELMSFORD desired to ask what was the Question now before the House? It was a mistake to suppose that noble Lords on the Opposition side were opposed to an inquiry into the subject of appellate jurisdiction; but the great majority of their Lordships were determined to retain for that House its appellate jurisdiction till something better was devised.

THE EARL OF FEVERSHAM said, the Constitution invested their Lordships' House with an appellate jurisdiction, and he did not see why that jurisdiction should not be retained. He trusted that there would be no foregone conclusion, and that the ancient appellate jurisdiction of this House, which had worked well, and in which the people had full confidence, would not be abolished in a hasty and summary manner.

LORD CAIRNS said, their Lordships would be glad to learn that a noble Lord (Viscount Ossington) of the highest competency was willing to serve on the Committee, and he should therefore have great pleasure in moving that Lord Ossington's name should be added to the list of names proposed.

Motion agreed to.

And, on Tuesday, the 7th instant, The Viscount Ossington added.

House adjourned at a quarter past Six o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

RAILWAYS—ACCIDENT IN THE BOX TUNNEL.—QUESTION.

MAJOR WALKER asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is the case that, on Monday, April 29th, when, owing to an accident to the engine, the up express train on the Great Western Railway broke down and was detained for a considerable time in the centre of the Box Tunnel, the second-class carriages were unprovided with lights?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, in reply, that in consequence of the hon. Member's Question he had inquired from the Company, and found that an accident did occur in the Box Tunnel owing to the breaking of the piston-rod of the engine, and the Board of Trade were informed that on that occasion there were no lights in the second-class carriages attached to the train. He might mention that this part of the Great Western Railway was worked on the block system. No proceedings could be taken by the Board of Trade as to the absence of lights in the carriages, there being no Act of Parliament which gave the Department power to do so.

WATER SUPPLY (METROPOLIS).

QUESTION.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH asked the President of the Board of Trade, What has been done by the London Water Companies, the Board of Trade, and the metropolitan authorities respectively, under Sections 17 to 22 of the Metropolis Water Act, 1871, regarding regulations as to fittings; and, how soon those regulations will be in operation, so that application may be made for a constant supply?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE in reply, said, the metropolitan water companies had complied with the requirements of the Metropolitan Water Act of last Session by submitting a set of regulations, which they had all agreed upon, to the Board of Trade and to the different metropolitan authorities. Until confirmed by the Board of Trade, however, these regulations were of no force whatever, and an inquiry must first be held by the Board of Trade, at which the metropolitan authorities and the metropolitan water companies themselves would have a right to be heard. A Circular had been sent to the metropolitan authorities inviting them to take the necessary steps preliminary to this inquiry by sending in any objections which they desired to offer to the proposed regulations. At the request of the Corporation of London and the Metropolitan Board of Works the time for sending in objections to these regulations had been somewhat extended—namely, to the 28th of this month. After that date, when the objections had been received, the inquiry—necessarily a somewhat lengthened one—would be held; and when, as the result of that inquiry, the regulations had been confirmed, the companies, after four months' notice, would be required to give a constant supply of water, unless they could show, within a time limited from the giving of such notice, that more than one-fifth of the premises in the particular district were not supplied with proper fittings.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH asked, whether the right hon. Gentleman was able to form any opinion as to how long the inquiry would last?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he was quite unable to say.

ARMY RE-ORGANIZATION—MILITIA PERMANENT STAFF.—QUESTION.

MAJOR TOLLEMACHE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is still under consideration to take men from the battalions of the Line with which they are brigaded at a Depot Centre for the performance of the duties of the present permanent staff of Militia regiments, or whether he has decided it would be rather for the advantage of

Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth

Her Majesty's Service that the present system of a permanent staff for Militia regiments should be retained and be made available for any other duties during the non-training period of the Militia only; whether sealed patterns for clothing, boots, and other equipments will be sanctioned for the Militia, in the same way as for battalions of the Line; and, whether great coats will be issued for the Militia in future as for the Line?

MR. CARDWELL: The first Question, Sir, is no longer under consideration. The intention is that as the present permanent staff ceases to exist, their places shall be filled by men forming part of the Regulars in the same brigade. A Committee consisting of officers of the Department and of commanding officers and adjutants of Militia has been sitting to consider questions connected with the clothing of Militia, and are now about to report. Whenever circumstances require the issue of great coats—as, for instance, in the Autumn Manœuvres—they will be supplied. In ordinary cases a sufficient quantity for guard duties is supplied.

RELIGIOUS DISQUALIFICATIONS FOR OFFICES.—QUESTION.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN asked Mr. Attorney General, If, according to the existing Law, any religious qualification is necessary for the office of Lord Chancellor of England or Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; and especially whether a Roman Catholic or a Jew, or either of them, is eligible to hold either or both of said offices?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, in reply, that he must preface his answer by a famous story about Lord Coke, who being asked by James I. a question of law, desired to know in return whether it was one of common law or statute law?—because, he said, if it were one of common law he could answer it in bed, but if it were one of statute law he must get up and examine the statutes. The right hon. and learned Member had asked him a complex Question—whether a Roman Catholic could hold the office of Lord Chancellor of England or Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, or whether a Jew could hold either office? The answer to the four questions involved might not be the same in each case. The first Question, respecting the Lord Chancellor of England, divided itself into two others.

Roman Catholics were, in the first instance, excluded from holding the office of Lord Chancellor of England by the operation of the oaths of abjuration, allegiance, and supremacy, and by the necessity imposed upon him by statute of making the declaration against transubstantiation. These disabilities appear to have been first created by the 25 Charles II., s. 2, c. 9, which imposed on all holders of office, civil and military, and among them the Lord Chancellor, the necessity of taking those oaths and making that declaration in the legal term next after their elevation to such office; and by the 30 Charles II., s. 2, c. 1, the oaths and declaration were imposed on Peers and Members of the House on taking their seats. The 1 Geo. I., s. 2, c. 13, extended the oaths and declaration on ecclesiastical persons, heads of colleges, schoolmasters, barristers, attorneys, and all legal persons in the same manner as those imposed by the statute of Charles II., but extended the time to three months; and so the law remained until the 9 Geo. II., c. 26, ss. 3, 4, and 6, which re-enacted the provisions of the Act of Charles II., but the time was extended to six months. That was the state of the law till the 26 & 27 Vict., c. 125, which comprised in its schedule, among statutes totally repealed, the statute of 25 Charles II.; but the body of the Act contained the proviso that the repeal of any Act contained in the schedule should not affect any enactment derived from, or incorporated with, such repealed statute. The 29 & 30 Vict., c. 19, known as "The Parliamentary Oaths Act," repealed all that was left of the statute of Charles II.; but the statutes of the two Georges remained, except as they were altered by the Parliamentary Oaths Act. Then came the statute of the 30 & 31 Vict., c. 62, and it was upon the construction of that statute that the question as to the effect of the declaration against transubstantiation on the office of Lord Chancellor of England and the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland must ultimately turn. The statute absolutely abolished the declaration and repealed all Acts requiring it to be taken as a qualification for office by all persons whatsoever; but then the 2nd section declared that nothing in that Act should be construed as enabling persons professing the Roman Catholic religion to hold any Civil offices, other than those they were at that time entitled to hold. The question was, whether the statutes imposing the declaration and oaths were abolished against all persons but Roman Catholics? By a subsequent statute, all restrictions were abolished; and therefore Roman Catholics would by the effect of that statute be eligible to hold office; but if the true construction were that the old statutes were absolutely repealed, and that the effect of the 2nd section was to re-enact them de novo, as regarded Roman Catholics only, then the Parliamentary disability of Roman Catholics still remained. His opinion was that the latter construction was the true one, and that the statutes were not repealed as against Roman Catholics. The 34 & 35 Vict., c. 48, absolutely abolished the statutes of the 1st Geo. I. and the 9th Geo. II., without any reservation. The effect of all this, to the best of his judgment, was that, these restrictions having been kept alive up to that time, these two Acts undoubtedly operated to exclude Roman Catholics. When these Acts were abolished without restriction, the restriction against Roman Catholics went with them and no longer existed. He gave that as his opinion, though a right hon. Friend of his differed from him, and he (the Attorney General) was quite ready to receive correction with the greatest possible humility. The Roman Catholic Relief Act was passed in the 10th year of George IV., and it was commonly, though erroneously, supposed that it excluded Roman Catholics from certain offices. His opinion was that such an idea was erroneous. It substituted for certain declarations which Roman Catholics could not take certain declarations which they could take, and it left certain offices where they were before the Act, and the Roman Catholic Relief Act did not operate so material a change as had been supposed. The 21 & 22 Vict. substituted one oath for the three oaths of abjuration, allegiance, and supremacy, which up to that time had existed. The substituted oath was just as exclusive as regarded the Roman Catholics as any of its predecessors. The 31 & 32 Vict. substituted a further oath, but that the Roman Catholics could take, and by the 9th section, the Lord Chancellor was specially referred to as a person who could take the oath. The old oaths were gone, a substituted oath was enacted on all classes and individuals, and if a Roman Catholic could take the new oath, he could become the Lord Chancellor. With regard to the case of the Lord Lieutenant, by the statute of the 2nd of Elizabeth the Lord Lieutenant was required to take the oath of supremacy. That was, however, repealed by the statute of William and Mary, and the oaths of abjuration substituted for it, and a declaration against transubstantiation; and the Lord Lieutenant had to take the oath up to 1867. If the Act of 1867 absolutely abolished all the statutes which imposed the declarations and oaths, and re-enacted Parliamentary disability of Roman Catholics, that disability had never been got rid of; but if the Act of 1867 was only to repeal the disabling Acts as regarded everybody but Roman Catholics, then, as they had since been abolished without restriction, the Parliamentary disability was gone, and a Roman Catholic might become a Lord Lieutenant. With respect to the Jews, they could always take the declaration and oaths, and what kept the Jews out were the words—"on the true faith of a Christian;" but as the statute of 1867 omitted these words, the Jews could take the oath, and could consequently hold any office either in England or Ireland.

PENSIONS COMMUTATION ACT—CASE OF LIEUTENANT MARCH.

QUESTION.

MR. M'ARTHUR asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the case of Lieutenant March, British Vice Consul at Santander, has been brought before him; and, whether he can state to the House the nature and object of the Regulation issued by him excluding from the benefits of "The Pensions Commutation Act" Officers holding Government appointments without regard to the nature and pay of such appointments?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, the granting of leave to commute a pension was a matter of discretion with the Government, to be exercised with a reasonable regard to the interests of the public service. The Treasury would not, as a general rule, allow persons employed in the public service to commute their half-pay, because they would in such a case be receiving the full benefit of the pension on half-pay, and at the same time be in receipt of full pay. It was in accordance with this rule that Lieutenant March had not been allowed to commute his half-pay.

DOMINION OF CANADA—GUARANTEED LOAN OF £2,500,000.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Correspondence issued to Members on Friday the 3rd instant, on the subject of the guarantee of the Loan of two millions and a-half to Canada, as compensation for the Fenian raids is complete, or whether any additional letter or letters are yet wanting; and, if so, when it is expected that they will be printed and delivered to Members? He also asked when the subject would be submitted to Parliament for approbation?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, the Papers intended to be presented by the Government were laid on the Table on Friday night. The hon. Baronet, probably, thought the passage on page 5, "in accordance with the strong wish expressed by the Canadian Government," referred to some further letter. There was no further letter, however. The passage referred to what occurred in the course of an interview between Mr. Campbell, the delegate from the Canadian Government, and Lord Kimberley. The Papers presented were, therefore, complete; and with reference to the last Question, he was unable at present to say when Government would ask Parliament to consider the guarantee. They must wait to observe what happened in Canada with the Bill which had been submitted to the Parliament of the Dominion.

IRELAND—CRIMINAL LAW—IMPRISONMENT OF MR. ROCHE.—QUESTION.

MR. BUTT asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether any information has been obtained, or any steps taken, in reference to the treatment of Mr. Roche in Galway Gaol; and, whether there is any objection to lay upon the Table of the House the Instructions, with the Opinion of the Law advisers to the Castle, conveyed to the Governor of Richmond Prison, with reference to Mr. Pigott?

The Attorney General

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Dowse), said, in reply, that the treatment of Mr. Roche was a matter for the Board of Superintendence of Galway Gaol, and not for the Government. In the case of Mr. Pigott, the Board of Superintendence of the prison were instructed that they had power to make a by-law, enabling Mr. Pigott to be confined as a first-class misdemeanant. He presumed that after this explanation the hon. and learned Member would not require the Papers to be laid on the Table.

CRIMINAL LAW — BRUTAL ASSAULTS ON WOMEN.—QUESTIONS.

MR. MONTAGUE GUEST asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether with regard to the great increase of brutal assaults upon women, so frequently reported in the newspapers, he will bring in a Bill to repeal the Act "for the better prevention and punishment of Aggravated Assaults upon Women and Children," 16 and 17 Vic. c. 30, so far as to make provision for the increase of the severity of the law, by giving power to flog the offenders in such cases?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in reply, said, a Bill was already before the House, brought in by the hon. Member for Windsor (Mr. Eykyn) and the hon. and learned Member for Shrewsbury (Mr. Straight), bearing on this subject, and when that Bill came on for consideration, it would be his duty to express his opinion upon it. But as far as his attention had been called to the cases referred to, he had no hesitation in saying that anyone knowing anything of law would be aware that the results of those cases were not so much the fault of the law as the fault of those who administered it.

MR. MONTAGUE GUEST asked, Upon what day the hon. and learned Member for Shrewsbury would bring forward his Bill?

MR. STRAIGHT said, he hoped to do so on Tuesday, the 28th instant.

CRIMINAL LAW—ASSAULT ON THE LATE MR. MURPHY.—QUESTIONS.

MR. NEWDEGATE wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department a Question of which he had given him private Notice. It was, Whether there was any truth in the report appearing in a Carlisle Paper of May 3rd, to the effect that the sentence passed on five men by the Lord Chief Baron, as principals in the outrage committed on the late William Murphy, from the effects of which he died, had been remitted?

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM asked, Whether the Home Secretary would object to lay upon the Table, a Copy of any Memorial praying for the reprieve of these prisoners, and any Correspondence between himself and the Whitehaven Bench with reference to a meeting Mr. Murphy proposed to hold in that town?

MR. BRUCE said, in reply, that he had received a memorial signed by some magistrates, clergy, and inhabitants of Whitehaven, praying for the remission of the remainder of the sentence. It had been sent in the usual way to the Judge who tried the case, and the Lord Chief Baron recommended that as 10 of the 12 months' sentence had been served, and as the evidence did not show the prisoners were directly implicated in the affair, the remainder of the sentence should be remitted. He (Mr. Bruce) saw no reason for departing from the usual course, which was to act upon the recommendation of the Judge. With reference to the Question of the hon. Member for West Cumberland, he stated it was not usual to present memorials to the House, but he did not think there was any objection to presenting the Correspondence. He, however, would consider the matter.

IRELAND—EXEMPTION FROM TAXATION.—QUESTION.

COLONEL TAYLOR asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he is aware that in the North Dublin Union exemptions from taxation already exist to the extent of £60,000 annual valuations; and, whether he is prepared to resist the further progress of the Sanitary Works (Ireland) Bill, as antagonistic of the principle contained in the Bill announced by the Secretary to the Treasury to be now ready?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, the exemption in question did not come within his Department, and that he had no intention of opposing the Bill referred to, but he could not say what the representative of any other Department might do.

AFRICA—ACQUISITION OF DUTCH GUINEA.—QUESTION.

In reply to Sir CHARLES WINGFIELD, MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said: I am happy to inform the House that we have this day received intelligence from the West Coast of Africa of a highly satisfactory nature. As I had ventured to anticipate when previously questioned upon this subject, the transfer of Elmina to the British Crown was accomplished in the early part of last month not only peacefully, but with the perfect assent and goodwill of the native tribes. I do not like to make this announcement to the House without expressing my belief that great credit is due to Governor Pope Hennessy for the ability and discretion with which he has conducted the management of this affair.

IRELAND—LIEUTENANT OF THE COUNTY OF CLARE.—QUESTION.

MR. COLLINS asked the right hon. Baronet opposite, the Member for the County of Clare (Sir Colman O'Loghlen), Whether he intends to proceed with his Motion on this subject to-morrow?

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, in reply, that it was his intention to proceed with his Motion to-morrow, if he could, and he was anxious to bring it on as early as possible. No doubt, as it was a Motion involving censure, the Government would be desirous of having a speedy decision upon it.

IRISH CHURCH ACT AMENDMENT BILL. QUESTION.

COLONEL TAYLOR asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is his intention to proceed with the Committee on the above-named Bill that night?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he wished to make an appeal to hon. Members who had placed on the Paper numerous and voluminous Notices of Instructions and Amendments in reference to this Bill, which stood for Committee that evening. Those Instructions and Amendments would entirely alter the scope of the Bill as it came down from the other House. He could not complain of that, because he had himself given Notice of an Instruction and Amendments which would considerably enlarge the scope of the measure. But he would withdraw his Instruction and Amendments if those other hon. Members would do the same, and he would also undertake to bring in another Bill embodying Amendments suggested by the Church Commissioners, and which the Government could accept. Unless some such course were adopted, it would be impossible to carry through the House that Bill, which it was important should be passed without delay. He would endeavour to press forward the second Bill as much as he could, because the Commissioners were anxious that some Amendments which they had suggested should be passed this Session. Hon. Members, by the arrangement which he proposed, and to which he now invited their consideration, would have a more convenient opportunity of placing their views before the House. It would entirely depend on the course which hon. Members might take, whether he should ask the House to proceed with the Committee on the Bill that night or not.

RELIGIOUS DISABILITIES ABOLITION BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. NEWDEGATE asked the right hon. and learned Baronet opposite (Sir Colman O'Loghlen), Whether, after the answer given that evening by the Attorney General, he would proceed with this Bill?

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, it was not his intention to proceed this Session with the Bill.

MR. NEWDEGATE gave Notice that he should object to its withdrawal.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) BILL.

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr. William Edward Forster)

[BILL 31.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. GORDON, in rising to move—

"That, having regard to the principles and history of the past educational legislation and practice of Scotland, which provided for instruction in the Holy Scriptures in the public schools as an essential part of education, this House, while desirous of passing a measure during the present Session for the improvement of education in Scotland, is of opinion that the law and practice of Scotland in this respect should be continued by provisions in the Bill now before the House," said, that the time that had elapsed since the second reading of the Bill had allowed the opportunity of obtaining an expression of public opinion, and he would venture to say that never had there been a measure which had elicited so strong and so numerous an opposition to its provisions as this. The objections relating to the managing body which was to superintend the education in Scotland, to the provisions relating to the interests of the schoolmasters, and, above all, to the provisions affecting the religious system which had hitherto characterized education in Scotland. In the past year there were 903 Petitions against the Bill, signed by about 70,000 persons, while there were in favour of the Bill only 51 Petitions, signed by 4,800 persons. Of course, on both sides there were what might be called corporate Petitions. In the present year the Petitions against the Bill out and out were 174, representing signatures to the number of 33,000; but the Petitions were generally couched in this form—they prayed for alterations in the Bill, with a view to secure the religious system which had hitherto prevailed in Scotland, and if that prayer was not granted that the Bill should be rejected. The Petitioners did not wish to prevent the examination of its provisions and the amendment of these provisions in Committee. Petitions had been presented to the number of 1,491 this year, representing 190,000 persons, if not altogether upwards of 200,000, praying for alterations in this sense. There was to be deducted from that number, however, Petitions signed by 30,000 persons connected with the Birmingham League, who took great interest in Scotch education, and who objected to this Bill because it contained the very slightest approach to religious instruction. The result, therefore, was this—that there were upwards of 200,000 Petitioners against the provisions of the Bill—and the House must keep this in view in considering the number of persons who signed the Petitions, that the population of Scotland was only one-sixth of the population of England—the signatures therefore represented a very large body of Petitioners. He did not think that any Imperial subject interesting the three Kingdoms had secured proportionately a larger number of Petitions against it. It was, therefore, quite clear that there was a strong feeling in Scotland in reference to the provisions of this Bill, and instead of the people of Scotland appearing satisfied with it, they were very much dissatisfied, and prayed the House to make material alterations in the Bill. These Petitions were the result of many public meetings which had been held for the purpose of discussing the Bill, and of innumerable publications which had been issued by the Press treating of it. Men of the highest position and intelligence had taken part on the same side. A meeting was held lately at Edinburgh, presided over by a nobleman whose name was very much respected, not only in Scotland, but wherever he was known—the Duke of Buccleuch—and it was attended by many very influential persons, who were dissatisfied with the destructive tendency of the Bill, especially as regarded religious instruction. Men of all Churches took part in the discussions; men connected with the Established Church, the Free Church, and the Episcopalian; and even the laity belonging to the United Presbyterian body—there was not the same feeling among the clergy of that Church—had taken part against it. The Established Churches connected with the parish and other schools in Scotland had expressed their dissatisfaction with the provisions of the Bill, and in particular with respect to the provisions relating to religious instruction. They thought it essential that there should be a power in the Established Church to give religious instruction. He might quote the opinion of one who might be regarded as an impartial witness in this matter, as not being connected with any of the Presbyterian Churches—namely, Bishop Eden, the Primus of the Episcopal Church in Scotland. That dignitary said—

“That it was impossible to compare the scheme of education proposed by this Bill with the system which has so long prevailed in the parish schools of Scotland without feeling that, however unintentional on the part of the framers, the measure must prove a great blow and heavy discouragement to religious education, and as such run counter to the old traditional feelings of the country. The real distinction between the two schemes is, that the one is a scheme for imparting secular education based on religion, the other a scheme for a similar object, but professedly not based on religion.”

That being so, he had thought it right to bring before the House the Resolution of which he had given Notice. It was not moved by him with any party object, but solely to secure the important object which he held to be essential to education, and which very numerous Petitioners had prayed the House to secure to them. When in 1868 he sought the suffrages of the constituency he had the honour to represent, he was defeated by a small majority; but when in 1869 he again sought their confidence, he stated—

“A marked feature in the education which has hitherto prevailed in our parochial and in most of our other schools, and which I am desirous should be continued, has been that the children have had the opportunity of obtaining instruction in religion of a scriptural and unsectarian character. Whilst I hold that no educational measure can be considered satisfactory which does not acknowledge such religious instruction as part of the national system, I am most anxious to see provision made that, as heretofore, no violence shall be done to conscientious convictions, the right of the parent to withdraw his child from such religious instruction being clearly recognized.”

He then had the good fortune to be returned by the large majority of 500; so that he was now only redeeming his pledge to his constituency in submitting the Resolution which he was laying before the House. He did not desire to throw any obstruction in the way of passing this Bill. There were rumours that the object of the Resolution was to throw out the Bill; but he certainly had not only no such intention, but his Motion was one which clearly admitted of the Bill being proceeded with. The only effect of the passing of the Resolution would be that the Government would have an opportunity of reconsidering the provisions of the Bill, having regard to the opinions of the House if the Resolution was assented to—for the measure could not be passed through Committee before the Whitsuntide holidays. He was not there to advocate the interests of any Church, or to maintain the right of the Established Church to continue in the management of the schools. He was of opinion they had been deprived of the management to a great extent in 1861; and what he wanted was to get the Resolution passed—not in the interests of any Church, but in the interest of the religious instruction which had hitherto prevailed in Scotland. The Government had promised to consider the suggestions he had made, but no Amendments had been introduced. They could not be wedded to this Bill, because in 1869 they had brought in a Bill very different in character, inasmuch as it did not overturn the provisions for religious instruction which had hitherto existed in Scotland. That Bill received the sanction of this House, and he hoped the Government were not so wedded to the present Bill that they would not adopt the system which passed the House in 1869, and which did not interfere with religious instruction. It was not necessary, in the view which he took of the position of education in Scotland, for him to raise the abstract question as to the duty of the Government in regard to religion in State-aided schools. He himself had a very strong view on that question. If Government took the management of education out of the hands of parents, and even compelled parents to send their children to school, then Government assumed the position of parents; and as parents were bound to educate their children religiously, so Government was bound to take care that education was given religiously. It was quite possible, at the same time, to do this with the utmost toleration of the prejudices of those parents who objected to their children receiving such instruction. It had been always the practice in Scotland to exempt children whose parents objected to receive such instruction, and the manner in which the Conscience Clause had been carried out had never been made the subject of complaint in any way whatever. It was no answer to this proposition that a different custom had been followed in other countries; but this seemed to be the view of the Home Secretary, who, in addressing his constituents, said—

“He could not but think that the large experience gained during the great discussions on the English Bill had been of great service in the preparation of the Scotch Bill. He ventured to assert as much last year, and he was taken to task by some severe critics, who charged him with a desire to import into the Scotch Bill the principles of the English Bill. Nothing could be further from his mind or the minds of his Colleagues. They, as practical men, felt that the case of England and the case of Scotland were entirely different. In England it was necessary to create a system, whereas in Scotland there was a national system already, and all that required to be done was to build on the foundations thus afforded, and to extend the existing system in the spirit in which it was originally created.”

MR. BRUCE: That was in reference to the course of instruction given in the schools.

MR. GORDON said, that religious instruction had always been a part of general education in Scotland, so that he had now the authority of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary for saying that that course of instruction was right. He wished the House to see how the system in Scotland had been "originally created," to use the words of the Home Secretary. The first Act which bore on the subject was one passed at the suggestion, he had no doubt, of John Knox and his colleagues, in 1567, and which proceeded in these terms—

"Forsameikle as be all laws and constitutions it is provided that the youth be brocht up and instructed in the fear of God and gude maneris, and gif it be utherwise it is tinsel baith of their bodies and saules gif God's word be not ruted in them. Quheirfor, our Sovereigne Lorde, with advise of my Lorde Regent, hes statute and ordained that all schulis to burgh and land, and all universities and colleges, be reformed; and that nane be permitted or admitted to have chaarge and cure their in time cuming, nor instruct the youth privatlie or openlie, but sik as sall be tryed be the superintendentes or visitoures of the kirke."

This was a public declaration by the Legislature of Scotland that it was necessary that the youth should be brought up in the fear of God; and the means by which it was sought to attain this end was by putting religious instruction under the superintendence of the Church. It was thought that if they placed schools under the superintendence of the Church they would secure that religion that the Preamble declared to be for the good of the community. When in 1606 the government of the Church became Episcopal, provision was made that these schools should be under the management of the Bishops; and when in 1662 the Presbyterian again became the State religion, the schools were placed under the management of the Presbytery. In 1696 provision was made for payments by the proprietors for the support of the schools; and it was then declared that all former statutes concerning the schools should be ratified and confirmed. In 1803 the salaries of the schoolmasters were increased, and provisions were made with reference to the admission of the schoolmaster to his office. By section 16 it was provided that before admission to his office the Presbytery should—

"Take trial of his sufficiency for the office in respect of morality and religion, and of such branches of literature as by the majority of heritors and minister shall be deemed most necessary and important for the parish."

The teaching of religion, therefore, formed one of the duties which were intrusted to schoolmasters, whilst the branches of literature that were to be taught were left to the Presbytery to decide. It was clear, therefore, that the tendency of these statutes was that the teaching of religion formed one of the essential duties of schoolmasters. Up to 1861 schoolmasters had been required to sign a formula or profession of faith; but in that year an Act was passed to relieve schoolmasters from the necessity of signing the formula of the Established Church, and it was declared that any person might be admitted as a schoolmaster even although he should not sign such a formula; but as this was getting rid to a certain extent, of the security for religious teaching and the religious character of the schoolmaster, it was declared that he should sign a declaration in the following terms:—

"I, A. B., do solemnly and sincerely, in the presence of God, profess, testify, and declare, that, as schoolmaster of the parochial school at _____, in the parish of _____, and in the discharge of the said office, I will never endeavour, directly or indirectly, to teach or inculcate any opinions opposed to the Divine authority of the Holy Scriptures, or to the doctrines contained in the Shorter Catechism agreed upon by the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, and approved by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, in the year One thousand six hundred and forty-eight; and that I will faithfully conform thereto in my teaching of the said school."

This measure was introduced by the then Lord Advocate (Mr. Moncrieff), and on the Motion for the second reading he said that the one object of the Bill was to abolish the exclusive test that the schoolmasters should belong to the Established Church, whilst on the other hand it provided that they should teach the Holy Scriptures and the Shorter Catechism as set forth by the Westminster Confession of Faith. He had heard it disputed that the effect of this provision of 1861 was to secure that there should be religious instruction given by the schoolmaster; but it must be borne in mind how strong were the words of the Lord Advocate upon that point. The 13th clause of the Act of 1861 provided that there might be a prosecution at the instance of the Presbytery for a contravention of the declaration by the schoolmasters; but no such violation ever occurred. Such were the whole of the enactments bearing upon the teaching of religion in the parish schools in Scotland. It had been said that the Presbytery could exclude the teaching of religion in the parish schools of Scotland; but he ventured, as a lawyer, to say that this was not correct before 1861, and it could not be said to be correct after 1861. They had the opinion of the Lord Advocate of that day that it was the intention to provide for the teaching of religion; and then it was provided that if any schoolmaster had attempted to evade his duty he should be compelled to discharge it or lose his place.

THE LORD ADVOCATE: There is no such prosecution possible under that clause.

MR. GORDON thought that the 13th clause authorized the Presbytery to lay a complaint against the schoolmaster who failed to comply with the declaration.

THE LORD ADVOCATE: They might complain to the Secretary of State.

MR. GORDON: Anyhow, that statute contemplated a prosecution for the breach of the declaration. So much with regard to legislation. And he now came to what had been the practice or custom as to religious teaching in Scotland. The Holy Scriptures had been taught in all schools in Scotland, and the Westminster Catechism was also used there; and they had also been carried into all the Presbyterian Nonconformist schools. The practice, however, was to respect the rights of parents, because any parent who objected to such instruction could withdraw his child from it. There was at present in Glasgow—where it might be expected there would be found the greatest number of persons who would avail themselves of this right—a school connected with the Established Church which had 1,300 pupils, and of these only 22 were withdrawn when religious instruction was given. There were, therefore, 98 out of every 100 who desired to themselves of religious teaching. The Roman Catholics also availed themselves of the parish schools in which religious instruction was given, and said that they preferred that system to the one proposed to be established under the present Bill. The Commissioners on Scotch Education said—

“It has been seen already that the parochial school partakes of the character which is common to all Presbyterian schools, of being entirely undenominational as respects the attendance of scholars. In this respect there never has been in Scotland any material difficulty arising from what is called the religious or conscience element. So long ago as 1829 the Education Committee of the General Assembly reported that ‘the teachers had been directed not to press on the Roman Catholic children any instruction to which their parents or their priest might object, as interfering with the principles of their own religion.’ In 1832 the same Committee again recurred to the subject, and state that ‘by this toleration, these Protestant schools have been everywhere acceptable and attractive to the Catholic population.’”

This continued to be the case down to the present day; and so carefully had the schoolmasters respected the rights of conscience that they had never given any cause of complaint either to Catholics or to Nonconformists. Last year the Lord Advocate, in introducing his Education Bill, said that—

“The religious difficulty had not, and never had, any practical existence in Scotland. That had never obtained, by any provision of law, a Conscience Clause in any public schools: nevertheless they had always been conducted as if a very precise clause had been in operation.”—[3 Hansard, cciv. 208.]

Again, this year he said—

“When it was said that there had been no religious difficulty in Scotland, what was meant was that the parents of all the children attending these public schools were quite content with the present system, and that no heartburnings existed upon this point.”—[3 Hansard, ccix. 261.]

If the parents of the children were in this position, what necessity was there to make any change? The present Bill recited the Acts of Parliament upon the subject, including the Act of 1861, which contained the provision regarding the declaration, and it repealed them all absolutely. Having thus made a tabula rasa, and got rid of that system of Scotch education which had been considered so advantageous, great credit was taken that whilst the Bill did not prescribe religion, it did not proscribe it. It was true that the Bill did not directly and absolutely proscribe religious instruction, though much was done in it to discountenance and discourage such instruction—it was mentioned solely for the purpose of being excluded and set aside. That being so, he thought it was necessary and proper, before they went into Committee upon the Bill, that they should express their opinions in reference to the basis upon which it was formed. It was of great importance, before they went into details, that they should consider the question of principle—because, if they should settle the principle in accordance with the view that he considered right, they would afterwards be much better able to deal with the details. The mode of dealing with this question now was very different from the mode adopted when previous Bills were brought in by Liberal Governments. In 1854 there was a Bill for amending the law relating to education in Scotland, brought in by the then Lord Advocate (Mr. Moncrieff), and this was its Preamble—

“Whereas, instruction in the principles of religious knowledge and the reading of the Holy Scriptures, as heretofore in use in the parochial and other schools in Scotland, is consonant to the opinions and religious profession of the great body of the people, while at the same time ordinary secular instruction has been and should be available to children of all denominations.”

This was a distinct recognition of the principle of religious instruction being consonant to the opinions of the great body of the people; and accordingly the 27th clause of the Bill contained a distinct provision that the schoolmaster should give instruction at definite hours in religion. It was not left to be determined by any local authority, but it was the subject of direct legislative enactment. In the present Bill there was no duty whatever laid upon the schoolmaster to provide religious instruction, and there was no provision for the removal of teachers for irreligion. The educationalists of Scotland had hitherto successfully resisted being brought under the Revised Code of 1862, because it was thought that the basis of education in Scotland would be framed like that of England. At present the grants from the Privy Council were made under the Act of 1861, which provided that they should be given to schools in which there was religious teaching; and no one in Scotland objected to the operation of that provision. In the present Bill there was an express declaration that none of the Privy Council grants should be given for the purpose of religious instruction; and the Conscience Clause was one which he ventured to think imposed the greatest restriction in reference to religion. The English Conscience Clause said that the time or times during which religious instruction was given at any meeting of the school should be either at the beginning or at the end, or at the beginning and at the end of such meeting, and should be inserted in a time-table to be approved by the Education Department, and which table should be kept permanently and conspicuously affixed in every school-room, and any scholar might be withdrawn by his parents from such instruction without forfeiting any of the other benefits of the school. In the Bill then before the House it was enacted by the 65th clause that in every school secular instruction should continue during four hours at the least, and no religious instruction should be given and no religious observance should take place except before the commencement or after the termination of the secular instruction, and that the time for religious instruction and for religious observances, if any, in school should be specified on a table provided by the Scotch Education Department. The provision permitted religious instruction only on one occasion, which was a much narrower provision than that in the English Bill. Under the present Bill it would be impossible to give religious instruction in a school in which there were five or six classes composed of pupils of different degrees of progress in secular and in religious knowledge, so that each class would require separate teaching. This was a provision that was very much opposed to the practice that had hitherto prevailed in Scotland. The provision would prevent any religious instruction in infant schools where the duration of attendance was only about four hours a-day, and it would also produce the same result in reference to night schools. The effect of such a system as this would be inconsistent with that which prevailed in Scotland, and would prove destructive both to the existing schools and religious teaching in Scotland. In Scotland they had a feeling of jealousy of the Privy Council, especially after the declaration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in relation to this subject of education. In the speech of the right hon. Gentleman to the people of Halifax, a few months ago, the right hon. Gentleman used the following language:—

“It is the duty of Government to have the children of the State educated just as it is to establish a police, and to see to the safety of society. That being the case the Government did not in any degree discharge its duty by delegating it, not to persons chosen by themselves, but to any number of persons who came forward to found schools. That system I was never weary of denouncing; but I am sorry to say that in so denouncing it I met with very little, if any, support in Parliament, and not being able otherwise to reform the system, I, in conjunction with my Colleague, Earl Granville, hit on the scheme of payment by results, which had a particular value of its own, because it tended to ensure a sufficient quantity of work for the money paid for it. But it had another and further advantage. By paying for secular results, and giving no payment at all for religious instruction, we adopted a system tending very forcibly to the secularisation of education. I look upon this as a great benefit."

But the right hon. Gentleman the other night expressed some sympathy with the secularists in this respect when he said that he would not have religious instruction given by the schoolmasters. Religion, too, was to be excluded as one of the subjects of examination in schools. The Bill of 1869 provided that Inspectors should not be entitled to inspect in regard to religion except when specially requested. But the present Bill did not even allow that privilege. The Inspectors were absolutely forbidden to make any investigation as to the religious teaching of the schools, even though it should be distasteful, neither to the parents of the children nor to the managers of the schools. There was no provision whatever for the religious instruction of the poor. The 66th clause of the Bill seemed to be expressly framed in order to escape from the religious difficulty raised by the 25th clause of the English Act; for it simply proposed to enact that school boards should be bound to provide instruction in reading, writing, and arithmetic. He submitted that there was no desire to change the system which had existed so long and was recognized so long as having conferred great benefits on Scotland. It had been said that the question whether the Bible should or should not be read at these schools might be fairly left to the local boards. Now, the people of Scotland did not wish to make the "Bible" or "No Bible" an electioneering cry. They felt that they were living in a Christian country, where the Bible was recognized as the basis of all morality and public order, and it was the duty of every Christian State to furnish every facility possible for the communication of religious instruction to the young and the ignorant. The Bill of 1854 contained a direct provision for the instruction of children in Holy Scriptures. In whose interest was this measure framed? Certainly not in the interest of either the children or their parents, because it ignored the wishes of both. They had been told that the existing system of religious teaching in Scotland had worked well and given great satisfaction. Well, if that were so, why was it not allowed to continue? [The LORD ADVOCATE: Hear, hear!] He was glad to hear that expression of opinion on the part of his hon. and learned Friend, because he thought he had shown that the people did not desire any change in the existing system, which was clear in point of principle, and perfectly suitable to the existing and special circumstances of the country. There were two classes of persons who might be said to object to religious instructions in these schools. First, those who were opposed to Christian instruction on the ground, as they asserted, that it tended to fetter the human intellect. Was it right, he (Mr. Gordon) asked, in those days, when they saw the Holy Scriptures not only openly attacked, but also secretly undermined, to give way to such an objection? Their resolution in respect to religious instruction should give no uncertain sound. The knowledge of the Holy Scriptures was a most important element in the education of youth. Another class of persons objected to the introduction of religious teaching into these schools, because they thought it tended to produce religious inequality and sectarian strife amongst the pupils. The latter class of objections came generally from the Nonconformist body, although he knew many eminent exceptions to this opinion among them. He could understand why they should object to religious instruction being afforded to the adult portion of the population—though even on that point he could not agree with them—but he altogether failed to understand why they should object to the State providing religious instruction for the young. It appeared to him that they took a distorted view of this matter. It was said that the Christian education of children might very well be left to parents and Churchmen. How ludicrous it was to speak of the parents giving that instruction. Why, it was in consequence of the neglect of the parents to give even secular education to their children that the Government were compelled to have recourse to this Bill to oblige them to do so. How, then, could it be expected that the parents would voluntarily supply their children with religious instruction? Did they not know there was a large mass of the population who habitually neglected their parental duties? Let them take the case of Glasgow, for instance, as far as leaving religious teaching to the Church was concerned. In that city there were about 130,000 persons, or about one-fourth of the whole population, who never went to church at all, and yet it was proposed to compel the young persons among this vast number to take secular education, but to leave their religious instruction to the Church, whose ministrations they never attended. The Nonconformists were said to be in favour of a secular system, but in 1847 a large body of them set forth their view that the State had no right to interfere with education, because there could be no proper and sound system which did not provide religious instruction. In answer to the suggestion that the question of religion should be left to the local boards, he could only express his opinion that so to leave it would have the effect of creating dissension and heartburning to such an extent that the people in many districts would be inclined to allow religious teaching to be elbowed out of the schools in order to restore order and peace to the society in which they lived. Religious teaching had been the rule in Scotland for three centuries. It was the intention of the Bill of 1861 to continue it, and he asked the House not to permit that system to be overturned. By some persons Dr. Chalmers had been quoted in support of the secular system, but at the time Dr. Chalmers made use of the expression which was quoted, the state of things was different from what it was at present, and since then Dr. Chalmers declared in favour of putting the Word of God in the forefront of their system of education. Another ground on which he asked the House to support the Resolution of which he had given Notice was that the overwhelming testimony of the Scottish people was in its favour. Not more than 2,000 people had petitioned in favour of the Bill, but there were no less than 200,000 persons in Scotland requiring religious education. Why, then, should Members of the House disregard the opinion of their constituents, and refuse to maintain a system which had hitherto worked satisfactorily? In conclusion he begged to move the Resolution.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "having regard to the principles and history of the past educational legislation and practice of Scotland, which provided for instruction in the Holy Scriptures in the public schools as an essential part of education, this House, while desirous of passing a measure during the present Session for the improvement of education in Scotland, is of opinion that the Law and practice of Scotland in this respect should be continued by provisions in the Bill now before the House,"—(Mr. Gordon),—instead thereof.

THE LORD ADVOCATE: Sir, it is not my intention to occupy the attention of the House above a very few minutes, for I feel that it would not be becoming on my part to detain hon. Members with premature and unprofitable discussion upon questions which will regularly and usefully come under their consideration when we get into Committee. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Glasgow University has said that this Motion of his was not brought forward for any party purpose—and I readily accept that statement. He added that neither was it brought forward with the view of placing any impediment in the way of the progress of the Bill. Well, I wish my hon. and learned Friend had told us with what view it was brought forward. There may be occasions on which it is expedient for the House, even when on the very eve of going into Committee on measures, to address itself to the consideration, and to dispose of by way of Resolution, any particular subject which the measure comprehends; but these occasions must necessarily be very rare and exceptional, for it is obviously the most ordinary course to consider the whole subject and the provisions of the measure in Committee. This Resolution is brought forward as an Amendment on the Motion to go into Committee. My first objection to it is that it is altogether unnecessary to enable the Committee to deal with the provisions of the Bill in such manner as it pleases. The import of the Motion is to express approbation of the existing law and practice of Scotland with respect to Bible teaching in public schools; and, further, to express the opinion that the provisions of the existing law should be continued by similar provisions in the Bill at present before the House. Now, whatever the existing law may be, no preliminary Resolutions are necessary in order to enable the House in Committee to bring the provisions of the Bill, if they are not at present in accordance with the existing law, into such accord as the House may think proper. If the Resolution be not necessary for that purpose, it is certainly unnecessary for any other purpose. It is so unnecessary for that purpose that as an Instruction to the Committee it would be absolutely incompetent, because it is always incompetent to instruct a Committee to do what the Committee has, in its ordinary competency, the power to do without any Instruction whatever. My second objection to the Resolution is that it is altogether erroneous in the assumption which it states with respect to the provisions of the existing law. I do not fail to notice the mist attempted to be raised by the jumble of words—such as “the principles and history,” “past legislation and practice” in Scotland with respect to education—such a mist is easily blown aside. It was hardly worth attempting to raise it with respect to the provisions of the law, for it is altogether an error to say there is any law in Scotland, legislative or otherwise, which provides that instruction in the Holy Scriptures in the public schools shall be an essential part of education. My hon. and learned Friend may be able to persuade the House that that ought to be the law, and he has an Amendment in Committee upon the Paper for the purpose of making that the law, and he will have an opportunity of attempting to persuade the Committee to agree to his proposal; but I venture to say this, in the most unqualified manner—that legislation has never hitherto made such provision as that which he asks the House to make—and that the practice is in entire concordance with the statement of my hon. and learned Friend. It has always been the practice, not only in the public schools in Scotland, which are subject to the law existent upon the subject, but also in the voluntary schools, which outnumber the public schools three to one, to give instruction to the children attending them, not only in the Holy Scriptures, but also in the Shorter Catechism. For my part—and I think I may speak for my hon. Friends on this side—I entirely approve, and they entirely approve, of that practice, especially taken in connection, and because we must take it in connection, with what my hon. and learned Friend correctly stated, and for which he justly claimed credit, for the managers of existing schools—namely, the manner in which these schools are conducted. My hon. and learned Friend claimed credit for the managers of the schools, because religious instruction was given at such times and in such manner that no child was called upon to receive it whose parents or guardians objected; and that religious instruction—and especially Bible teaching—was given, not under a written Conscience Clause, because no such clause exists in Scotland, but an unwritten Conscience Clause, which is rigidly and conscientiously observed by the school managers. Of that course of proceeding we must all entirely approve. I wish to state distinctly that the law of Scotland at this moment leaves school managers at perfect liberty in this respect. We know how they have exercised their liberty; and I, for one—and the great majority, I believe, of those who sit on this side of the House—approve of the manner in which they have exercised the liberty which they possess. I say so, subject to the important qualification—and if I was to make any criticism upon it, it would be only this—that the Bible instruction has been too little, too feeble, and not at all as efficient as it ought to be. So far as we can judge from the Commissioners' Reports, there has been a great failure in that respect—probably from no fault of the teachers, but for want of the power. That, I hope, will be supplied by this Bill—to teach religion in that effectual and efficient manner which is desirable, and which I trust in future will bear very different results from the fruits borne in the past. I blame nothing in respect of the practice of the schools in this respect; on the contrary, I entirely applaud it, and only wish to make it more efficient. My hon. and learned Friend says—and he repeated it over and over again—if the people of Scotland are entirely satisfied with the existing system, why change it? I do not propose to change it in the least degree; I do not propose to make for the future any more than has been done for the past—any legislative provision with respect to the teaching of religion. There is none now. The schoolmaster is subject to a certain test, but he is not enjoined to teach religion. He is not even required to profess belief in the Holy Scriptures. He is expressly relieved from doing so. He is not required to express belief in the Confession of Faith, or to subscribe it. He is expressly relieved from doing so. What he undertakes is that he shall not directly or indirectly teach or inculcate any opinions opposed to the Divine authority of Holy Scripture. But he is not required to teach anything on the subject. I do not say whether that is right or wrong—I do not touch on that subject at all in this Bill. I leave the schoolmasters very much as they now are, only interfering so far with those who elect them that they shall not in future, as in the past, be selected exclusively from members of the Established Church. Suppose for a single moment that there were any law on this subject such as my hon. and learned Friend puts forward, without being able to put his finger on a single enactment—nothing could be easier than to say you shall teach the Bible, you shall teach the Shorter Catechism, or anything else—it is almost impossible to use words intended to have that effect which any man reading them can misconstrue. But there is now no provision whatever on the subject of teaching the Holy Scriptures or the Shorter Catechism. If there were, it would apply only to the parish schools, or a quarter of the entire number, leaving the other three-quarters subject to no law on the subject. If the teaching of religion is to be safe in the future; if it is not only not to be hindered, but to be stimulated and promoted so as to be made efficient, it is not by statutory enactment, but by the feeling of the people themselves. That has been found effectual in the past, says my hon. and learned Friend. I rather differ from him. It has not been so efficient as it might be. It might be greatly stimulated and increased, but it has depended for such success as it has attained upon the feelings of the people themselves. And there we propose to leave it. If any Member of the House thinks that the practice of the past has not been satisfactory—that that should be made compulsory now which has so far depended on the goodwill of the teachers and managers—it is competent for him to make a proposal to that effect in Committee. I therefore hope that this eccentric and superfluous Resolution may not be adopted, and that the Motion I have submitted that you, Sir, do now leave the Chair, may be carried.

LORD HENRY SCOTT said, that his only desire was to support what he considered to be the feeling of the great majority of the people of Scotland; and he felt satisfied that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Glasgow would not have proposed his Amendment if he had not felt satisfied that the Bill did not meet the requirements of Scotland on the subject of education; and therefore it was but right that before the House went into Committee they should lay down some tangible principle for their guidance with regard to religious instruction. The object of the Amendment was not to defeat the Bill or to throw it over for another Session; but it had been framed in accordance with the expression of opinion of the vast majority of the people of Scotland to which he had before referred, and which had found expression in the numerous Petitions that had been presented on the subject of Scotch education, and which had not met with any contradiction. Therefore, to describe the Amendment as superfluous, as had been done by the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate, appeared to show that the right hon. and learned Lord must have shut his ears to everything that passed in Scotland on the subject during the last four or five months. It was likewise very well to say that they could deal with details in Committee, and, no doubt, they could; but this was a question pre-eminently of principle, and without the establishment of a principle they would find themselves in a difficulty when dealing with the clauses of the Bill. For instance, the clause which provided the time and manner when religious instruction was to be given differed almost entirely from the practice of Scotland in that respect, and, therefore, it was essential that the House should first establish some principle before they embarked on a discussion of the clause. There was no religious difficulty in Scotland the same as in England and Ireland; because, however much the people of Scotland might differ as to Church government and Church patronage, there was no absolute doctrinal differences between them, so as to affect the consciences of the parents and necessitate their removing their children from the religious teaching of the schools. For what reason, then, he asked, were they suddenly to interfere and change the system of religious education adopted in Scotland? The Bill differed essentially in many of its characteristics from the Bill of 1869, which had passed through that House; and he was at a loss to understand why, within the last few years, the Government should have so considerably altered its views upon this subject. The present Bill proposed to transfer the whole of the parochial schools from the present managers, and transfer them to an electoral body to be rated as low as £4 to the poor, notwithstanding that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had said—and deservedly so—that great credit was due to the school managers for the manner in which they had conducted the schools in Scotland. The Bill of 1869 likewise proposed to enlarge the electoral body; but although they had not entirely agreed upon the school committees, as they were called in that Bill, and the proportion in which the heritors were to be represented upon them, yet they had to a certain extent acceded to the manner in which it should be done, and it would have been far better if that arrangement had been introduced into this Bill. It was therefore a subject for consideration whether, if they swept away a system which had admittedly worked well, that which they proposed to substitute for it would work better, or even as well? The truth, however, was that in the parish schools very little, if anything, required to be done, and was it therefore worth while in dealing with the great towns only, to alter a system which had the entire confidence of the Scotch people? The formation of school boards in burghs and towns was the thing needed; but he could not understand why school boards were to be forcibly established in the country districts of Scotland. Moreover, he felt satisfied that they would not be able to obtain so good a board of school managers under the £4 qualification proposed in the Bill as they would have had under the proposal contained in the Bill of 1869. He regretted to find that the Bill aimed a great blow to anything like the voluntary system, for he thought it had always been understood that from what that House had already done with regard to voluntary schools, it was not at all their intention to exclude those schools from the receipt of grants for educational purposes. A proposition, however, existed in the Bill which would make it exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, for any denominational school to receive any grant of public money, the result of which, if passed, would be to discourage all voluntary effort in Scotland. With regard to that proposition, a vast number of Petitions had been presented in favour of the existing schools in Scotland, and both Episcopalians and Presbyterians had stated that they viewed with great regret what they were afraid would prove to be the prohibitory effects of the clause, and which prohibitory effects in no degree existed under the English Bill. There was only one point more on which he wished to express his opinion, and that was on the question as to whether the schools in Scotland should be managed by the Privy Council in England, or by a Board in Scotland, and he must give his voice in favour of a Board in Edinburgh, believing as he did that the Scotch would naturally pay more attention to the Minutes of a Board who were well acquainted with Scotland and the requirements of the district, than they would to an Order in Council, given by the central authority, which had under its regulation and control the schools throughout England, the requirements of which might differ in many respects from those of Scotland. Entertaining those opinions, he should cordially support the Motion of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Glasgow.

MR. M'LAREN said, he deprecated long discussion upon the principles included in this important measure upon the very threshold of the Committee, where all its details could be considered; and he would rather take the Bill as it now stood, with all its defects, than incur the risk of losing it altogether—for the time they had left to get it through was none too long. Still, the Government themselves did not appear to be satisfied with the measure in all respects, for they had proposed several Amendments, and he had himself given Notice of one which, when the proper time arrived, he should endeavour to convince the House was worthy of its consideration. That Amendment provided that instruction might be given in the public schools on religious subjects, but that no catechism or formulary whatever should be taught in any of the Government schools. According to his reading of the Instruction now moved by the hon. and learned Member for Glasgow University, its principle was identical with the spirit of his own Amendment, and therefore he should have no hesitation in supporting it. About 18 months ago he addressed a large meeting of his constituents at Edinburgh, when the question raised was whether the Bible and the Shorter Catechism should be enacted as part and parcel of the education of the people of Scotland, and he then stated that he thought it would be wrong to enact the teaching of the Catechism, but right to enact that the Bible should be read in preference to all other books in the schools. Six months ago, at the second annual meeting of the same Association, he repeated his statement, and from that time down to the present he had received numerous Petitions to present to the House on the question of education, and multitudes of letters, and he did not find that any one of them found fault with the opinions he then expressed. The hon. and learned Lord Advocate had argued that instruction in the Holy Scriptures was not the law of Scotland; but he had not attempted to argue that it was not the practice of the country. On the contrary, he had affirmed that it was the practice in Scotland, and rejoiced that it was. He (Mr. M'Laren) rejoiced with him that it was the practice, and he was anxious to see that good practice confirmed by enactment. If it be asked why he desired to see it enacted in different terms than those which formerly existed, his answer was, that by this Bill the whole management and all the appointments of the schools in Scotland would be changed entirely, and unless the rule was laid down in the Bill, every parish in Scotland would become a battle-field, and the discussions would be endless as to whether the Bible alone should be taught; or whether the Bible and the Catechism, or whether any other religious instruction should be given, or whether it should be left altogether to the Churches. It was enacted by the Act of Union between the two countries, and by other Acts of Parliament with which Scotch Members were familiar—and it was well laid down by the Act of Settlement of the Crown—that Scotland should be a Protestant country, and that she should be so for all time. He (Mr. M'Laren) held by that principle firmly, and he agreed with the well-known words of Bishop Stillingfleet, that the Bible was the religion of Protestantism, and he wanted the religion of Protestants to be taught in the schools of Scotland by reading the Bible and giving a fair explanation of its meaning in the public schools. The hon. and learned Lord Advocate had stated there was no enactment to compel the teaching of the Scriptures. In that he (Mr. M'Laren) did not agree. In every Act of Parliament he had read, the spirit was exactly the reverse. When the Lord Advocate read the declaration in the Act of 1861, he omitted a very important portion of that declaration. If he had read the whole of that declaration, it would have appeared plainly that although there were no express words to teach such doctrines as "Thou shalt not steal," "Thou shalt not kill," yet by implication the Act of 1861 was as plain as anything could be that religion was to be taught, and that it should continue to be taught in the schools. The words of the declaration omitted by his hon. and learned Friend, and which followed the passage he did read, were the Shorter Catechism—

"Agreed upon by the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, and approved of by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland in 1648; and I will faithfully conform thereto in my teaching of the said school."

No doubt, if they required him to point out an exact enacting clause, he must admit that it was not forthcoming; but all history concurred in showing that the principles of education in Scotland had been imbued with these views, and that an excellent epitome of Bible instruction had always been taught. Why, then, did he ask that they should lay down a rule in this Act of Parliament, when it was laid down and had been so long acted upon? Simply because, if they did not introduce some rule of the kind, they would introduce it for themselves, and all sorts of differences would arise.

It was to avoid that strife and to get the matter settled once for all that he had given Notice of his Amendment. He did not care, if his object was effected, whether it was effected by this Instruction or by his own Amendment; nor did he care under what circumstances the Amendment was brought forward, for it was an honest Motion, honestly intended, and he should certainly move it on the proper occasion.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he was not about to discuss the merits or demerits of the Bill, but he rose to ask whether the Government were really going to offer no reply to the admirable speech and the clear arguments of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gordon) on a question which was so deeply interesting to the feelings of the Scotch people that the Government ought not to pass over these arguments in silence? It seemed, however, that the Government had taken the line of treating the Motion with contempt, as a thing not worth discussing. For more than 200 years the people of Scotland had derived advantages from a system of education which we in England might well envy. In his own efforts to promote education in this country, he (Sir John Pakington) had applauded that system again and again; and what was the leading principle from which the blessings of the system emanated but the inculcation of religion and the teaching of the Bible? He challenged the Lord Advocate to deny that there was a deep attachment on the part of the people of Scotland to the principle of religious teaching in the public schools. Looking at what had lately been said on this subject, hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House had a peculiar interest in it. They could not forget the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, delivered at Halifax, not long ago; nor the speech of the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Stansfeld), both of whom declared their preference for a secular system of public instruction. Although those right hon. Gentlemen were Members of the present Government, he (Sir John Pakington) believed he expressed the opinion of a vast majority of the people in England and Scotland when he said they were strongly and directly opposed to the secular system, and were desirous of maintaining religious instruction in the schools. He was at a loss to conceive how Members of the Government could consistently prefer secular education, when there was such strong proof of attachment to religious instruction as had been brought forward to-night. A respectful answer to the demonstration of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gordon) on this point was certainly due from the Lord Advocate. To say that the Bill could not now be discussed was anything but a satisfactory method of meeting the arguments of his hon. and learned Friend. He believed the House would resist any attempt on the part of the Government to smother discussion on this important question.

MR. ORR-EWING said, that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate assented to the principle of religious education when the Education (Scotland) Bill was before the House some years ago. He then said that he entirely approved of religious teaching, and his object was to make it more comprehensive than at present; that there was no test, no legal enactment that religion should be taught; and that it was taught in Scotland only arose from the good sense and the religious character of the people of Scotland. If his right hon. and learned Friend had still that object in view, why had he not given it expression in the Bill before the House? His hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) had confirmed the statement of his hon. and learned Friend—and he (Mr. Orr-Ewing) entirely agreed with him in that confirmation—that although there was no specific enactment requiring religion to be taught in the schools, yet by implication it ran through all the enactments to which he referred, and, as a fact, there was no school in Scotland but one where not only was the Bible read and explained, but the Shorter Catechism was taught daily. He did not, however, object to the compromise which had been proposed—that the Bible alone should be enjoined to be taught if the Shorter Catechism was not proscribed in the schools; but he objected entirely to their being subjected to the English Code. The English Code was a Godless one; but they in Scotland were under the old Code, which enjoined the teaching and examination in religion. But things were far better managed in Scotland. In England the board was elective; but such a plan in Scotland would only lead to their being elected by poor householders, who would elect the teachers instead of their being chosen, as now, by the heritors and ministers; and strife and turmoil would be introduced into every parish, for no doubt there would be found in almost every parish some few persons in favour of secularism, and the result would be that there would be a great disturbance at every election. The hon. Member for Edinburgh was the true exponent of the feeling of the people of Scotland in this matter, and there could not be the least doubt of their determination to have the Holy Scriptures taught in the schools. The right hon. and learned Lord Advocate complained that Scotland was exempt from the operation of the Revised Code now in force in England; but, in fact, it was specially kept out of it, and one of the reasons why they had hitherto kept themselves free from the Revised Code was that in the parochial schools, and many others, they taught the higher branches of education. In England the Government prevented the schoolmaster from teaching, and being taught, religion; and the Inspectors had no power whatever to examine into religious teaching. If that system of secular education, by an indirect method, were forced on Scotland, as was very much dreaded, it would be repugnant to the feelings of the whole of the people. He had no sympathy with the cry in Ireland for Home Rule, for he feared they had ulterior views which would lead to the dismemberment of the Empire. But if Home Rule meant legislation in accordance with the feelings of the country, and that the strongly-expressed wish of the country was to be carried out in opposition to centralization, as displayed in the attempt to rob Scotland of the management of its schools, and place them under a department of the Privy Council which had no knowledge of the feelings of Scotland, he, for his part, should in this sense become a Home Ruler. He regretted that a Gentleman temporarily placed in a high position should avail himself of the opportunity, and go against the feelings of his countrymen by proposing in that House an Education Bill which met with no support in Scotland, and still more so that that Gentleman's predecessor (Mr. Moncrieff), who was at the same time both an honour to that House and to Scotland, had not been allowed to give effect to the legislation on this subject when he had it in charge, as he thoroughly understood the question, and sympathized with the earnest desires of his fellow-countrymen.

MR. C. DALRYMPLE said, the hon. Member for Edinburgh had answered the speech of the Lord Advocate, but the speech of his hon. and learned Friend below him (Mr. Gordon) was as yet unanswered. He could not have imagined that the silence of the other side of the House would have been carried so far, unless the fact was, as might be not at all improbable, that its arguments were perfectly unanswerable. The right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had said that the Amendment was unreasonable, because its matter might have been introduced in Committee quite as well as now. But what chance would his hon. and learned Friend have of being able to make in Committee such a speech as he had done then? It would have been said that it was a second reading speech, and prejudice would have been raised against it on that account. The right hon. and learned Lord had said that the Resolution was erroneous — that his hon. and learned Friend had raised a mist about the subject of the old law of Scotland; but the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) had sufficiently answered that objection. The right hon. and learned Lord had further pronounced the Resolution "eccentric;" but the language of the Resolution was such that it could not be mistaken in Scotland, and if it was "eccentric" to move that the Holy Scriptures should continue to be read in the schools of Scotland as in past times, then commend him to such eccentricity. Holding that view he hoped to see some distinct provision made for religious instruction while in Committee, and he considered that end would be promoted by the Resolution under discussion. He would ask a question which he had asked before, for it was important to remember it. Why was the Bill introduced? It was to supply the lamentable deficiency of education in the large towns of Scotland. But in supplying that deficiency, an opportunity was taken to upset the whole present system of education in that country, and he would not say to prevent, but to abridge and restrict religious education in every possible way. And yet he ventured to say that the class of children whom the Bill was specially intended to reach, were those who, above all others, required religious training. The demand was for a national system; but he would say, not in any bitterness, but in all seriousness, that the nationality of the measure before the House appeared to consist in the omission of all direct enactments on the subject of religious education. His hon. and learned Friend had dealt fully with the law on the subject, and he was not fitted, even if he were inclined to do so, to follow him, but he could speak with confidence as to the practice. During the short Easter Recess he had had an opportunity of being present at two school examinations in the West of Scotland, in which the religious part was conducted in an admirable manner; but he could not help feeling at the same time that if the present Bill were carried, it was possible that in the future no examination of that class might ever be held again. He was far from saying that the Bill would make it impossible; but this he would say, that it threw every possible difficulty in the way. It was said that those who agreed with him in desiring some enactment in regard to the teaching of the Holy Scriptures were showing distrust of the people of Scotland. His belief in the people of Scotland carried him a long way, and his belief in their wish to have the Scriptures taught in their schools was profound and confident; but the people of Scotland were a law-obeying people, and if a measure passed that House which did not, indeed, prohibit education, but put all sorts of difficulties in the way, the people of Scotland might not find it possible to carry out their intentions. Then, again, one of the greatest misfortunes of the Bill was, that it would relegate the important subject of religious instruction in the schools to be fought out in every locality, whereas if the Resolution were carried the subject of the Holy Scriptures at all events would be taken out of the region of controversy. With respect to the Time Table Conscience Clause, he would give them the substance of what was said by an excellent pamphlet on the subject. He quoted it with the less hesitation, because he did not know who was the author of it. The writer said—

Mr. C. Dalrymple

“Whatever may be said of religious teaching according to use and wont, this at least has never been denied—that teachers have been secured full liberty, and have been expected to use every opportunity of inculcating religious truth. Now, however, for four consecutive hours this liberty is to be taken away. It is the shallowest of all sophisms to say that the proposed time-table will merely legalize what has all along been the practice. But there is a marvellous difference between a time-table which is meant to regulate and one that is meant to exclude.”

By the adoption of the Resolution two important principles would be established: one, the making the Holy Scriptures a legal part of the instruction to be given, joined with all proper protection of a Conscience Clause; the other, the taking of that question out of the arena of local controversy, to which he had before referred. If asked, what was their motive in proposing the Resolution, he would reply it was plain that it was no party motive, and he thought it was equally plain they had no sectarian motive in the matter, for it was not a Resolution in favour of the Established Church of Scotland or of any particular religious denomination. The question of the study of the Holy Scriptures was a matter on which all were agreed, and which formed a bond of union between those who differed about everything else. While in the Bill they recognized the duty of the State to supply secular education, they ought also to recognize the duty of combining with it that religious instruction which, after all, was the most important part of education. If he believed that the Resolution must necessarily be fatal to the Bill, he would not give it his support; but would have taken other opportunities of pressing the question. He did not believe that it must be attended by that result, and the provision was so important that they ought not to neglect to have it confirmed at the outset of their proceedings on this Bill.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY said, he must express his surprise at the way in which Scotch Members were discussing this question; no doubt they had a reason for their conduct, but it was not on the surface, and they were not giving a question of that importance the consideration which it deserved. For his own part he was obliged to his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Glasgow for raising this question, and he must say that he was perfectly justified in doing so from the feeling in Scotland, for the Petitions presented on the subject were larger in number than any that had come from Scotland for many years, and it was astonishing to him that, seeing the interest the people of Scotland took in the measure, the Scotch Members opposite declined to discuss it. They had heard a great deal said on the law of the question from the two learned Members on the two front benches, and if he, as a layman, might venture to give an opinion, he considered the schoolmaster in Scotland was bound to teach religion; and, in fact, the practice had always been for the teacher to teach religion, but perfect religious equality was established. The system, indeed, was as near perfection as possible, and so great was the confidence in the schoolmaster, that Roman Catholics and Episcopalians stayed in the parish schools during the time religious instruction was going on; and it was within his own experience that Roman Catholic children were not withdrawn, the parents having confidence in the honesty of the teacher. In short, while the scruples of all were carefully considered and respected, there was not the slightest need of a Conscience Clause. He objected to the Bill on many grounds, the principal one of which was that he objected to the compulsory establishment of school boards in Scotland. He agreed that school boards should be established where there was a deficiency of schools in a district; but he objected to the religious element in education being handed over to the decision of the school boards, for that would only engender a religious strife in many a parish in Scotland; and if he were convinced of one thing more than another, it was that the people were hostile to any secular system. They had seen that system tried in other countries, and they had seen it fail. They knew that clergymen and parents were too much occupied on week days to teach the children religion; besides, they knew that many of the parents were incompetent, and therefore they held that the school was the proper place for teaching the children religious truths. He did hope, therefore, in the face of the strong opinion on this subject in Scotland, the Government would consent to put words in the Preamble of the Bill which would recognize that religious instruction should be given in the schools of Scotland.

SIR JOHN HAY said, that during the absence of the noble Lord the Member for Wigtownshire (Lord Garlies) he had had the honour of presenting Petitions from Wigtownshire and the Wigtown Burghs, which the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate represented, against the Bill. Those Petitions, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman knew, were of considerable importance, and signed by more than 8,000 persons. He had been informed by the chairman of the Stranraer meeting that that Petition had been analyzed to ascertain its real character, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman was aware that a very large majority of the majority who returned him to Parliament had petitioned against the Bill. Of 675 voters on the list, 470 had signed the Petition, only 113 refused to sign, and 92 signed in other places; so that four-fifths of one particular town, which was the principal town the right hon. and learned Gentleman represented, were opposed to the Bill which the right hon. and learned Gentleman now proposed to the House. Similar Petitions, moreover, had been presented from other parishes in the county, and from the two other burghs which the right hon. and learned Gentleman represented, and in all the cases a very large majority of the voters had petitioned against the Bill. That showed—if Petitions showed anything—that the strongest repugnance existed in Scotland against the Bill, and against any measure which should not distinctly recognize that which had hitherto been the practice and the law of Scotland—that all education should be based upon religious teaching. Religion, grammar, and the Latin language were the three matters which it was distinctly provided by the first book of discipline should be taught in the parish schools of Scotland. The Act of 1567 distinctly enunciated the godly upbringing of the young; and that was one of the Acts which they were about to repeal. Having taken considerable pains to inquire into the subject, he declared that he sympathized entirely with the feelings of the whole population in the neighbourhood in which he generally resided, who had urged upon him the strongest opposition to the measure which had been introduced by the Government. The necessity for religious instruction being given in the schools was shown by an instance that came within his own knowledge respecting a school which was principally maintained by himself in the parish in which he resided, and regarding which many persons had expressed to him a hope that he would run the risk of losing the advantage of Government inspection, rather than allow the school to be conducted in accordance with the provisions of that Bill, should it become law. He spoke of a school which was of considerable value in a district in which he had property, and as to which the Government Inspector had reported that out of 113 on the roll, there was an average attendance of 60, and that the scholars continued to exhibit the result of highly skilful teaching. There were attending that school Roman Catholics as well as Presbyterians of every denomination, and he had never heard that the slightest difficulty had been experienced in enforcing the Conscience Clause. Religious instruction was not there left, as suggested by one of the Birmingham League, to be merely the trimmings of education. Another point to which the greatest possible objection was taken was the want of a Scotch Board. The people of Scotland had no desire to be governed from London in regard to local affairs. They wished to see a Scotch Board created, which would have a perfect knowledge of the wants of the people, and which should be ready and willing to enter into their wishes. Another matter upon which the strongest feeling existed in Scotland was that the Bill provided no minimum salary for the schoolmasters. The schoolmasters of Scotland were an intelligent body of men, and it was by no means desirable that they should be thrown upon the parish, to be the shuttlecock of every disputant who was dissatisfied with their teaching, and without the means to uphold their position with dignity and effect. For those reasons, he should support the Resolution of his right hon. and learned Friend; and he could only trust that the silence which had been maintained during the debate by hon. and right hon. Members opposite implied consent to it also.

MR. BIRLEY said, it was impossible to read the Bill, and more especially the 65th clause, without coming to the conclusion that there was a covert foregone intention on the part of the Government to crowd out religious education from the course of instruction in Scotch schools; and that in that respect it differed for the worse from the English Education Act of 1870. Now, the people of Scotland desired to retain their time-honoured religious observances, and no Bill would be effectual that did not fully recognize and give effect to that desire. The present Bill did not accomplish that object, but seemed to have been deliberately framed for the contrary purpose, for four hours was almost all the time at the disposal of the children, yet it was stipulated that four hours at least of secular instruction should be given to the children, and that religious instruction, if any, should be given before or after this four hours' secular instruction. The very words "if any" clearly indicated the animus of the framers of the Bill. He regretted the persistent silence maintained by hon. Gentlemen opposite, and could only hope that it was not the result of any previous compact or arrangement, because such private arrangement was not creditable to the House, and much more honoured in the breach than in the observance. On the part of the great body of English Members and English people, he desired most emphatically to protest against any endeavour to curtail the opportunities now afforded for religious instruction in Scotch schools, and whether the Resolution were carried or not, he trusted the result of the discussion would be that the Government would give some definite assurance that clauses would be introduced to satisfy the people upon this point.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he regretted extremely that the course taken by the Government in this matter, in ignoring the cardinal and essential principles of the ancient system of education pursued in Scotland, should have obliged those who differed with them to come forward and deliberately, in the face of the country, move a Resolution pledging the Government to maintain that system of education which had been the means of raising their country to the high position that she at present occupied. Since he had had the honour of a seat in that House, now nearly 15 years, he had seen various Education Bills for Scotland introduced, but in none of them were the great fundamental principles of their education neglected or overlooked. It was because in the present Bill those principles had been laid aside and ignored, that he and his Friends now came forward with the Resolution which his hon. and learned Friend had moved. He could not help characterizing the present measure as a Godless and infidel Bill, which, if it did not exclude altogether religious teaching from the schools in Scotland, treated that important subject in such a manner that it might be abandoned or wholly neglected at the whim or caprice of an ignorant school board, liable to be acted upon by various causes, and in whose hands, therefore, the education of the country could not, he thought, be safely placed. What was religious education? He himself had first of all been brought up in a parish school, where he had the pleasure to sit beside the fathers of some who were now hon. Members of this House, and who there received their education according to the principles acted upon in the parish schools of Scotland. He could, therefore, certainly state that religion was made the foundation, and pervaded every portion of the instruction there given. He would ask how it was possible to give a sound and healthy education without permeating it with religion, just as water permeated their food and drink? He said they could not do it. The various sects who composed the Presbyterian Body in Scotland were all agreed in the main points of their creed, and all alike held that the teaching of the Scriptures and the Shorter Catechism—the production of the greatest Protestant divines—should form the basis of the education given in the schools in Scotland. That being so, on what present pretext could Her Majesty's Government come forward and lay a Bill on the Table of that House which was certain to be most distasteful to the feelings of the people throughout the length and breadth of Scotland? This Bill was brought forward because Her Majesty's Government had got themselves into such a position with regard to education that they were obliged to bring forward a secular measure of education in order to save themselves from the consequences of their previous legislation on the subject. The question was, whether they were to go into Committee on a Godless Bill, and they should divide the House on that question, so that the people of Scotland might know who were the men who voted with the Government in carrying forward a measure of that description. They might rest assured that if the religious instruction of the children of the lower classes were left to the parents it would be totally neglected. It was absurd to expect parents who neglected their children, and allowed them to roam about and fall into crime, to give them religious instruction; while a mere secular education would only serve to perfect such little street Arabs in the arts of knavery. Neither could the honest workman who toiled early and late find time to impart religious instruction at home to his children. This Bill, therefore, like everything else brought forward by Her Majesty's Government, was "a mockery, a delusion, and a snare." Their policy of pains and penalties—so conspicuous in the case of the Ballot Bill—reappeared here, because they proposed to subject the parent who refused to send his child to their Godless schools to a fine of £5, or 30 days' imprisonment—the punishment to be repeated at intervals of not less than six months. The child itself also, if it absented itself from school without sufficient excuse, was to be apprehended without a warrant, and sentenced to imprisonment. The Bill was opposed by the whole body of schoolmasters in Scotland, with a proper esprit de corps and a due respect for religion. In that part of Scotland with which he was the most intimately acquainted the funds available for educational purposes had been supplemented by special bequests, by which the salaries of the schoolmasters were brought up almost equal to the stipends of the clergymen, and the result was, that the school managers in the district could command the services of men of higher talent than they otherwise could have done, and that the education given was far superior to that given in other parts of the country. The young men who had been educated in the schools to which he referred were to be found in positions of trust all over the world, and they had one and all traced that power to resist temptation, and that earnest desire to discharge their duties faithfully that so greatly distinguished them, to the religious instruction which they had received at those parish schools. The question before the House was, how were those schools to be dealt with? By the Government Bill those establishments were to be handed over to school boards. But how were these school boards to be constructed? In the greater part of the North of Scotland the farms were exceedingly small, and the farmers—of whom the school board would consist—were not themselves sufficiently well-educated to fit them for discharging the duties which would be imposed upon them. The attainments of a schoolmaster were not likely to have such weight with them as to counteract the family influence that would be brought to bear upon them by their well-to-do friends and neighbours. He, for one, therefore, should object most strongly to entrusting the education of the country to such tribunals. Most of the Education Bills relating to Scotland introduced into that House appeared to him to be brought forward rather as a compromise between conflicting interests than as the result of an honest desire to settle the question on sound principles. The statistical data upon which this Bill was founded showed, he admitted, that in certain parts of Scotland there was a largely increasing want of school education for the young; and, for his part, he should be happy to follow the Government, if they would bring forward any rational proposal for meeting the evil so indicated. He objected, however, to a sweeping operation which took no note of the exceptional and special requirements of different localities, but forced what was termed a national system upon the whole country alike. Let the Government deal with the great centres of population, and erect schools for the education of the large numbers of children who were without it; but it would be most unjust and most unwise to deal in a similar manner with the rural districts, in which there was no want of educational power or of adequate administration, in which the standard of education was of the highest class, and in which a state of things existed with which the people were perfectly satisfied. Were the Government to pass this Bill in its present form they would find that they had only evaded, not settled the question. They were now in the extraordinary position of seeing the whole of the Liberal Members who represented Scotch constituencies—or rather of not seeing them, for they appeared to have all gone to dinner—but it was at any rate

a very remarkable thing that the Scotch Liberal Members in that House appeared to have received the command—"Silence in the ranks!" and were afraid to speak. He challenged any hon. Member on the opposite side of the House to answer him. [Mr. CARNEGIE: Hear!] He was glad to hear the hon. Member accept his challenge, and he trusted that he would not be the only Roderick on the hill. Hon. Members on the other side of the House had been educated by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister. He had taught them to rob Churches, to disregard the laws of property, and now he was endeavouring to force them to throw away the great talisman of our country—the religious education in our schools. Had he, four or five years ago, asked many hon. Members opposite whether they were prepared to reject religious education in the Scotch schools, each would have replied—"Is thy servant a dog that he should do this thing?" He trusted that the House would not hastily throw aside principles which had raised Scotland to the pinnacle of glory—the principles so beautifully expressed in the Cotter's Saturday Night, which had made our statesmen to hold the highest rank in the councils of nations, and in the walks of science, and which had led our battalions to conquest in every part of the globe.

MR. CARNEGIE said, considering the challenge which had been made by the hon. and gallant Member for Portsmouth, he might at any rate have remained in the House to hear what he (Mr. Carnegie) had to say. The sole remark he intended to make was this—that a speech made avowedly against time did not require an answer.

MR. EASTWICK said, he remembered hearing a statement by Mazzini—a man of strong but peculiar religious opinions—that Christianity was fading out of the world; and in proof of this he mentioned one country after another till he came to Scotland, where, after a pause, he said, "Well, if religion is left anywhere, it is in Scotland." Now, it was the noble ambition of the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate to obliterate this distinctive feature of his country. ["Oh!"] He had, indeed, disclaimed such a purpose, and had alleged that the Bill made no alteration with regard to religious teaching—a statement more astonishing than any he had ever before heard made in that House. If no alteration was made, what was the meaning of the Petitions of 200,000 persons against the Bill, and of the Amendment to be moved by the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) who intended to support this Resolution? The difficulty was to find a part of the existing system which was not changed by the Bill. It would place the general management of the schools under a London Board—a most obnoxious arrangement—and it would transfer the local management to school boards, while inspection was to be universal. As to religion—where the greatest change of all was made—the Lord Advocate had maintained that there was no legislation on this point; but he had overlooked the fact that use and wont was tantamount to law, and that it prescribed religious teaching in Scotch schools. Clauses 63 and 64 excluded such teaching from inspection and grants, and Clause 65 provided that a child might be withdrawn from it; that it should not thereby be placed at a disadvantage; that the secular teaching should be continuous for at least four hours, which probably meant five or six; and that religious teaching should be given prior to, or at the end of the secular instruction. Time also was allowed for recreation; and religion was not to be suffered to curtail the time allotted to anything else, even that given to amusement. Now, there was a difficulty in teaching even a subject which the pupil was anxious to learn; but what appetite would he have at the end of the day for religious teaching, the dullest of all subjects to a child? A few days since the subject of the International Society had been brought under the notice of the House. The Society had issued a manifesto in which they declared that they had turned their backs on God. The Government, no doubt, had put forth no such manifesto in words; but though they had not avowed their intention to turn their backs on God, they would avoid His presence by endeavouring to hide among the trees of the Garden of Secularism.

MR. WHEELHOUSE, as an Englishman, asked the House to consider this measure seriously, because in its essence it was not more Scotch than it was English, or perhaps than it was universal. Bearing in mind the moderate language in which the right hon. and learned Member for Glasgow University—himself an ex-Lord Advocate—had couched his Resolution, he could not see how anyone in that House could entertain a doubt as to the propriety of carrying it. The Government measure appeared to him to be the first attempt to make the people of Scotland declare that henceforth they would care nothing for religion throughout the length and breadth of the land. He wished to call the attention of Members who professed Christianity to the placing of the two words “if any” in the clause—the 95th—which spoke of religious instruction and religious observances. The insertion of those words, “if any” meant simply that the Government, so far as they could, intended to ignore all creeds, and that it should not be necessary for the school boards established throughout Scotland to require that religion should be taught in the schools under their jurisdiction. This was not merely a Scotch question; it affected the well-being of the United Kingdom. He was astonished when he heard of the declaration of the Lord Advocate at Stanraer, that this Bill neither prescribed nor proscribed religion, for the Bill was framed in a way that showed the Government did not want religion, and did not care about it. In the framing of this measure the Government had treated religion in Scotland as one of the trammels of which they wished to get rid. The insertion of the before-mentioned two words “if any” was an unanswerable proof that such was the spirit which dictated the framing of this Bill. Then, what was to be said about the 200,000 Scotchmen who had petitioned against the Bill in its present form? For his own part he believed that of all the teachers in Scotland, not 50 could be found who desired to eliminate the religious element from their schools. In fact, their religion was so bound up with their character, that they could not forego the teaching of the Catechism and the faith in which they had themselves been instructed in their childhood, even if they would. He regretted exceedingly that many of the representatives of Scotch constituencies who ought to have addressed the House, and whose votes might have affected the division on the question were absent. The electors in Scottish constituencies ought to look at the reports of this discussion, in order to see how many of the Members who ought to have spoken on this subject had addressed the House, and how many Members who ought to have been present had absented themselves. Had it gone forth that silence was to be the order of the evening? If not, what was the reason why hon. Members who ordinarily took considerable interest in matters affecting North Britain had spoken scarcely one single word? Perhaps they were conscious that if they gave utterance to opinions in favour of the Bill, they would be called upon to render an account to their constituents. If a good Education Bill could be passed for Scotland, by all means let it be passed; but let them not make an actual denial of faith the basis of a Scotch, or indeed, of any Education Bill. But this Bill of the Government not only did not prescribe religious instruction for Scotland, but practically, by ignoring, proscribed it. The common sense and the thrift for which the people of Scotland had been distinguished from time immemorial, was owing in great measure to their determination to have secular combined with religious instruction. Wherever Scotchmen had been educated, the first principles inculcated in their minds was that whatever else they might remember, they must never forget the faith in which they had been brought up, or in the God in whom they believed. He ventured to think that it had been owing to the firm and decided determination of the people of Scotland, for ages past, that secular education should never be separated from religious instruction, which had made them what they were. Was it to be said, to-day, that the time-honoured history of three centuries was to be forgotten or despised—and that, too, in a country where the memories of such men as John Knox still flourished and held place in the strong affections of their fellow-countrymen? He hoped from the depths of his heart, that the day was far distant when the teachings of 1560 would be so ruthlessly swept away by anyone—least of all, by those who professed so energetically that they had the education of the people of North Britain so warmly at heart.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, that one or two clauses, and more especially the 68th and 69th, affected the liberty of the subject so seriously that he could not refrain from pointing them out. If a parent failed to provide elementary education for his child, the Bill provided that, on the statement of the officer prosecuting, he might be fined £5, or be imprisoned for 30 days; and, in the event of the offence being repeated and continued, he was to be sent to gaol for six months; while in another clause it was provided that there should be no appeal. ["Question!"] That was a very serious question; for what with these penalties under the Scotch Education Bill, and those under the Ballot Bill, they might, if such measures were passed, expect to see a considerable part of the population in gaol; and, moreover, no Government had the right to impose penalties without giving the power of appeal. Then, with regard to the separation of secular from religious instruction, any attempt to do that would be productive of great mischief; for religion could not be separated by rules and regulations from the common affairs of life, into which it so largely entered. Those were principles which, if violated in Scotland, would affect England also; and for that reason he rose in his place to oppose their adoption of the Bill.

MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON said, it would be in the mind of the House that the Gentlemen who took part in the Nonconformist Conference at Manchester discussed the very question at issue with reference to its bearing upon the greater English one; and he should have expected some hon. Members who spoke at that Conference to lay their views before the House. In fact, the mover of a resolution which was passed at that meeting about this Bill, said that on its principles and provisions would depend the character of subsequent legislation for England and Ireland; and that the Bill would furnish a precious opportunity for preventing in Scotland the evils which had been found so grievous in England; and for securing, as far as education was concerned, the separation of religion from all State supervision and control. That was the issue Nonconformists had raised as regarded England, and were attempting to raise now. This Bill was their battle-ground, and, if they could succeed in carrying it, they thought they should be able to apply similar provisions to England. He read the proceedings at Manchester in the light thrown upon them afterwards by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Stansfeld), who told hon. Members who had proposed the repeal of Clause 25 of the English Act, that if they would persevere, they would in all probability attain their object. The resolution carried unanimously at Manchester was to the effect that the Scotch Education Bill ought to contain no provisions that would permit religious teaching at the public expense, or give support to denominational schools. Therefore, the issue now raised was—Is religious education to be given in the schools of Scotland? The answer to that issue would be, that if this Bill were carried for Scotland, there would be renewed agitation against the scheme in operation in England. That was a question well worth the attention of English Members; and after what had occurred at Manchester, he should have expected that hon. Members opposite would have stated their views here, in order that they might be answered.

MR. F. S. POWELL said, he could not give his entire adherence to the opinions expressed by some of those with whom in the main he agreed; for instance, he could not assent to the wish of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leeds (Mr. Wheelhouse), that the Bill should not become law. On the contrary, he had a strong desire that during the present Session Parliament should deal in a vigorous, comprehensive, and final manner with education in Scotland, for there had been far too many Bills and too many debates, and the season had now arrived when not by means of the silence of one side of the House, but by means of a full discussion on both sides of the House, the question should be solved. The hon. and learned Member opposed the universal election of school boards; but at present there existed throughout Scotland legally-constructed educational machinery; and the question now was, not whether there should be in every parish an organization for the conduct of education, but what was to be its nature, what was to be the electoral body, and how the elections were to be conducted? The speech of the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate was characterized by a certain asperity of tone; but it contained one welcome admission as to the importance of religious instruction in the schools in Scotland; the proposing of the Resolution had elicited a late and reluctant declaration of regard for religion in education in Scotland; and, as a lawyer, he wished to have that declaration in writing in the form of a statute. Recently he read with interest and sympathy a sorrowful letter addressed by the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Winterbotham) to his constituents, in which the writer stated that he was a member of the Education League, and that it was the opinion of himself, of the Prime Minister, and of his constituency that the difference of opinion between himself and the Government was no reason why he should not hold his present office. Then, the hon. Member added, there was a Scotch Bill which evinced a great advance in public opinion, and he had no doubt that that Bill, if it passed, would furnish a precedent for England. With that warning from one who was in training for the Cabinet, he was entitled to protest against the application to Scotland of doctrines abhorrent to his sentiments, and the application of which to England he would repudiate. The Government, moreover, could not complain of the length of the debate on this Bill; for on the second reading debate was stifled or drifted from the main question, on a Motion by an hon. Member opposite (Mr. Auberon Herbert), who raised the flag, hateful both in Scotland and England, of secularism pure and simple. Again they were witnessing that magnificent silence which concealed differences, and obscured, though it did not extinguish, animosities—for while the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) was anxious for a religious education in England, the right hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld)—at Halifax, but not in the House of Commons—was an advocate for secular instruction only. There appeared, therefore, to be reasons for the silence which was imposed on the other side. He hoped, however, that mysterious silence would not continue; and though it was often said during times of tumult, that agitators were silenced by being sent to Parliament and having an opportunity of there expressing their views, yet Her Majesty's Government were now, by that mysterious voice which commanded silence, exciting debate out of the House of Commons, assembling meetings at Trafalgar Square, and inviting Birmingham and Manchester to summon tumultuous and riotous crowds. He desired a more emphatic declaration than had yet been given respecting the future educational policy for Scotland; for instance, there was a Conscience Clause in the Bill, far less favourable to religion than the Conscience Clause applicable to England. He also dissented from the policy of the Bill in reference to denominational schools, and trusted that it would not become a precedent for England as to the unfavourable treatment to which those schools were exposed. There was a clause in the Bill which dealt with the future position of denominational schools, and that clause provided that Parliamentary Grants should not be made with respect to denominational schools established after the passing of the Act, unless the Education Department should, after due inquiry, be satisfied that a grant was specially required, and that a majority of children in attendance were of the denomination to which the school belonged. Now, some Episcopal schools were resorted to in such numbers in Scotland that the majority of the children were Presbyterians; and as that clause affected them, it was a hardship that the schools should be punished for their efficiency, and the popularity of the instruction given therein, by being deprived of any share in the Government Grant. He also objected to the three years' tenure of a seat on the school board, unless, as in England, it was acceded to for the sake of the cumulative vote which accompanied it, the term being too long to allow any man to hold unquestioned the very important powers vested in such a body. In treating on the subject he had not entered into any questions peculiarly Scotch; but the great change which was now proposed for Scotland might before long become a precedent for England, and the people of England had abundantly shown their adhesion to the cause of religious education. They believed that it was the desire of the children, the wish of the teachers, and the true policy of Parliament; and looking to the people of Scotland, he was not able to see any less love of religion on their part. An Education Bill for Scotland, if it were to be in accord with Scottish sentiment, must be at least as favourable to instruction in religion as an English Education

Mr. F. S. Powell

Bill. He hoped the Bill before the House would be considerably amended in Committee; and that it might through many generations prove a real settlement of the question, and give to the people full and complete education in religious matters, combined with the fullest regard in each case for the dominant rights which every parent ought to possess over the education of his child in a free and Christian nation.

LORD GARLIES said, he had heard with great astonishment his right hon. and learned Friend opposite (the Lord Advocate) say that he could not accept this Resolution, and more especially when he considered the words that were made use of by the right hon. and learned Lord in reply to that Resolution. Why he should have said he could not accept that Resolution, when he said that he approved in reality of religion being taught in Scotch schools, was more than he (Lord Garlies) could understand, for nothing, he thought, was so objectionable as providing secular instruction for the young without providing religious instruction also. His objections to the Bill were two-fold—first, he would consider it from the principle of secular instruction; secondly, he held that the object of the Bill was to supplant a system which had been in vogue in Scotland for centuries—a system which had been proved to work thoroughly well, and a system which, in consequence, was thoroughly endeared to the hearts of the people of Scotland. And by what was that system to be supplanted? By one which he might characterize as at least novel and experimental. He should like to ask, for the benefit of whom was the Bill introduced? Was it introduced for the benefit of the great majority of the people of Scotland? No; for he denied that, taking the different religious bodies one by one, any one of them ever proved by their conduct that they wished their religion to be placed on the footing proposed by the Bill. First, there was the great Presbyterian Body, embracing several sects; then there were Episcopalians, some Anglican and some Scottish; then again there were a great number of Roman Catholics. He would not allude to Secularists, for he was happy to say that in Scotland Secularists were non est—he meant to say Secularism was non est. No one would say that the Roman Catholics had any desire in that direction; while in regard to Episcopalians, the Bill could not have been brought in at their instigation, for certainly, from his knowledge of Episcopalian schools, he could testify that there were many Episcopalian schools which were the most popular in Scotland, which were attended entirely by Presbyterians, and in which subjects from the Bible were always made the basis of instruction. As regarded the Presbyterians, it was his firm conviction that the majority of the United Presbyterians would not approve of the leading principle of this Bill—namely, the secular principle; and as regarded the Free Church, he was convinced that a decided majority did not approve of the permissive secular principle; in short, not a man, he would venture to say, of the Established Church of Scotland throughout the length and breadth of the country, would at all tolerate the leading principle contained in this measure. In proof of those statements, he might instance the Petitions which had been sent up to that House on this subject, for 1,670 Petitions had been sent up complaining of the measure brought forward by Her Majesty's Government, a fact without parallel in the history of Scotland. He would not trouble the House with figures respecting his own constituency, as it might be presumed from the fact of his being there, that they agreed with his views; but there was a group of constituencies—the Wigton Burghs, for which sat his right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate—and he would prove by what was going on there that in that part of Scotland this measure met with no sympathy whatever. That group of burghs consisted of four. Two of them were not in favour of the Lord Advocate; the third one was insignificant; but he would take a larger burgh, which practically did return him to this House. He would take the burgh of Stranraer, which returned the right hon. and learned Gentleman by a majority of 2 to 1, and he would show the feeling of that burgh on this subject. He could only assure the House that, instead of his having a majority on this subject, out of 675 voters who formed that part of the constituency, no less than 670 had petitioned against the Bill. Hon. Gentlemen who represented Scotch constituencies must be aware that the Bill was repugnant to their principles. ["No, no!"] Then he came to what was the key and solution of a measure of this sort, and which he must say he had sought for some time, for it was a puzzle, and he thought it would perplex any one in endeavouring to discover it. There might be two solutions; certainly there could not be more. One solution he had arrived at was, that by some unfortunate accident his right hon. and learned Friend, instead of consulting the constituencies, and other parties who might have been able to inform him of the wishes of the people at large, had got the ideas of a few gentlemen who, from feelings of jealousy, were anxious that a Bill of this principle should pass through Parliament; and he made no secret of it that there were two gentlemen, ministers of the Free Church and the United Presbyterian Church, whom his right hon. and learned Friend might have consulted. There were also a few ministers of those Churches who, from feelings of jealousy towards ministers of the Established Church of Scotland, were anxious that this or some such Bill should pass through Parliament. That was one solution. There was another solution. It would be remembered that in the autumn of 1868, the country generally was informed that there were various branches of the Upas tree which required pruning. Well, they knew there was still one branch of the Upas tree which remained unpruned. It would be remembered also that the Government had found some other Nonconformist Friends below the gangway remarkably troublesome, and it seemed to him to be a possible solution that the Bill was brought forward to solve the difficulty connected with that other branch of the Upas tree; and that Scotland was to be made a lever to bring back these Nonconformist supporters of Her Majesty's Government. The right hon. Gentleman would sacrifice the Ultramontane vote in Ireland in hope thereby to secure the support of the whole Nonconformist element in England and Scotland. He (Lord Garlies) hoped, however, that in the result the anticipations based upon that hope would not be successful.

MR. G. BENTINCK said, he thought no one who was in the House could fail to observe—and he spoke more especially with regard to Scotch Members—the remarkable silence which had been maintained during the discussion on the Liberal benches, a silence for which he was unable to account, except by the supposition that, as last year in the debates on the Ballot Bill, orders had been issued from high authority on their own side. There was, however, another and, perhaps, a still more plausible reason for it, and that was that a schism existed in the opposite ranks, a schism which in fact could only be cured by silence; but be that as it might, he and those with whom he acted were opposed to the present measure, because they had a prejudice in favour of mingling Christian teaching with education—a prejudice which might not be shared by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. They were also opposed to the Bill, because its obvious object was to establish the principle of purely secular education throughout Scotland—a principle which the Government dared not attempt to carry with respect to England; but what he should like to know had Scotland done that she should be supposed to feel less interest than England in Christian teaching? He might remind English Members, too, that that which was once established in the former country would soon be drawn into a precedent for the latter, and that they would have a system such as that which it was proposed to carry out by the Bill sooner or later set up on this side of the Border. He had, he might add, listened to a great many discussions on the subject of education, and always, he must confess, with the feeling that they were farther from a satisfactory solution of it than ever. The reason was, that there was too much sectarian acrimony introduced into the question both in the House and out-of-doors. If people would only deal with it in a different spirit, it might be solved without much difficulty. Many objected to all education; some of them because they were utterly indifferent on the subject, others because they believed that the advantages of education were abused. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, for instance, had learnt to read; but if he had never done so he could not have read The Secularists' Manual to a public meeting of his countrymen, full as it was of Communistic teaching and infidel doctrines. He had no wish, however, to treat the present as a party question, and therefore he would point out that in another high quarter also there had been an abuse of the advantages of elementary education. Nobody could doubt that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) had learnt to write, for there were abundant proofs of his powers in that respect. But if he had never learnt to write he could not have written The Revolutionary Epic, which abounded in such unfortunate, he might say such dangerous, doctrines, that it might perhaps be more appropriately called The Regicide Manual. Speaking more particularly to the question, he trusted that the details of the Bill would be very carefully considered in Committee; and he quite agreed with what had been said about the importance of selecting teachers, as he thought that to educate without religious instruction was simply to put a dangerous weapon into the hands of a man who did not know how to use it. If they educated a man without making a Christian of him, they simply entrusted him with the power of mischief without any controlling influence. He, therefore, could not understand how any religious man could uphold a system of purely secular education. Were such a system persevered with, he believed it would be a retrograde step in civilization in this country, a movement towards barbarism; but he had faith in the strong sense entertained by the people of this country of the value of religious education, and was sure they would scout any proposal like that contained in the Bill.

MR. HERMON said, he had been requested by some Scotch friends of his, if there was a silence on that side of the House, to endeavour to represent the people of Scotland. The people of Scotland took notice of what passed in that House, and through him they desired to say that not only did they wish the Bible to be read, but they wished it to be explained and taught in the schools. If that were not the feelings of the people, he hoped that Scotch Members opposite would stand up and say so. Meanwhile, he should heartily support the Motion.

MR. GREENE said, that as no Scotch Member opposite would defend the system of education which the Scotch people desired, he would endeavour to do so. In doing so, he must say that he was never more surprised than to find that such a Motion was necessary when applied to Scotland, a country beyond all others desirous of having the people religiously taught, and of making religion the groundwork of education; and he was afraid the question to-night was that of the Prime Minister versus the Bible, and that Scotch Members would sacrifice a great principle to support a Government. Let that be told from one end of the land to the other. An American gentleman of high station who was staying with him lately, told him that in his opinion a purely secular education in the United States was undermining the religious principles of the people, and that infidelity was making rapid progress; and he (Mr. Greene) maintained that the downfall of England would commence from the day a similar course of education was adopted in this country. As to England the House had decided to retain Clause 25, yet hon. Members on his side of the House were now endeavouring to defend the same principles against the Government. He was sure the Scotch people would thank them for what they were doing to-night, and was very much mistaken if Scotch Members who voted against the Motion ever returned to the House, a result he should regret for many reasons, being Conservative enough to regret missing the faces he was accustomed to. The Prime Minister had been followed too long. For once let hon. Members opposite to-night give an honest vote, and assert the vital importance of religious education among the people.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, the Motion was one which he should have thought would have obtained the unanimous verdict of that House and of the Government in its favour, and it was because it had not done so that it assumed features of the gravest importance. By the votes against the Motions of the hon. Members for Birmingham and Sunderland the feeling of the people of England seemed all but unanimous on this question; but there was an attempt to heal the differences of the party opposite on the question of Scotch education, and there had also been an attempt by a snap division to defeat the Motion, and thus stultify the opinion of the House pronounced on the two occasions he had mentioned. That was the reason why the silence of hon. Gentlemen opposite was so ominous, and hon. Members on that (the Opposition) side had endeavoured to keep up the debate in order that the House might be able to express its views decidedly on the question before it. It would be seen at a glance that religion was not honoured in the Bill of the Lord Advocate, though it might be true that it was not excluded, and the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Glasgow attempted by his Resolution—which was perfectly harmless—to recall the House to the position which religion ought to occupy. But how had the right hon. and learned Gentleman and those who had supported him been met? They had not been told that the object of the Resolution would be carried out in Committee; all that they had had from the other side was determined silence. But that was a subject on which hon. Members opposite ought to have a good deal to say, for the Vice President of the Council was a man who had carried through one of the most important Acts on the subject of education that had ever been passed in this country. The Prime Minister, too, as everyone knew, not only took an interest in the question of education, but was closely connected by ancestry with the portion of the kingdom with which this Bill had to deal. But from neither of these right hon. Gentlemen had a word fallen on this important question. Then, again, the hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Kinnaid) occupied a well known position in the religious world; the hon. Gentleman figured occasionally on the platforms of Exeter Hall, and yet he had not a word to say. There were, likewise, other hon. Gentlemen opposite representing Scotch constituencies, and from only two of them that evening had the House heard the least expression of opinion. If a division had been taken at the time when an attempt was made to snatch a majority from that House, he was convinced that while some hon. Gentlemen would have been conspicuous for their absence, others would have been equally conspicuous for their presence. The hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Candlish) would have been in his place, so would the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon), and the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan). Those hon. Gentlemen had shown that they were extremely anxious for a division. Well, putting together the silence of the Government and the silence of what he might call the religious section of the party opposite; yes, for there were gentlemen who out-of-doors were quite willing to range themselves under the secular banner, though in the House of Commons it had not yet become popular to express any contempt for religion. But, putting together the silence of the Government, and of what he might call the distinctly religious portion of the Liberal party, and the anxiety of the secular portion of that party for a division, hon. Gentlemen on that (the Opposition) side were perfectly justified in giving their support to the Resolution of the right hon. and learned Member, and taking care that no division should be come to except in a full House.

MR. COLLINS said, that although there had been rather an unseemly spectacle that evening, he was not one of those who complained of party tactics if they could be justified by success; but hon. Gentlemen opposite had fallen into a great mistake, and had not acted with the caution and discretion which usually characterized their proceedings. He met the hon. Member for Shaftesbury (Mr. Glyn) this morning, and when that hon. Gentleman asked when the division would be, he told him about half-past 11. Hon. Members opposite ought to have known very well that there was no chance of their obtaining a snap division on this important question, and it would, therefore, have been more in accordance with the proceedings of the House to have endeavoured in some shape to reply to the arguments brought forward on that side of the House. English Members had a right in looking at the Bill to compare it with the measure of 1870, and to see how far, being a worse Bill, it might be made a precedent for England on a future occasion. They had a right to inquire also whether it was in the interest of the friends of religious education—that was of those who wished that the schoolmaster should combine religious with secular education—or in the interest of the Birmingham party, who wished as far as possible to divorce religious from secular teaching, that the Bill was framed, because the model dogma of that sect was, that it was improper that the schoolmaster, whether paid out of the Consolidated Fund or out of the rates, should be the person to give religious instruction. Now, the English Bill was intended, as far as possible, to supply deficiencies where deficiencies were proved to exist, and it contained this principle—that the new schools and the schools in the hands of voluntary managers should be placed on precisely the same footing; but he did not find that principle in the Scotch Bill. Then, again, in the English Bill, every school was a public elementary school which had these characteristics—the children must pay a certain amount of school-pence, the schools must be open to inspection, and they must have a Time-table Conscience Clause; in fact, the English system was one which permitted the creation from time to time, and the continuance side by side of Roman Catholic schools, Jewish schools, and schools of any particular denomination. But in this Bill, as presented to the House the definition of a public elementary school was quite different, and, moreover, in the 64th clause it was said that there should be no fresh denominational schools, except in those cases where the majority of the children of the district was of the creed of the schools proposed to be established. He protested against such a principle, upon grounds which ought to commend themselves even to members of the Birmingham League; for he maintained it was neither more nor less than establishing a religious census. Suppose a parent in Scotland wished to send his child to a United Presbyterian school, an Established Church school, an Episcopalian or Roman Catholic school, were they going to prevent him? If they did, it would be narrowing the right of the parent. This Bill also narrowed still further the time in which religious instruction might be given, and he objected to the provisions on that subject, because they might be cited at some future time as a precedent for introducing a similar limit in England; and with regard to which it had been shown by the school board elections all over the country, and very recently by the signal defeat of Mr. George Potter in Westminster, that the great mass of the people were in favour of combined religious and secular education, and that the contrary opinion was held by only a small minority. One great defect of the present measure was the omission of the cumulative vote, which in this country had made the school boards reflect truly the opinions of the inhabitants of each district. Indeed, a true reflex of the opinions of the inhabitants of a district was only obtainable by ward elections or by the cumulative vote, which in England had had the effect of making their educational system really national. It was a very significant fact that when last year his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) proposed the repeal of the cumulative vote, he found no supporter except the hon. and learned Member for the City of Oxford (Mr. Harcourt), and dared not press his Motion to a division. That fact showed what a preponderance of opinion was in favour of the cumulative vote, and he could not but regard its omission from this Bill as a retrograde step in legislation, as the result would be that the Roman Catholics, Protestant Dissenters, and the Episcopalians would be gagged. In fact, it was most strikingly shown that the animus of the Bill was in the direction of the opinions of the Birmingham League. With regard to the Amendment of his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Glasgow, he should vote in support of it, because he believed that the majority of the schools in Scotland would be under the control of school boards, and that, in other cases by the establishment of denominational schools, the liberty of the Roman Catholics and Episcopalians would not be infringed.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he wished to say a few words before they went to a division. [Cheers.] He thought at one time that there would be no division; but as hon. Members opposite seemed determined to provoke one, he hoped that they would be allowed to go to a division without further delay. Much had been said about the silence on that side of the House, and it might, therefore, be desirable that he should say a few words respecting the cause of that silence, which was, that a large majority of Scotch Members and of other hon. Gentlemen who took an interest in the subject of education were anxious at the commencement of the discussion, and were still anxious, that the evening should not be altogether lost and wasted. It must also be remembered that Scotland for the last three years had been anxiously looking for an Education Bill—that it had been delayed, into the reasons for which delay he would not now enter—and the Government thought the time had come when the question could be no longer delayed. Undoubtedly there had been silence on his side of the House; but the reason was, that there would otherwise have been either a renewal of a sufficiently full debate on the second reading, or an advocacy of Amendments which would properly be uttered when they were proposed in Committee. The right hon. and learned Gentleman himself (Mr. Gordon) had put an Amendment on the Paper, and hon. Members had repeatedly diverged from the Resolution to proposed Amendments in the Bill which had nothing to do with it; indeed, some remarks which had been made, made it almost impossible to believe that hon. Members opposite could have read the Bill. The education of the hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. G. Bentinck) clearly had not reached that point, or he would not have described it as a purely secular Bill. Criticisms of that kind had almost made him doubt whether he was the same man and was sitting in the same place that he occupied a year or so ago; and more especially so, when he considered the fact that the Bill was based on exactly the same principles as the English Bill. ["No, no!"] There might be differences of detail as to the Conscience Clause, which could be discussed at the proper time; but because religious instruction was to begin or close the day, it did not follow that that was a secular Bill. For his own part, if he supposed it did anything more than the English measure to discourage religious instruction, he would have nothing to do with it; first, because it would be contrary to Scotch even more than to English feeling, and secondly, because it would be wrong. The principle of the Bill was this—that they should not interfere in any way to prevent religious instruction in schools; but that they should not compel such instruction to be given. He trusted he might get credit for having the matter of religious instruction at heart, and he believed it would be a wrong and a sad thing if Parliament discouraged religious teaching; but by no more certain way could they discourage it, than by compelling it to be taught. In fact, it would be as much discouraged thereby, as by the proposal to prohibit it which he had contended against in England. Now, the Resolution ostensibly proposed only to continue what now existed, but what was meant by it was, that instruction in the Holy Scriptures should be binding in every school in Scotland. Was not that what was meant? The Resolution conveyed the impression—the existing law required this; but he met to-day a deputation of earnest Scotch clergymen, who, in answer to his questions, informed him that the present law did not compel religious teaching, and that they believed it would not prevent heritors from making schools entirely secular. The Resolution, in order to be candid, therefore, ought either to prove that the existing law required religious teaching, or admit that the object was to make a fresh law. He was glad to know that it had been the practice to give such teaching, and he feared that if the custom was converted into a law, there would be a danger of losing the practice; for there was a small but active minority, who conscientiously thought that religious instruction should be separated from secular teaching, many of them setting an example to those around them in their endeavours to emplant religion in those with whom they came in contact, and to pass a law compelling those persons to do what there was no doubt they had already done would be the surest way to put an end to the system altogether. The right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gordon) in his Amendment to Clause 50 virtually admitted that the present law did not require that construction, for it contained a Proviso that in all schools instruction in the Scriptures should be given, and the Bill, like the English Act, proposed to give perfect freedom to teach religion, and perfect freedom to parents to withdraw their children from it. It might be regretted that religious differences prevented the imposition of religious teaching by law; but the state both of England and Scotland must be considered, and he was surprised that many hon. Members opposite who supported the principle of the English Act should advocate this Resolution, for did they put themselves into the position of Scotchmen, they would see that what was useful in England would be useful in Scotland, and what was dangerous here would be dangerous there. His hon. Friend (Mr. M'Laren) who had somewhat advocated the Resolution, had stated that the Act of 1861 contained a clause which, while not compelling religious instruction, apparently assumed that it would be given, the schoolmaster having to sign a declaration that he would not interfere with religious instruction. The experience of subscriptions, however, in other quarters, had shown that an obligation not to interfere with religious instruction was not an obligation to support it. It was true that the master engaged to teach nothing contrary—as he hoped he never would—to the Divine authority of the Scriptures, but he also engaged to inculcate nothing opposed to the Shorter Catechism. If, therefore, the law was in the state contended for, it required not only the Bible but the Catechism to be taught, and to continue the existing law would involve the teaching of both. That fact of itself showed the difficulty of forcing religious instruction. Interested as he was in the cause of education, and also in religious education, he had felt himself bound to explain that the Bill was based on the principles laid down in England, and he hoped some little progress would still be made to-night in Committee.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he was glad that his right hon. and learned Friend the Mover of the Resolution, and Scotland, which by its Petitions had displayed its interest in the question, had at last had the honour of some remarks from the right hon. Gentleman opposite the Vice President of the Council. The right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had said early in the evening, that it was not necessary for him to detain the House at any length, because the Resolution being of the nature of an Amendment, the discussion was one that could be taken again when in Committee. If, however, that line of argument was always to be adopted, it would often be easy to avoid discussions on important principles of a measure, in such a full House as was desirable on such occasions. Every hon. Member knew that there was a wide difference between a debate on the principle of a Bill and the discussion of a clause, however important it might be; and although he agreed in the opinion that the Resolution was not intended to stop the progress of the measure, yet it pledged the House, before going into Committee on it, to the adoption of that principle of religious education which was suitable to, and according to the wishes of, Scotland. They had been told often enough on recent occasions by the Prime Minister, that in legislating for a country they should have regard to her special position, failings, and requirements; that it was wrong to act upon English views when dealing with Ireland, or upon Irish feelings when legislating for England. Why, then, should not that rule be observed in the present case? Why should they be told by the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council—whose exertions in the cause of education he would be the last to deprecate—that because certain principles were to be found in the English Education Act, therefore they ought to be introduced into the Scotch one? They should look at the country and the position of the country before coming to a conclusion of that description. The right hon. Gentleman had said much time had been lost that evening. Well, time was lost last year, when the same course of contemptuous silence was taken by the Government and hon. Gentlemen opposite. He (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) thought, however, that that House was a place meant for discussion; and granting that discussions might now and then be raised there which were unpalatable to hon. Members opposite, just as other discussions might be raised by them which were unpalatable to hon. Members on his side of the House, yet it was derogatory to the dignity of the House, when an hon. Member in the position of his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gordon), representing a Scotch University, and representing also the feelings of large portions of the community, moved a Resolution which was treated almost with contempt. If his (Mr. Gathorne Hardy's) Friends were to act in the same manner, it would bring the House to a condition which would be neither creditable to itself nor advantageous to the country; and, at all events, the studied silence with which the Motion had been received made it the duty of hon. Members on this side to take care that the House, which had been invited to this discussion, should be full before any decision was come to upon it. The right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council had alluded to the declaration in the Act of 1861, by which the schoolmaster bound himself not to teach anything opposed to the Holy Scriptures or the doctrines contained in the Shorter Catechism.

Now, the Lord Advocate of that day distinctly stated that the schoolmaster was to teach these doctrines and the Holy Scriptures. That, therefore, was the meaning of the Bill of 1861; and not only that, but it had been the basis of Scotch education since the days of John Knox, in 1567. The declaration went on to say—

“I will faithfully conform thereto in my teaching in the said school, and I will not exercise the functions of my office to the prejudice of the Church of Scotland.”

The right hon. and learned Lord, however, had said there was no legislation calling upon the schoolmaster to teach religion in the school; but did not that clause mean that the schoolmaster was bound to teach it in conformity with the system established in 1567? Again, the right hon. and learned Lord gave the House to understand that there was no means of enforcing such teaching. But Section 13 in the Act of 1861 provided that if any schoolmaster acted in contravention of his declaration, the heritors might present a complaint to the Secretary of State, who might thereupon appoint a Commission to inquire into the said charge; and censure, suspend, or deprive such schoolmaster, their finding being subject to approval by the Secretary of State. There was, therefore, existing legislation which provided for religious teaching in the schools. The right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council said—“If such legislation exists, why re-enact it now?” The answer was, because by a clause in the Bill all the existing Acts were repealed, so that the present continuity of religious teaching would be interrupted. Then, again, the circumstances of England differed from those of Scotland, for when the English Education Bill was proposed, there was not a single public school to deal with, but only voluntary schools; whereas, in Scotland, on the contrary, there were schools which were the inheritance of the nation, which had been the foundation of the greatness of Scotland, and which for 300 years had been conducted on one uniform principle, seeing that since 1567 it had been the practice to teach the Holy Scriptures in the parochial schools of Scotland, and to teach the Scriptures in such a way that, though without a Conscience Clause that religious teaching was conducted without injury to the religion of other people. Therefore, that Bill was introduced under circumstances differing entirely from those under which the English Bill had been brought forward; and it would interfere in Scotland with public schools which were working well, and were also working in conformity with the wishes and feelings of the Scotch people. With all that in view, then, should the system in those schools be given up to the school boards which were to be established, thus furnishing matter for perpetual strife and contention? It should also be remembered that a League had been formed in Scotland in conformity with some abstract theory, and which sought to put an end to a system which had done so much in practice for the education of the Scotch people. Now, persons who acted on abstract theories were the most disagreeable of all people to deal with, and no matter how well a system worked, if it did not coincide with their theories they condemned it utterly. Some had even hoped to make martyrs of themselves upon this question, in the hope of awakening sympathetic enthusiasm at public meetings; and they purchased that cheap martyrdom at the expense of introducing dissension into peaceful parishes; but he (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) would warn them against introducing trouble and disturbance, where without them none would have existed. All the Government was asked to do was to leave the existing system alone, and not to force a Bill upon the Scotch people which, while it professed to be harmless, was evidently designed to make secular instruction the rule. The present rule was that no school should receive a Parliamentary grant unless it was in connection with some religious body, or unless the Scriptures were read in it; so that this Bill would not only interfere with the parochial school, but with every other school participating in the grant. He was told that the teachers were to be forbidden to teach religion; how, then, was it to be taught? Even the Non-conformist Bodies in England had training colleges for the purpose of instructing their teachers in religious knowledge, with a view to their imparting that knowledge to their pupils. In conclusion, he thought the Resolution expressed the opinion entertained by the people of Scotland. He judged so from the Petitions which had been laid on the

Table of the House; for even if he looked at the Petitions in favour of the Bill, he found they were against the Bill in many important points. Not only that, but he found at public meetings held in different parts of Scotland, men differing strongly on points of ecclesiastical government had united in one thing, and that was opposition to a particular portion of the Bill, in fact, the very part of the Bill against which he had spoken. Inasmuch, then, as it was desirable that the House should lay down the principle which was most satisfactory, and, in his opinion, equally suitable to the people of Scotland, he should support most cordially the Motion of his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Glasgow.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER said, that hon. Members on his side of the House had been taunted with keeping silence, and therefore before going to a division he wished to say a word or two on the subject. He wished to warn hon. Members that the obvious effect of the Motion from the opposite side of the House would be to prevent the Bill being proceeded with. ["No, no!"] Why, it was impossible to say this was not a party proceeding, for the Motion came as an Amendment to the Motion "that Mr. Speaker leave the Chair," and if it were carried, Mr. Speaker would not leave the Chair, and there would be an end of the Bill. It was obvious that result was desired, and he must congratulate the hon. Member for Rutland (Mr. Noel), who had been all the evening employing those winning ways which made him deservedly popular on both sides of the House, to induce hon. Members to continue the debate until the Opposition was fortified to its full strength and in readiness for a division on the success which had attended his endeavours. What else could have been the reason for English Members continuing the debate when Scotch Members were anxious to go into Committee and proceed to business? Why, it was plain that every device was to be used to delay the Bill, and he must say that anyone approving of the Resolution did their best to hinder it, and were thereby incurring a heavy responsibility; neither could they be true friends of Scotland who pursued that course. It was said that the Bill would prevent the teaching of religion in schools; but all that the 13th clause did was to prevent a teacher teaching anything but doctrine accepted by the Scotch people. In fact, there was no statutory obligations upon anyone in the Scotch schools to teach religion; it was the custom to do so in every school because the people desired it; as long as they desired it they would have it, and, if they ever ceased to desire it, no Acts of Parliament would make them continue a system of religious teaching they objected to. The hon. and learned Member for Boston (Mr. Collins) made a shrewd remark when he said the Bill allowed school boards to teach creeds and as much religion, in fact, as they liked; whereas other hon. Gentlemen opposite denounced the measure as being purely secular. Although thinking of the old adage—"Who should decide, when doctors disagree?" yet he agreed with that observation of the hon. and learned Member and hoped to see Amendments introduced into the Bill to confine within certain limits that power of the school boards. The course of action, however, taken by the Government was to put confidence in the people of Scotland, and to say that the people of Scotland knew what they wanted, and should have it.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, there was a passage in the Interpretation Clause of the Bill which threw light upon a good deal that had taken place in the course of that debate. He found it there stated that—

"The Scotch Education Department shall mean the Lords or any Committee of Privy Council who shall have been appointed by Her Majesty."

And in another section—

"Her Majesty's Inspectors shall mean the Inspectors of Schools appointed by Her Majesty on the recommendation of the Scotch Education Department, &c. &c."

He had not long since been in Scotland and was kindly received there, and he found that a principal feature of the Bill—the introduction of the authority of the Privy Council to be that which in the minds of the people of Scotland constituted a principal objection to the scheme. The right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council spoke of the compulsion to be exercised under the Bill—exercised by the Privy Council for the purpose of enforcing secular education; and his whole argument went upon the danger of enforcing religious education by the same authority. It was to that compulsion, then, that the people of Scotland objected. Their schools had hitherto been regulated by law, not by the arbitrary authority of a Governmental Department. They objected to that arbitrary authority, and that constituted one main ground of their objection to the Bill—for it did not exclude, it involved the question of religious education. Under the present state of things the people of Scotland were content to have religious education enforced by law, but they objected to religious education being enforced by the authority of a Department. That was one real objection of the people of Scotland. And had they not good reason to fear for their Scriptural education? The right hon. Gentleman adverted to what happened during the passage through that House of the English Elementary Education Act in 1870. He (Mr. Newdegate) was present on that occasion, and he well remembered two of the divisions, which then took place, and he would read to the House that which would at once explain the suspicions of the people of Scotland, and which would show that those suspicions were well founded. On the 30th of June, 1870, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) moved—"That the Holy Scriptures shall form part of the daily reading and teaching in those schools"—the elementary schools of England; but the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council opposed that Amendment. There was a division—Ayes 81; Noes 250; Majority 169. The people of Scotland were not so stupid as not to know that on that occasion that House, in passing the Elementary Education Bill for that country, emphatically rejected Scriptural education as a portion of that measure. Again, on the 19th of July, 1870, it was moved by the noble Lord the Member for West Suffolk (Lord Augustus Hervey)—"That no schools in which the Holy Scriptures are not daily used shall be entitled to receive any Parliamentary Grant." When the House divided there appeared—for the Resolution, Ayes, 89; Noes, 205; Majority against it, 116. Twice, then, in passing the Elementary Education Act for England, that House was misled into rejecting Scriptural education; and then the right hon. Gentleman got up, and, by way of consoling the people of Scotland, assured them that the Bill now before the House was framed upon the same principle as the Elementary Education Act for England. Why, the people of Scotland were not so ignorant as not to understand that that assurance of the right hon. Gentleman meant that they might be well assured that Scriptural education would be rejected as an essential portion of the Bill which was in their hands. Let anybody read the Bill, and he would see that it was framed on the principle of treating religion as an accident in education; as leaving such scope for it as the Department of the Privy Council for Scotch Education might assign; but it broke up the great principle established by John Knox, that Scriptural education should be the pervading principle of education in Scotland—the great principle for which the Scotch people had ever contended, and for which they were contending now. He feared the Scotch Members who sat opposite, were so much better Ministerialists than Members for Scotland, that they would vote against the Resolution now before the House, because the Resolution distinctly affirmed the preservation of Scriptural education, the leading principle of Scotch education as it had existed for hundreds of years. It was because the Scotch people saw in the Bill the introduction of a departmental coercion, which was to be exercised for the breaking up of the all-pervading principle of their educational system—that Scriptural education which had existed for so long a period and so greatly for the advantage of Scotland—that they agreed with the right hon. and learned Gentleman who had proposed the Resolution. He feared that they were likely to be misrepresented by too many of the hon. Members whom they had returned to that House.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that the hon. Baronet the Member for Fife-shire (Sir Robert Anstruther), breaking the long silence which had prevailed on the other side of the House, came forward at the last moment to inform them as to what would be the result of carrying the Amendment of his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gordon). He ventured, however, to state that the information which the hon. Baronet had given them was entirely erroneous, and if acted upon would lead the House into a very grave misconception. The hon.

Mr. Newdegate

Baronet told them that if the Amendment were adopted it would be fatal to the further progress of that measure. Now, he would assert—and he appealed to Mr. Speaker whether he was not correct in asserting—that if the House acceded, as he trusted it would do, to the Amendment of his right hon. and learned Friend, it would be perfectly competent for the Government to proceed with the Bill on the very first day they chose to bring it forward; and that the Amendment would be found to be in strict accordance not only with the main principles of the measure as sustained by the Government, but with the recognized forms and practice of the House.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 209; Noes 216: Majority 7.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That, having regard to the principles and history of the past educational legislation and practice of Scotland, which provided for instruction in the Holy Scriptures in the public schools as an essential part of education, this House, while desirous of passing a measure during the present Session for the improvement of education in Scotland, is of opinion that the Law and practice of Scotland in this respect should be continued by provisions in the Bill now before the House.

Committee on the Bill upon Monday next.

IRISH CHURCH ACT AMENDMENT

BILL—[Lords]—[Bill 87.]

(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he would repeat the proposal he made earlier in the evening, that the measure should be limited to its original purpose, the constitution of a Court of Appeal and the abolition of the third Commissioner, on the understanding that the proposals made by him at the instance of the Commissioners and by other hon. Members for the amendment of the general provisions of the Act should be dealt with by a second Bill. He promised to introduce the second Bill as early as possible, and to do all in his power to pass it this Session, but he could not undertake that the Government would be able to effect it.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee upon the said Bill."

DR. BALL said, he wished to direct attention to the great importance of the Amendments relating to legislation for a reduction of the tithe rent-charge, which amounted to £360,000 a-year. The amount of a 22½ years' purchase was an unjust price. By the Irish Church Act, a distinction was drawn between lay tithe rent-charge and ecclesiastical tithe rent-charge, and by the declaration of the Legislature, that it would not interfere with the former tithe rent-charge, that was made an immeasurably better property than it had been before. Yet, at the present time, lay tithe rent-charge in the market only brought 20 years' purchase. Why did not this tithe rent-charge bring a higher price? It was not an intelligible property at all, because it was liable to great subdivision; and if there were no purchasers it would become much reduced in value. He wanted the Government to consider whether the whole question of tithe rent-charge would not become abortive, if a change were not made? He asked the Government to consider the subject, with the view of applying a remedy. With regard to the other minor Amendments, which were only intended to meet cases of hardships to individuals, he believed there would be no difference of opinion between the Government and any hon. Gentleman on that side of the House, and he would leave them to the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland and the Government.

MR. CHARLEY said, that under the Irish Church Act three Commissioners were appointed, and the Act expressly provided that if a vacancy occurred another should be selected. The understanding also was that the proportion between the friendly and hostile Commissioners should be kept up. Mr. Hamilton was dead, and he was the only one in whom Irish Churchmen could place confidence, for Lord Monck took an active share in disestablishing and disendowing the Irish Church, and Judge Lawson advised the Government on the subject. As the Bill stood, it involved a breach of faith, for it proposed to abolish the office of third Commissioner. The Bill also, did not provide that the person appointed to hear appeals under it, should, like the third Commissioner under the Irish Church Act, be a member of the Irish Church or of the Church of England. The Government might appoint a Roman Catholic under this Bill and a pledge ought to be given that a gentleman would be appointed who was an Irish Churchman or a member of the Church of England.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he did not question for a moment the right of hon. Gentlemen to call attention to any matter relating to the tithe rent-charge in Ireland, but he did object to it being discussed upon a Bill which had no reference to it. It had been already stated by his noble Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland that a Bill was about to be introduced in which the whole question relating to tithe rent-charge could be discussed, and upon which the Government could state what course it considered it its duty to pursue. The point they had, however, at the present time to consider with respect to the Bill then before them was that which was immediately connected with the Commission, and that would, he hoped, answer the objection of the hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Charley). By the Irish Church Act three Commissioners were to be appointed; but as business proceeded, and as the more difficult matters were disposed of, it happened that the Government were deprived of the services of one who was deeply lamented—namely, Mr. Hamilton. That being so, it was their duty to consult the Commissioners on the business of the Commission, and they reported that there was not sufficient business to employ a third standing Commissioner. Therefore, the Government had felt it was not their duty to appoint a third standing Commissioner at an expense of £3,000 a-year, to be charged on the fund. They had been charged with a breach of faith by the hon. and learned Member; but he (Mr. Gladstone) thought that the manner in which the Government had acted was not a breach of faith. There was a necessity, however, to have a third Commissioner, for the purpose of sitting on appeals; and the present Bill proposed that there should be a third one, not permanent, but what he might call an occasional third Commissioner. In consequence of the business of the Commission having reached such an advanced stage, it was not thought desirable to impose a religious limitation on the holding of that office; but that was a question which could be considered when the Bill was in Committee.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he was of opinion there ought to be a third Commissioner, and would like to know when the Government intended to redeem their pledge to place the Irish Church in a position of equality with the Roman Catholic Church with respect to the holding of land in mortmain?

VISCOUNT CRICHTON wished to be informed if Government meant to accept the Instructions on the Paper?

MR. BAGWELL thought the question of the appointment of a third Commissioner was a matter which might be safely left in the hands of the Government, who, he hoped, would soon introduce a Bill to dispose of tithe rent-charges.

MR. BRUEN said, he could not see the necessity for withdrawing the discussion of the question at the present time. If the Amendments were withdrawn, he should like to know from his noble Friend, whether those hon. Members who had given Notice of "Instructions" would be in as good a position as they now occupied.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Dowse) said, there were eight of those "Instructions," reckoning that of the Government, and they were so varied that it would take a long time to discuss them all. The only Notice that met the Bill was that of the hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Charley), who proposed to go into Committee that day six months; but the hon. and learned Member was present at the second reading, and did not challenge the Bill at that stage. It had been shown that there was no necessity for a permanent third Commissioner; and, financial matters having been disposed of to a large extent, there remained only questions of law such as might be disposed of with the aid of an occasional third Commissioner. The proper course would be to have this Bill stripped of all the Instructions and Amendments of which Notice had been given, and to pass the Bill as rapidly as possible. The tithe rent-charge would be dealt with by the Government in a separate Bill, embracing as many of the Amendments given Notice of as the Government, on consideration, could adopt. With respect to the law of mortmain, the present state of the law did not press upon the Irish Church in any invidious way, for a charter was settled last year giving that Church power to acquire and hold land, notwithstanding the mortmain statutes, within certain proper limits.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE hoped that a distinct assurance would be given by the Government that the third Commissioner should be a member of the Irish Church.

MR. SYNAN thought the course proposed by the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland a very reasonable one.

MR. ORMSBY GORE hoped the Government would give some more distinct pledge on the subjects embraced in the Instructions and Amendments on the Paper before they were withdrawn.

MR. KAVANAGH said, he fully coincided with the remark of his hon. Friend (Mr. Ormsby Gore).

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that by the course proposed by the Government, those hon. Members who had given Notice of Amendments would not be placed in a worse position. He would renew the assurance that Government would consider all the questions raised by the Amendments, and as soon as possible introduce a measure to give effect to such of the proposals as they could adopt, doing their utmost to press it through Parliament that Session.

PRISON MINISTERS BILL—(Nos. 72, 91).
(The Duke of Clarendon.)

REPORT OF AMENDMENTS.

Amendments reported (according to Order).

Further Amendments made.

Clause 3 (Order of Secretary of State for appointment of ministers under 26 & 27 Vict. c. 79).

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND moved to insert, line 22, after ("notice")—

"It shall also be lawful for the prison authority, with the consent of the Secretary of State, to revoke such appointment when the number of prisoners of that persuasion shall have for a space of twelve months fallen short of the daily average of twenty."

Motion agreed to.

On the Motion of Lord ORANMORE AND BROWNE the word "daily" was inserted before "average number"—and the words "at one time" struck out.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, that as the clause now stood it was provided that no order be made requiring the appointment of a minister of any church or religious persuasion to attend at any prison if the average number of prisoners belonging to that church or persuasion confined at one time in such prison during the three years immediately preceding the date of such order has been less than 10. He proposed an Amendment raising the average number to 20.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND said, that since the noble Duke had placed his Amendment on the Paper he had made inquiries and found the fact of requiring an average of 10 prisoners, as the Bill now required, would exclude 27 gaols from the operation of the Bill; and if the average were raised to 20, no fewer than 14 gaols in addition to those 27 would be excluded. He could not consent to this. He should prefer a revision of the salaries inserted in the Schedule.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he did not at all desire that his Amendment should have the effect pointed out by the noble Duke. He should, therefore, withdraw the Amendment, and leave the average at 10.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE adhered to his view that it was unreasonable to appoint a minister for so small a number as 10 prisoners. There could be no difficulty in removing them to another gaol when there were a larger number. He also believed that by appointing ministers for each denomination, when there were 10 prisoners, the charge would be very large; for in half the prisons in Great Britain there were five denominations having above 10 prisoners, and though Non-conformist clergymen had not claimed the position of chaplains heretofore, yet he believed the only cause of their not having done so was because they did not wish to create a precedent in favour of the appointment of Roman Catholic priests; but that if this law passed, making such appointment obligatory, these other clergymen would certainly put in their claims. He therefore thought that no chaplain should be appointed where there were less than 30 prisoners.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Clause 4 (Status of ministers appointed under Act, and provision for ministrations).

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE moved an Amendment limiting the power of the Secretary of State to "order an expenditure exceeding £50 (not including salary of clergyman) for the purposes of this Act." If some limit were not put on expenditure for this purpose it might amount to perhaps £200, though no such sum ought to be absolutely necessary. Anyone who had read the evidence given by Roman Catholic priests before the Committee must know that he was not exaggerating when he said that one of those reverend gentlemen might make a requisition for so large a sum as he had named: under the pressure of political exigencies a Home Secretary of either of the great parties in the State might yield to such a requisition, and this was what he wanted to guard against by the Amendment he now submitted to their Lordships.

LORD DYNEVOR said, that a large sum—£50 or £60, perhaps—might be asked by a Roman Catholic priest for vestments.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND entertained no such apprehensions as those which had been expressed by the two noble Lords. An expenditure of £50 or £60 for vestments would be quite out of the question if they were intended to be used in a prison and were to be paid for out of the rates. If a priest wished for such expensive vestments his general congregation outside the walls must supply them. He thought the matter might fairly be left with the Home Secretary.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE appealed to the noble Lords present, whether the sum he stated was not a very moderate estimate for vestments, &c.?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND was not for any undue charge on the ratepayers; but he would prefer to leave the clause as it was, and place his confidence in the common sense of the Secretary of the State rather than insert such a limitation as that proposed by the noble Lord (Lord Oranmore and Browne).

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE said, that seeing the feeling of the House, he would not divide on the Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

Schedule—Scale of Salary—

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, the Schedule at present proposed the following scale of minimum salaries:—10 prisoners and less than 20, £25; 20 to 100, £50; 100 to 200, £100; 200 to 300, £150; more than 300, £200. He proposed to reduce the scale to £20, £40, £60, £100, and £150 for each respective class.

Amendment made.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND said, he had no objection to the proposed reduction of the scale.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE said, he had intended to propose a scale in accordance with the capitation grant paid to Roman Catholic chaplains in the Army; but, as the scale now proposed on one side was accepted on the other, he would not press his Amendment.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND remarked that there was the greatest diversity in the salaries paid to gaol chaplains in England; some were paid generously, and others received salaries that were far too low. The scale now proposed would, at all events, give a status to Roman Catholic chaplains, make them officers of prisons, and put them to a certain extent on an equality with the Protestant chaplains, which was the main object of the Bill.

Schedule, as amended, agreed to.

Bill to be read 3^a on Friday next, and to be printed as amended (No. 99).

PARTY PROCESSIONS (IRELAND) ACT REPEAL BILL—(No. 87.)

(The Earl of Dufferin.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF DUFFERIN, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he never addressed the House with greater pleasure than he did on the present occasion, when he asked their Lordships to consent to the repeal of this Act. For a long time past he had entertained a strong conviction that the effect of this Act remaining on the Statute Book was very different from the effect it was intended to have had by its promoters. Instead of imposing equal restrictions upon all party demonstrations in Ireland, and operating impartially against all sections of the community, it had, through circumstances peculiar to the country and over which the Government had no control, only reached one party, and had consequently come to be regarded as one-sided, vexatious, and unjust. It had, therefore, lost one essential characteristic which Acts of this kind should possess. It would readily be understood that when an Act which was passed for the express purpose of preventing party processions only restrained one party and permitted another party to indulge in those very excesses from which the rival faction was debarred, instead of mitigating hostility and controlling animosity it was regarded as affording a triumph to one side and imposing unjust disabilities on the other. He did not propose to trouble their Lordships with any account of the circumstances under which this Bill was originally passed; nor need he describe those demonstrations to which it immediately pointed—unhappily, their Lordships were only too well acquainted with the sinister history of party demonstrations in Ireland—it was sufficient to state that, with no inconsiderable experience, and with only too accurate a sense of the difficulties with which they had to contend, Her Majesty's present Executive in Ireland had come to the conclusion that the common law provided powers amply sufficient to prevent a breach of the peace. More than once they had had occasion to take precautions against contingencies arising out of these demonstrations, and on every one of those occasions they had found the powers conferred upon them by the common law sufficient for their purpose. Not only had they found they never had any occasion to resort to the powers conferred upon them by this Act, but they also had occasion to observe that this Act itself was regarded with the greatest disfavour by a considerable portion of Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland. These persons complained—and he thought with justice—that whereas in the South of Ireland party processions, banners, colours, and tunes were paraded with perfect impunity, sometimes not without leading to sinister consequences, in the North similar demonstrations were pronounced by law to be illegal, and those who had taken part in them had been subjected, under previous Administrations, to fine and imprisonment. God forbid that he should appear as the advocate or apologist of any unnecessary act which could in the slightest degree offend or wound either the reasonable or the unreasonable susceptibilities of any class of his fellow-countrymen; whenever such performances had occurred he had always been the first to deprecate and to condemn them. At the same time, it must be remembered that there were districts of the country where the unity of religion and political sentiment was so complete that these demonstrations incurred no risk whatever of interruption or of giving offence to those who did not take part in them. In those districts they were simply regarded as for holiday occasions, and women and children frequently took part in them. Of course, there were other districts the circumstances of which were very different: yet even in those districts it must be remembered that, in the original conception of those demonstrations, no slight whatever was intended either to the religious or political sympathies of those who were opposed to them. So far was this from being the case, that he believed originally, even in Derry, both Roman Catholics and Protestants took equal pride in commemorating the Siege of Derry; and he was not afraid to confess that, to anyone to whom the records of Irish bravery and courage were dear, the reminiscences afforded both by the defence of Derry and the defence of Limerick were equally subjects of justifiable pride. Unfortunately, however, since the Roman Catholic population of Derry had increased, the demonstrations there had assumed a very different aspect, and they had come to be regarded with unmistakable hostility by a great proportion, if not by a majority, of the inhabitants of the neighbourhood. As a consequence, it had been necessary to take extraordinary precautions against a breach of the peace. Of course, it would always be the duty of the Government to maintain peace and prevent bloodshed, and to continue to take the same precautions in the future that they had taken in the past. With the powers granted under this Bill the Government were of opinion that they would be in a better condition than ever to exercise these essential functions, and to prevent conflicts and stop the effusion of blood. It was his misfortune to have found himself on one occasion in the midst of the carnage arising out of one of these feuds, where he had seen a greater number of dead and wounded persons taken from the field than had often fallen on board the leading line-of-battle-ships, in one of England's bloodiest naval victories. In any event, feuds and broils of this kind did not need to be fomented by the provisions of an Act of Parliament which was distasteful both to those in whose favour it was passed, and to those against whom it operated. But, while pressing their Lordships to agree to the repeal of this Act, he could not help also addressing an appeal to his fellow-countrymen in Ireland, beseeching them in taking advantage of the privileges Parliament was thus willing to restore to them, to do so with forbearance and caution; to forbear from exercising them in those districts where they were likely to give offence or likely to lead to breaches of the peace, and to show a generous and magnanimous consideration for the reasonable, or even unreasonable, prejudices and susceptibilities of the rest of their fellow-countrymen.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Earl of Dufferin.)

LORD CAIRNS joined with his noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Dufferin) in expressing the very great pleasure it had given him to find that it was thought possible to propose to Parliament the repeal of this Act. It was his fate, when he had the honour of a seat in the House of Commons, very often to urge on the Government of the day the repeal of that statute; and he felt the Government now took a wise course in proposing its repeal. The details of the statute and the cognate Act subsequently passed were so petty, the annoyances under it were so continuous and so minute, that it often appeared to him vain to expect that any people professing to be free would long submit to them. Another reason why he thought the statute had been productive of evil consequences, however excellent the intentions of those who proposed it, was this—he believed it to be utterly impossible for any Government, he would not say to execute its provisions impartially, but to avoid the suspicion of executing them with partiality. He believed that every Government, of whatever party, was always in a position of suspicion. Those who considered themselves in Opposition were always watching with the keenest and most scrupulous eyes to discover some case in which they thought the Government had failed to enforce the Act against their opponents. That had been the uniform position of the Irish Government under these Acts. He thought there was another very serious objection to the provisions of such statutes. He was afraid it was part of our human nature which must be dealt with that if you subjected people to petty curtailments of what they naturally consider their privileges, many would take a kind of pleasure and delight in trying to balk and violate the law which they thought improperly fettered and restrained their free action. That was eminently the case with these statutes. He believed that even women and children took a pleasure in displaying banners, guns, and pikes, and marched in procession simply to show their contempt for the law. He cordially joined in the appeal of his noble Friend to their fellow-countrymen in Ireland that they would show their good sense by abstaining from these processions; and he believed the most effectual way of inducing them to do so was to leave the people free and unfettered in matters so minute and trifling in themselves. He rejoiced the repeal of these statutes had been proposed, and he hoped the Government would find that, in place of the Executive being weakened in Ireland, the common law would be found sufficient.

THE EARL OF ENNISKILLEN was understood to express his approval of the measure.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE approved the repeal of the Act, for the actual result of the action of the Government under it had been the permission of Fenian meetings, while Protestant meetings in the North had been interfered with. It was, therefore, desirable that the Processions Act should be repealed.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that in view of the happy unanimity that prevailed on both sides of the House as to the wisdom of repealing this Act, it was not his intention to have addressed their Lordships on the subject; but he could not allow the statement of the noble Lord who had just spoken to go forth uncontradicted. He emphatically denied the noble Lord's statement. No Government—and certainly not the present one—had ever permitted a Fenian meeting. Undoubtedly there had been meetings held by what were called the Green Party in Ireland, and these could not, according to the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, be touched by the Party Processions Act. Hence had arisen an appearance of partiality which was much to be deplored. That was one reason why these Acts ought to be repealed.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE explained. He might instance two meetings, one held on the occasion of the funeral of a Fenian, and the other in Dublin, on the raising of a statue to Mr. Smith O'Brien, a convicted rebel.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

PACIFIC ISLANDERS PROTECTION

BILL—(No. 90.)

(The Earl of Kimberley.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that having been unfortunately absent from illness on the occasion of the second reading, he would beg permission to make a few observations now. He quite approved of the principle of the Bill; but he thought there had been great exaggeration in the stories of the kidnapping and treatment of the natives of the South Pacific. He thought there was a great distinction to be drawn between the natives of some of the islands—such as the Fijis and others, where, from the powerlessness of the Government, abuses very probably took place—and the natives of the Pacific Islands who were removed to Queensland. He was informed by persons of property and authority that in regard to the latter, in the great majority of cases, they went there of their own accord; that they were free to return after having served for the time stipulated in their indentures; and that during their stay they were much morally benefited, and, in some degree, civilized. At the same time, it might, no doubt, be desirable that the arrangements of the service should be supervised by the English Government, in order to make sure that it was carried on in a proper manner. He understood that the main difficulty with regard to these islanders was their feebleness of constitution, so that they readily succumbed to any attack of disease. On one other point, he desired to say a word. In the debate that took place upon the second reading of the Bill reference was made to the murder of Bishop Patteson, and the noble Earl the Secretary for the Colonies was understood to have expressed himself in terms condemnatory of the proceedings that had since taken place. Now, all the facts attending the attack upon the ship were not yet known; but he believed that when the captain of the English vessel had proceeded to the island for the purpose of inquiry into the murder of the Bishop, he was fired at, and one of the crew was either killed or wounded, and therefore the captain assumed the aggressive. It certainly was not clear to him that the captain was wrong in so doing. It was at least a remarkable fact that many years before any question arose as to this illicit deportation of South Sea Islanders, one of the attendants of Bishop Patteson was murdered by the natives of this very island, in the self-same spot and under the eyes of the Bishop. It was anyhow clear from this that these natives were, apart from any sense of wrong done to them for the kidnapping of their own people, a barbarous and savage race. In the same discussion a right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Lichfield) expressed an opinion that no retribution should be exacted for the murder of Bishop Patteson, but that it should be left to God to punish the offence, and that that would have been the feeling of Bishop Patteson. Such a sentiment might be very becoming in the mouth of a Christian Bishop; but the judgment by which the action of the State should be guided was very different, and he should be extremely sorry to see it accepted without some protest from that House. No one could entertain a higher opinion than himself of the late Bishop Patteson, who, he believed, fell a martyr in the cause of Christianity; but murder required punishment, and he did not think it well that in such a case the State should do nothing, but leave the matter to the vengeance of God.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) had referred to a great number of subjects, into which he (the Earl of Kimberley) hoped the House would not expect him to follow, inasmuch as they really had no particular connection with the subject before their Lordships. The Commission on the subject of Coolie labourers in British Guiana had carried on inquiries at the expense of its colony. It did not seem to him unreasonable that the colonies should bear the expense of such inquiries. Perhaps, in the case of Queensland, there might have been an apprehension that the inquiry would extend to matters which did not directly concern that colony; and on that ground objection was raised to the whole of the expense falling on the colony. It was said that the Imperial Government ought to have been more active in endeavouring to check this traffic. But to do so would be impossible without sending out such a fleet of cruisers as their Lordships probably never contemplated. These islands extended over thousands of miles of sea, and were hundreds — probably thousands — in number; and it would be quite impossible to keep an efficient police over such a network of islands, reefs, creeks, and harbours. The Government had, however, been endeavouring to do their best to meet the difficulties, and he hoped that with regard to some of these islands a tolerably good watch would be kept up. It had been resolved to reinforce the Australian Squadron, and to give instructions that steamers should visit the islands from time to time in order to prevent abuses. The best mode of preventing the evils which existed would, however, be found in making effective regulations with regard to these islanders when they arrived at their destination. He was, he might add, unable to agree to one suggestion which had been made, to the effect that those immigrants who might not have thoroughly comprehended the contract into which they had entered should be entitled to have that contract made void, and to be taken back to the place whence they came. There were two or three objections to the adoption of such a course. Who was to provide the funds for this purpose? If the immigrants were landed in Queensland, it was not a subject for Imperial but colonial legislation.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. Speaker informed the House, that he had received from Chief Justice Monahan, one of the Judges selected, pursuant to the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, for the trial of Elections Petitions, Reports relating to the Election for the County of Kerry.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.
TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA).
THE INDIRECT CLAIMS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the attention of hon. Members may probably have been called to an announcement made by my noble Friend the Foreign Secretary on behalf of Her Majesty's Government in the House of Lords yesterday; and, although it had no distinct reference to the House of Commons, I think hon. Members would like to know that the same intention which Lord Granville expressed in regard to the House of Lords holds good with reference to this House also: that is to say, that at the earliest moment—it may be before Monday, I hope—we will put Parliament in possession of the state of the negotiations with America. We certainly shall feel it our duty, before the House separates for the Recess, either to lay Papers before it, or to make a statement, as may seem most conducive to the public interests, so as to enable the House to judge how far we have been acting in accordance with the views generally entertained in the country. We feel very deeply grateful for, as well as conscious of, the extraordinary forbearance by Parliament and by the whole country upon this matter. We are grateful for it as a mark of the confidence reposed in us, not as a particular Government, but as the Government, which is charged with very great and important public interests. I trust it will be found that we have acted in a spirit which will testify that the expression of our gratitude is not a mere empty declaration, but that we have been actuated by a spirit which will meet the approval of the country generally.

INDIA—KOOKA INSURRECTION.

QUESTION.

MR. KINNAIRD asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House the papers relating to the late Kooka Insurrection in India; and, if he has any objection to state to the House the grounds of Mr. Cowan's dismissal from the Civil Service of India, and of Mr. Forsyth's removal to another Province?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, I will lay the Kooka Papers on the Table after they are complete. Mr. Cowan has, I presume, been dismissed, and Mr. Forsyth removed, for their conduct in the Kooka affair; but the despatches explaining the decision of the Government of India have not reached us, and cannot reach us for some time, the telegraph anticipating the mail by nearly a month.

TICHBORNE v. LUSHINGTON—PROSECUTION OF THE "CLAIMANT" FOR PERJURY.—QUESTION.

MR. ONSLOW asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he will state to the House the reason why the Government intend to use the public money for the purpose of prosecuting the Claimant to the Tichborne Estates; and why, in the case of Overend and Gurney, they refused to prosecute on the ground of its being a private matter?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Mr. Speaker, I will answer the last part of the Question of the hon. Gentleman first, for a reason that will appear presently. It appears that the First Lord of the Treasury and the Attorney General, in 1869, in defending the conduct of the Government with regard to the refusal to prosecute the partners in the firm of Messrs. Overend, Gurney, and Co., applied three tests to that conduct, which were as follows:—Firstly, was there likely to be a conviction; secondly, what was the moral turpitude of the offences charged; and, thirdly, was it likely that, if the Government did not prosecute, private persons would come forward to do so? They argued that the partners in the firm of Messrs. Overend, Gurney, and Co. had not been guilty of any great degree of moral turpitude; that the offences of which they had been guilty were, unhappily, very common in the commercial world—the difference being that in this case these practices—which, of course, no one can defend—had been productive of very widespread ruin. They argued also that these were offences on the confines of civil and criminal law, where private and public crime were hardly distinguishable from each other, and that it was scarcely likely under the circumstances that a conviction would be obtained, and that if they did not prosecute there were plenty of persons possessed of sufficient means to institute a prosecution of their own. Their expectations were justified, for a prosecution by private persons followed, and no conviction ensued. I propose to answer the Question of the hon. Gentleman with reference to the prosecution of the Tichborne Claimant, keeping these three principles or tests in view. Before doing so, however, I will state one thing which distinguishes this case from that of Messrs. Overend, Gurney, and Co., and from most other public prosecutions—namely, that the prosecution was directed under the authority of an Act of Parliament by the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, who tried the cause out of which the prosecution has arisen, and bound over the witnesses to prosecute. It is, therefore, very different from the Government saying that they would commence the prosecution themselves. To have taken any other course would be tantamount to refusing the assistance of the public funds to a decision solemnly arrived at by one of our highest legal authorities. I might, if I pleased, stop here; but there are further considerations. It appears to me that the case so far satisfies the first test completely, and that there is probable and reasonable ground to expect a conviction, because the claimant was himself the principal witness in the case, and the jury by the way in which they stopped it implied that they did not believe a particular statement to which he had sworn —namely, his evidence with regard to the tattooing. Their decision, therefore, had something of the effect of a finding of the grand jury. Then, if we come to the question of moral guilt, supposing this person to be guilty, it is hardly possible to conceive a case of higher moral turpitude. If he is guilty, he is guilty not of mere misrepresentation, like that charged against the Overend and Gurney Directors, but of wilful and corrupt perjury on the most gigantic scale, committed, too, for the purpose of depriving an infant of his inheritance. He is guilty also, if he should be found guilty of the offence he is charged with, of endeavouring to ruin by false swearing the honour and character of a most respectable lady. And, lastly, he has, in the prosecution of his guilty ends, if so be that he is guilty, produced an amount of inconvenience and disturbance to the public service which is without parallel. There can, therefore, I think be no doubt that, considering the magnitude of the offence charged, the Government were perfectly justified in coming forward to prosecute. I can assure the hon. Member that I am not at all anxious to embark the public money in any improper ventures; but the course that has been pursued has my hearty assent. I think, too, that, if we did not prosecute, the very complexity of the claimant's machinations, supposing him to be guilty, would turn out to be his best defence, because the enormous expense that they have caused have probably placed it out of the power or out of the will of the family to bring him to justice. The issue must in some shape turn upon the identity of this person, and it must necessarily involve heavy expenditure. It can, therefore, hardly be expected that the family, who have already suffered so much, should come forward and incur this additional expenditure merely for the sake of public justice. These are the reasons why we have determined that assistance should be given from the public funds to this prosecution, and I hope it will be understood that, as far as the course adopted by the Attorney General is concerned, it has my entire concurrence.

MR. HERMON: In consequence of the statement by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that "these offences are unhappily very common in the commercial world," I give Notice that on a future day I will ask him for the names of those firms which have been guilty of commercial dishonesty to which he made allusion.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I stated to the hon. Gentleman what was the purport of the arguments advanced by the Government in 1869, and I stated also that I was not giving my own opinions. If he will refer to the speeches made by the Law Officer he will find the words I quoted; and I entirely decline, because I repeated those words, to be drawn into any controversy respecting their employment.

An hon. MEMBER: Whom did the right hon. Gentleman quote?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The Attorney General of that day, Sir Robert Collier.

ARMY-COMMISSIONS—EXAMINATIONS. QUESTION.

COLONEL BRISE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether candidates for Commissions in the Army, whose names were on the list previous to the Royal Warrant of July last, but who had not passed any examinations, will have any precedence over those candidates whose names may be sent in at any time previous to the competitive examinations; and, if there is to be selection for the competitive examinations, upon what principle the selection will be made?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, no precedence will be given to anyone in the competitive examinations, except as the result of proficiency. There will be no selection, but everything will be free, in the same manner as in the competition at Woolwich.

INDIA—APPOINTMENT TO THE PERSIAN MISSION.—QUESTION.

MR. EASTWICK asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, in the nomination of a successor to Mr. Alison, the recommendation of the Diplomatic Committee of last year will be taken into consideration in whichever department of State the Persian Mission may be?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Lord Granville is not prepared to restrict the choice of a representative of Her Majesty at the Court of Persia to any particular class of public servants; that choice, when occasion arises, must be determined by various considerations; and the general interests of the Empire will, Lord Granville considers, be more safely provided for by leaving that choice in the hands of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. With these views, Lord Granville has submitted for Her Majesty's approval the name of a gentleman who has been for many years conversant with the country, politics, and affairs of Persia.

Mr. Hermon

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS. ADJOURNMENT FOR THE WHITSUN- TIDE RECESS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, that he felt perfectly certain that they would all be rejoiced to find either that the Indirect Claims had been abandoned by the American Government or that, at all events, the right hon. Gentleman and the Government had done everything in their power to protect the interests of this country. He should, however, be glad to learn, What course the right hon. Gentleman meant to pursue with regard to the holidays; whether he was going to follow the course recommended in "another place;" whether a debate was likely to occur upon this great question on Monday and the following days, or whether he would insure the rising of the House on Monday?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I presume that the hon. and gallant Gentleman classifies the holidays under the head of "direct claims." I can assure him that there is every desire on the part of the Government to treat them with every consideration. We shall endeavour to put the House before the Vacation in the best position we can with regard to the actual situation of affairs, so that it may form its judgment, not, perhaps, upon the whole merits of the case, but as to whether it will be necessary or expedient to interfere with the arrangements at present contemplated with respect to the holidays. If that be so, we shall, of course, conform to the wish of the House with regard to the postponement of the day of adjournment.

NAVY—STEERING AND SAILING RULES.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

SIR JOHN HAY rose to call attention to the frequency of collisions at sea, and to move, That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire whether the present Steering and Sailing Rules cannot be modified so as to reduce the present risk to life and property at sea. Since the time that the House had last considered this question no diminution had taken place in the loss of life and property at sea. The risk of danger had been added to by the rapid rate of sailing of our passenger vessels. The loss of life and property had been very great, and he hoped the House would think it to be for the public advantage that public inquiry should take place in this matter. Documents already in the possession of the House showed that in 1861 there were 89 lives lost through collisions at sea; in 1862 there were 54; in 1863, 41; in 1864, the year after the passing of the regulations now in force, 91 lives were lost; in 1865, 53; in 1866, 127; in 1867, 160; in 1868, 86; in 1869 there were 118 lost in British waters and 29 in British vessels elsewhere; in 1870 there were 60 lost in British waters and 50 elsewhere. This made a total in the 10 years of nearly 1,000 lives. He did not attribute the loss entirely to the defective character of the regulations; but thought there was reasonable ground for believing that a modification of the rules would prevent much of the loss. The Board of Trade had not met all the necessities of the case, and further arrangements were necessary. The collisions during these 10 years numbered 3,662, an average of 366 a-year, or rather more than 1 a-day. The Secretary of Lloyd's stated that, although the number of sailing vessels had decreased by 9 per cent, the collisions with sailing vessels had increased by 7 per cent. The number of steamers had increased by 9 per cent, and the number of collisions by 39½ per cent. From 1831, when the old rule was in force requiring a ship on the larboard tack to give way to a ship on the starboard tack, down to 1862, when the present regulations were issued, various changes had been made in the rule of the road at sea, and in 1868 a further Order in Council was issued explaining these rules and regulations and modifying them in some respects. In 1848 the first regulations was made that steamers should carry red and green lights. In 1858 the duty of carrying lights was extended with respect to sailing vessels. The last time he introduced this subject the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) was President of the Board of Trade, and he stated that these rules and regulations were passed with the consent of the Admiralty. He (Sir John Hay) had enjoyed the honour of a seat at the Admiralty, and he was well aware how the matter stood, for he had been engaged in the negotiations between the Admiralty and the Board of Trade. A letter, dated February 22, 1867, signed by his noble Friend the Secretary for the Admiralty (Lord Henry Lennox), was issued, from which it would be seen that the Admiralty had received several letters on the subject, and a proposition was made that it should be seen if there could not be some changes in the present regulations. The Board of Trade did not recognize the necessity of further change, and conceived that foreign nations having adopted the regulations the disadvantages of the change would be greater than the advantages. At the request of the right hon. Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) he went to the Board of Trade and was placed in communication with Mr. Gray, the very able Superintendent of the Marine Department of the Board; but no agreement was come to between them. Later in the year 1867, when his right hon. Friend the Member for Tyrone (Mr. Corry) was at the Admiralty, a further correspondence was carried on with the Board of Trade; but still no agreement could be come to, and the Admiralty resolved to act independently with regard to Her Majesty's ships. He had himself placed on the Table of the House amended rules, which simplified the present rules, and removed from them words which tended to produce confusion. He, however, by no means wished to direct the attention of the House to those amended rules, to which he was not at all wedded; but he thought an inquiry by a Select Committee was desirable, and that evidence should be taken to ascertain how far a change in the existing rules would be beneficial. The amended rules which he had suggested might, if submitted to the Committee, possibly be of some assistance in guiding them to a decision.

He quoted a reply by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) to a Question put to him when he was in office, stating that rules had been framed by the Admiralty and approved of by foreign countries; but admitting that the question was one of very much interest, and that as several accidents had occurred at that time he proposed to confer with the Board of Trade and Trinity House to ascertain whether the rules could not be made more simple, especially in regard to the exhibition of the lights. Again, on May 27, 1867, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Tyrone stated that the Admiralty had been in communication with the Board of Trade on the subject, but no conclusion had been come to. In 1869 his gallant Friend Sir Alexander Milne, Commander in Chief in the Mediterranean, had written him a letter, already quoted in this House, in which the writer stated that he had always thought that certain changes should be introduced. The late Admiral Seymour, another member of the Board, also stated in this House that he concurred in the introduction of certain changes, although he admitted that no regulations would altogether avert collisions at sea. It was therefore clear that the concurrence of the Admiralty with the Board of Trade was not so entire as the House had been led to imagine. Another point he wished to call the attention of the House to was that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council objected very strongly to the explanations as they were affixed to the Regulations of 1868. A letter from Mr. Reeve, Registrar to the Privy Council, stated that when the Judicial Council asked the Board of Trade for an explanation of the rules, their Lordships replied that it was dangerous to give any official paper with an interpretation of the regulations, as the interpretation rather belonged to courts of law; so that the Privy Council objected to the issue of explanatory rules, because they might be at variance with the decisions of the Judges. Again, the concurrence of foreign nations to the amended regulations had not been fully obtained as yet. The French Government concurred with some difficulty, seeing some danger in the adoption of the rules, and the American Government had gone still further. In consequence, or he should rather say at the time of the collision between the

Oncida and the Bombay, the Government of the United States entered into a correspondence with the British Foreign Office, and the Government of the United States adopted another system of signal lights to call the attention of approaching vessels as to the intention of a vessel with regard to the helm. He would not weary the House with old cases; but he wished to show that, even at this moment, the Judges gave decisions at variance with the regulations and the explanations of the Board of Trade. In addition to the explanations issued by the Board of Trade, there were two books constantly in the hands of seamen which explained the rule of the road at sea—one of them the work of Mr. Olliver, and the other that of a gallant friend of his (Captain De Horsey). The case of the Northumberland and the Leopard was reported in The Shipping Gazette of the 23rd of April last. That case was decided at variance with the regulations and explanations of the Board of Trade. Those two vessels, the Northumberland and the Leopard, were meeting. They were not exactly end-on, and what the expression end-on meant the Judges had not yet been able to determine. When they were nearly meeting, the Leopard saw all the lights of the Northumberland; whereas the Northumberland saw only the green and the bow lights of the Leopard; and, according to the rule, the Northumberland should have kept her course, which she did, and the usual collision having occurred, the Northumberland was condemned for not having ported before. This was clearly at variance with the rule of the road as given by the Board of Trade. Since this rule had been established there had been no diminution in the number of vessels and of lives lost, while the number of collisions had largely increased. The rules of the Board of Trade required that there should be no change of course until there was a risk of collision; but he maintained that a vessel ought to take its right side of the road long before any such risk was incurred. He saw the Prime Minister in his place, and had been informed of the experiments made in his presence at Walmer and of the warm interest he had expressed in what he was pleased to term "the mute language of the rudder," and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would consent to the granting of this inquiry, which would be extremely advantageous for the public service.

CAPTAIN EGERTON said, he thought there were good reasons for moving the Motion now submitted, inasmuch as there were very great differences of opinion among naval men regarding the regulations. He himself thought the present regulations were fitted for the stupid man as well as the clever one, and any great alteration in them would tend far more to confuse people than to contribute to the advantage of the ship-owner. But the whole subject required emendation. If a Committee were granted on this subject, a considerable quantity of invaluable evidence would be obtained, and some slight modifications might be suggested which might be extremely important. No complicated system of lights or fireworks would answer, because the fishing boats and other small vessels with which collisions usually occurred were sure to be unprovided with the necessary apparatus. It must be recollected that there had been a great alteration in the size and speed of vessels navigating the narrow seas since the present regulations had been framed, and that steamers of 250 feet long had been replaced by others 400 feet or 500 feet in length. He begged to second the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire whether the present Steering and Sailing Rules cannot be modified so as to reduce the present risk to life and property at sea."—(Sir John Hay.)

MR. HANBURY TRACY said, he was very sorry that he could not agree with the Motion of his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir John Hay). No one could be more aware than he was that the hon. and gallant Gentleman had paid very great attention to this subject, and was a very great authority on the question. He thought it could not be denied that the present rules were far from perfect, and undoubtedly very great improvements might be made in them. He was also inclined to think that the theory of his hon. and gallant Friend was correct, that when ships were to the right of each other, a starboard helm ought to be used. The question appeared to him, however, not to be as to whether this or that alteration ought to be made; but whether, after the very limited experience they had had, they were justified in unsettling the rules which all the maritime nations of the world had agreed to. He thought it ought to be remembered that it was only in 1862 that the existing rules were adopted, after a very considerable amount of correspondence with foreign Powers; and he thought it was obvious to everyone that the House would be incurring a very great responsibility if they did anything which would tend to upset an arrangement, after so short a space of time as 10 years, which had been entered into not lightly, but after long deliberation, with the accumulated experience of years—a decision which had been arrived at by the Trinity House, Admiralty, Board of Trade, Judges of the Admiralty Courts, and by the advisers of the whole maritime marine of the world. He considered the regulations, having been adopted by all foreign countries, ought to be looked upon almost in the light of an International Law. As far as he could discover no complaints whatever had been made by any foreign country, and the mercantile marine of this country were unanimous against any change being made. The great thing to be aimed at was to have as few rules as possible, and these thoroughly understood, and then to leave the matter to the common sense and seaman-like qualities of the captains. Speaking with some practical knowledge—formerly as a lieutenant in charge of a watch—he could testify that nothing was so perplexing, on a dark night, in a moment of peril, with a vessel close aboard of you, to find yourself hampered with a mass of puzzling regulations. When the existing rules were in the hands of competent seamen, he believed it was almost impossible to go wrong. During the last few days he had made inquiries of the great steamship companies, and he found that they, one and all, without a single exception, deprecated the appointment of this Committee. What they said was this—"Our captains and officers are now well up in the existing rules; if you disturb the present arrangement, you will only confuse them, and there is nothing so dangerous as a time of transition. We are quite satisfied to let the rules remain as they now are, and very much deprecate the unsettling of the question." He sincerely hoped that the House would not grant the Committee, as he was convinced, if appointed, it would only have the effect, for a number of years, of disturbing an International agreement which, in the interests of all the maritime nations of the world, ought to be regarded as sacred, and which certainly should not be touched without very much stronger cause than that shown by the hon. and gallant Baronet.

MR. T. E. SMITH said, he hoped that the Government would accede to the appointment of this Committee. They had now an enormous number of fast steamers traversing every sea, and it was very desirable that there should be an inquiry whether our rule of proceeding was right or wrong. If the Committee should report that our rules were correct it would give them additional force, and if alterations were advised, such alterations would probably soon be adopted by foreign nations. If any improvement were to be made our own country surely ought to take the initiative in the matter. He desired no relaxation, but a stricter rule as to porting the helm, for the only way of preventing collisions at sea was to adopt something of the principle by which the traffic in the streets of London was regulated.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he thought that it was of the greatest possible importance that they should grant this Committee. One thing which should be borne in mind was the extreme rapidity with which ships now approached each other—a circumstance which much increased the difficulty of forming an opinion and acting upon it when there was danger of collision. There was a general impression that the existing rules were departmental rules rather than the result of the experience of seafaring men. What they would gain by the appointment of this Committee would be an exhaustive Report based upon the opinions of the best authorities upon the subject.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, he could assure his hon. Friend that the rules were not simply departmental ones. They were the result of considerable discussion between the Admiralty, the Trinity House, representing the Mercantile Marine, and the Board of Trade. Foreign Governments took some time in considering the question, and the French Government suggested alterations, some of which were adopted; but in the end the rules and explanations met with the general concurrence of the Mercantile Marine and foreign Governments. He himself was at the Board of Trade at the time, and he was to some extent responsible for the rules that had been discussed that night. The credit, however, of framing the explanation of the rules was due to Mr. Gray, a most excellent permanent official of the Board of Trade. He went so far that he reduced the rules into verse—he could hardly call it poetry—which began thus—“Green to green, red to red, Perfect safety; go ahead;”

and these lines had been translated into almost every language upon the Continent. He also gave lectures, and illustrated his subject by having boys who had green and red ribbons upon their arms, and who ran towards each other and came into collision from every point of the compass. The question of collisions was a most difficult one—something, indeed, like the warranty of a horse, where there was hard swearing on both sides, and the truth could scarcely be ascertained. The frequency of collision was attributed by some to an unfortunately increasing want of discipline in the merchant service, and to the difficulty of making sailors obey rules perfectly and promptly. When at the Board of Trade, on this question being frequently brought forward by Mr. Holland, and others, he had always defended the rules, and attributed accidents to disregard of, rather than to obedience to, them. Some years, however, had since elapsed, and it was impossible to overlook the fact that professional men of the experience of his hon. and gallant Friend all took a different view. The decisions of Courts had also thrown additional difficulties in the way, it being impossible to know whether those who obeyed the rules would be sustained by the Courts or not. He should still resist any Motion for a repeal or modification of the regulations. They had, however, been to a certain extent discredited, he thought unjustly, and an inquiry could do no harm, while it might do good. If it confirmed the rules, as he believed would be the case, the Courts would no doubt be influenced by such a result, and their future decisions would be brought into greater harmony with the rules; whereas, if alterations were shown to be necessary, the sooner they were settled the better. He hoped, therefore, the Government would accede to the Motion; but if they did not, he should be obliged to vote for it.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE agreed with the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. S. Cave) as to Mr. Gray's services in this matter. It must not be supposed, however, that the rules rested merely on his authority, for they were settled in 1862, after an immense amount of consultation between all the Departments of the State interested in the subject, and they had since that time received more and more the sanction of the maritime Powers of the world. This being so, he was surprised that the right hon. Gentleman should feel himself bound to vote for the Motion. He entirely agreed that discussion and what was called "ventilation" of a question was a very good thing; but in this case he believed that the re-opening of the subject by a public inquiry would do a great deal more harm than good. He felt that his responsibility upon this question was no light one, and he submitted to the House that however plausible and taking a Motion for a Committee might be, it was not the duty of the Government or of the House to lend itself to any such inquiry, of which the effect would be the unsettling of the minds of sea-faring men, and the throwing great doubt upon things that should not be doubted. He understood that the foundation of the Motion was the number of collisions that took place at sea. The figures, however, varied so strangely from year to year that it was almost impossible to draw any rational conclusion from them. He was informed that the increase in the number of collisions was in a large degree owing to the great increase of tonnage—that was, of the number of vessels—and that there had been no increased collisions out of proportion to the increase of tonnage. To-day the Secretary of Lloyd's Association absolutely denied to him the statement that the collisions had increased beyond that proportion, or that the rule of the road had anything to do with the increase of collisions. It was not for him (Mr. Chichester Fortescue) to say what was the cause of these unfortunate collisions. Many causes were alleged, one of them being that the intense degree of competition which now prevailed, and which was greater than ever was known before, led to greater hurry, risk, and recklessness than ever happened previously. But whatever might be the cause of these collisions, his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir John Hay) did not move for an inquiry into the cause of collisions; he proposed an inquiry, whether the rule of the road at sea could not be amended? The question was, whether it would be expedient to re-open the whole question of the rule of the road at sea which was now the maritime code of every nation of the world that was of the slightest importance. The hon. and gallant Member said that he did not attribute the increased number of collisions to the rule of the road; but still he thought that the rule of the road might be improved. He tried to detract from the authority of these rules by saying that there had been a difference of opinion upon them between the Board of Trade and the Admiralty, especially as to the two new rules that explained the original ones. No doubt there was a kind of misconception at first as to the two rules; but the Departments afterwards came to an entire agreement, as was shown by the Order in Council of July, 1868, making the additional rules the law of the land just as much as the original rules were. As to the Judges not being bound to pay attention to the explanations, diagrams, and so on of the Board of Trade, he must say that he believed these explanations were of the greatest possible benefit to seafaring men. As to the two additional rules, the Judges were just as much bound to regard them as they were so to regard any other part of the law of the land. Two years ago, when his distinguished predecessor at the Board of Trade—namely, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright)—was in office, he felt it his duty steadily to oppose not only any alteration of these rules, but any such Parliamentary inquiry as would re-open the whole subject. His right hon. Friend said he thought there would be every disadvantage in appointing a Committee to inquire into a matter which all maritime nations believed had been satisfactorily settled. Everything that had happened since had confirmed the view which his right hon. Friend then took. His hon. and gallant Friend said the two additional rules had not been assented to by other parties. In that he believed his hon. and gallant Friend was entirely mistaken. In the Papers which had just been laid upon the Table of the House, it would be found that there was transmitted to the Foreign Office an Ordinance of the German Empire, passed at the end of last year to prevent collisions at sea, and which Ordinance embodied the whole of our rules, including the two additional and interpreting rules. All the maritime nations in the world would be surprised if after a solemn inquiry Parliament abrogated rules which they had adopted, with which they were satisfied, and with respect to which they had made no complaint. Nothing, indeed, would surprise them more than to find that the Parliament of England had come to the conclusion that the subject was beset with doubts and difficulties, and that the rules were capable of serious change and improvement. Of course, he did not mean to deny that any particular set of rules might in some respects be improved; but he maintained that it would be most unwise to unsettle rules which had been adopted by all maritime countries for the sake of the slight improvements that had been indicated by the Proposer and Seconder of the Motion. The opinions of gentlemen in this country who had a right to be heard on the subject were adverse to the proposed inquiry. The Papers which would be laid before the House in the course of a few days, showed that Lloyd's Salvage Association had strongly expressed an opinion in favour of the existing regulations, as had also the Irish Steampacket Company, and Mr. Gray Hill, the secretary of the Liverpool Steamship Owners' Association. That very day a gentleman of high authority on a matter of this kind—Mr. Harper, the Secretary of Lloyd's Salvage Association—had called upon him and expressed an earnest hope that he would not agree to the appointment of the Committee proposed by the hon. and gallant Baronet. Mr. Harper stated his belief that the rules were for all practical purposes complete, and that even if some slight improvements might be made in them, frightful danger might arise from introducing uncertainty and confusion as to the rule of the road at sea into the minds of the seafaring population, who had to act upon that rule under the most critical circumstances. Mr. Harper concluded by saying that his opinion was shared by the 50 or 60 nautical men connected either with the Royal Navy or the Mercantile Marine who were members of the Association. With these facts before him, and having regard to the view taken by his predecessor, it would be impossible for him to advise the House to enter upon the inquiry.

MR. G. BENTINCK said, he had heard the decision of the right hon. Gentleman with great regret. He was not prepared for any hesitation on the part of the Government to go into an inquiry upon this question. He would undertake to bring hundreds of men who would tell them that the present rules of the road at sea were the cause of the loss of a large amount of life and property annually at sea. In respect to the decisions of the Courts of Law upon those matters, he would remind the House that those Courts did not always decide in accordance with the regulations that had been laid down. If a master followed precisely the rules laid down, he would very often lose his ship instead of saving it. [Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman dissented from this statement; but he (Mr. Bentinck) had had 30 years' practical experience afloat, and from his own experience he could quote hundreds of cases in which vessels were lost by adhering rigidly to those rules, and vessels that had escaped by departing from them. In the face of all those facts he thought that the right hon. Gentleman incurred a very grave responsibility in refusing his acquiescence to this Committee. The right hon. Gentleman assumed the doctrine of infallibility in respect to those rules when he said that they were so good that they could scarcely be improved, or, if they could, the danger of so improving them would be much greater than any benefit arising from such a change could possibly be. He (Mr. Bentinck) would undertake to produce evidence before a Committee to show that the observance of those rules was the cause of great loss of life and property. It was the commonest expression in the world for seamen, in speaking of the observance of those rules, to say—though using a somewhat coarser phrase than he did—"It was going to the infernal regions by Act of Parliament." Nevertheless, the right hon. Gentleman opposite told the House that they ought not to assent to this inquiry.

What could be the objection to this Committee? If his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir John Hay) could not make out a case for the alteration of the rules, there would, of course, be an end of the question. If, on the other hand, he succeeded in proving his case, then it would be admitted that the time had come for an alteration of the laws. In refusing this Committee he considered that the right hon. Gentleman was taking upon himself the consequences of the loss of a large amount of life and property.

MR. CHILDERS, having taken some interest in this question, wished to state why in his judgment it would be inexpedient to institute an inquiry at the present time. This was not an English question only—it was a question which concerned the whole world, and it was most desirable that Parliament, or the Government of any particular country, should not take any step which would be in advance of public opinion. Now, he ventured to state that the inquiry proposed by the hon. Baronet (Sir John Hay) would be considerably in advance of public opinion. He believed the great majority both of shipmasters and of shipowners were satisfied with the present regulations; and even among those who were not thoroughly satisfied he had reason to believe that no very definite opinions would be found, and certainly nothing approaching to agreements as to the amendments to be made. It would thus be a misfortune, even in the interest of the view taken by the hon. Baronet, to appoint a Committee which could only hear imperfect and crude evidence, and therefore come to a lame conclusion upon a subject which, if a Committee was appointed, could not be re-opened for some years. It had been stated that the Board of Trade and the Trinity House were opposed to change in the existing state of things, and he could, of his own knowledge, add that the permanent administration at the Admiralty, including Admiral Richards, Hydrographer to the Navy, held a similar opinion. Under such circumstances, he thought it would be a pity to enter into a premature discussion of this question, and that it would be better to let it stand over until they had more positive evidence to bring forward. He hoped, therefore, the hon. Baronet would not press his Motion.

MR. GRAVES confessed that, upon this occasion his sympathy was, to a large extent, with the Board of Trade. They had been for some years educating themselves up to this point. We had been the pioneers of this question, and nation after nation had adopted our rules. Our fishermen around the coast understood every one of our signals. Nothing, however, but the strongest evidence of the inestimable advantages of another system would justify us in making any change. Although he did not consider our system a perfect one, nevertheless he had seen nothing better up to that moment. He was strengthened in this view of the matter by the representations he had received from his constituents. He, however, should not object to a mere inquiry into the causes of the collisions which had occurred. Those collisions had not certainly diminished, if they had not increased. Those collisions, and the great loss of life occasioned by them, formed, in his mind, a strong ground for inquiry. He did not see that much mischief would come out of such an inquiry. But as the Government, who were responsible for the administration of our maritime affairs, had seen fit to take another course, he should doubt the prudence of his hon. and gallant Friend in pressing his Motion to a division.

SIR JOHN HAY regretted he could not acquiesce in the view of his hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool (Mr. Graves). If the Government had expressed any intention to institute an inquiry he would have withdrawn his Motion; but as they had not done so, he must ask the opinion of the House upon it.

Question put, and negatived.

ORDNANCE SURVEY (ENGLAND).

RESOLUTION.

MR. WREN-HOSKYNs, in rising to move the Resolution of which he had given Notice, hoped that the House would not be startled by a rather sudden transition from the marine topic they had been discussing, to one that related chiefly to the land. It was now 10 years since the last Committee on the Ordnance Survey, as it was still called, had presented their Report, and he would wish to call the attention of the House to the progress of the survey, and especially to its present state in this part of the United Kingdom. Nearly a century had elapsed since the triangulation of the kingdom was commenced by General Roy—in 1784—which, after occupying upwards of 70 years in its accomplishment, was carried across the Channel in 1858 by Sir Henry James, and united with those of France and Belgium during the three following years. It was a splendid and costly national work, and one which had taxed to the utmost the patience and skill of the engineering service, and so perfect in result that it left nothing to be desired, except that it should be made the best and earliest use of. It seemed strange that those who had borne the chief burden of paying for it should hitherto have enjoyed the least share of its fruits. He need not tell the House that the chief expense had been incurred when the triangulation was completed—once done, it was done for good and all, and was equally available for every part of the kingdom. In order to obtain a map of any part of the country, any one or any series of these triangles could be filled up by a detailed survey, of mathematical accuracy, and upon any scale. What, however, had been the use made of it as regarded England? Would it be credited that the only map we had of this country, south of Lancashire and Yorkshire, was the old 1-inch map of which the first sheets were published in 1796!—a map which was full of errors of detail from the first, owing to an inexperienced and inefficient staff quite new to the work, which, had it been originally perfect, the mere efflux of time would have rendered obsolete. Its inaccuracies were described by Sir Henry James himself to the Committee of 1861, as “perfectly astounding in character.” The history of the matter was this. Just as the work had reached the northern counties, in 1825, a Government survey of Ireland became immediately necessary. Taught by the blunders and defects of the 1-inch scale map in England, the Government determined on a 6-inch scale for Ireland. It proceeded at first with appalling slowness, but ended in a genuine triumph—a map being produced which was admitted by the first judges of Europe, assembled at the Statistical Congress at Brussels in 1853, to be the finest piece of topographical art ever seen in any country. At this Congress the whole subject of national maps, or cadastres, formed a subject of active discussion; and the unanimous conclusion of the statisticians there assembled from each country—including Mr. Farr, who was appointed by the Registrar General to represent England—was in favour of a scale of 12-500th of a mile, commonly known in this country as the “25-inch scale,” to which it nearly corresponded. It was originally proposed by the great astronomer, Laplace, to Napoleon, and adopted in France in 1807, and had the advantage of giving, within a fraction, a square inch to the English acre. The Emperor recommended that it should be accompanied by a smaller map—tableau d'assemblage—which, singularly enough, nearly corresponded with the scale of our Irish survey. These two scales were accordingly used in proceeding with the long interrupted map of England, throughout the northern counties, and for Scotland; the original map of all the other English counties still remaining as backward as ever. In the last and in the present Session, he (Mr. Wren-Hoskyns) had put the question to the Government, when we might expect “justice to England” in this matter, first through his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War, in whose Department the survey then was, and again of the Chief Commissioner of Works, to whom it had since fallen. The answer he got was the same on each occasion in succession, that the survey would not be completed for 15 years. This reminded him of the experience of some travellers in Wales, who, in answer to each inquiry on the road, found they were further from their destination. But the question was really a serious one. The 6-inch map of Ireland, admirable as it was, had actually gone through revision in a less period than that; indeed, Sir Henry James had stated in his evidence that even the best maps required revision every 14 years. Yet our old 1-inch Ordnance map of the last century still remained, literally, a book of blunders, uncorrected; and, worse than that, a sort of “father of lies,” for all the numerous progeny of local maps that were copied were based upon it. He could not help asking—“What enemy hath done this?” It looked like a conspiracy of neglect. It could hardly be called a question of expense, for the sale of the maps repaid a large share of the expenses of publication, and the main work and cost had been encountered when the triangulation was completed 90 years ago. It had been given in evidence that nearly £3,000,000 had been uselessly squandered upon partial maps for Tithe Commissions, Charity Commissions, Poor Law Commissions, Inclosure and Copyhold Commissions, all of which would have had one perfect and indisputable reference had the Government cadastral map been carried out in England. The Land Tenure Report, presented last Session but one, had shown every civilized country but ourselves possessed of a cadastral map to accompany the registries of title, define the boundaries, and simplify the conveyance of land. Sir Richard Griffiths' letter to the Royal Commission of 1858 had attested its value in Ireland as almost beyond description for all the purposes he described—for registration, for determining questions of conterminous property, settlement of disputes between landlord and tenant, and tenant and labourer, equitable adjustment of rating and taxation, drainage, sanitary matters, besides geological and hydrographical inquiries, and road and railroad engineering, for the elective franchise, and the Landed Estates Court. Yet here we were at the end of nearly 80 years from the commencement of the work, with 27 English counties and the whole of Wales without any reliable survey, and with the prospect of half a generation to wait before we were to be on a footing with Ireland and Scotland in this matter. Even the Isle of Man had got its cadastral map, and could laugh at Wales and England; while in the last meagre Blue-book of the annual "progress"—as it is humourously called—of the cadastral survey we find, in place of half-a-dozen English counties, that—

"Jerusalem and Mount Sinai are completed, and the map of our Army's route in Abyssinia, as far as Magdala, well advanced."

It was stated by Sir Henry James, 11 years ago, that the survey could be completed at a cheaper rate, and in a shorter time, according to the amount of the sum voted—

"If the annual vote was £150,000, it could be finished in 12 years for £1,800,000; if the vote was only £90,000 a-year, it would take 21 years and cost £90,000 more."

The latter was accepted by the penny wisdom of an English Parliament; and half the longest period had elapsed to find us still 15 years from the end. Unfortunately, the forms of the House would preclude the Resolution which it had been his intention to move, but which he hoped had been sufficiently indicated to the House. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Her Majesty's Government be urged, in view of the promised Bill for the Transfer of Land, to give their earliest attention to the completion of the Cadastral Map of England."—(Mr. Wren Hoskyns.)

MR. AYRTON said, the hon. Member had by his speech no doubt explained enough to the House to satisfy them that this was a subject that could not be disposed of easily or summarily. It was one that had engaged the attention of Parliament at various intervals during a period of 88 years, and which had entailed upon the country an expense up to this time of £3,255,000, and that in the result they had only just arrived at one complete 1-inch map of the United Kingdom. During that interval Parliament had again and again discussed how the survey should be carried on. The first system adopted was condemned on account of its imperfections, it having produced maps on which reliance could no longer be placed. No doubt considerable improvements had since taken place, and we could now compete in that respect with any other country. The result of those intermittent, and he might say those fitful discussions of this question, had been to lead to the adoption of three scales of maps—namely, the 1-2500th—commonly called the 25-inch—the 6-inch, and the 1-inch. The intention was to complete the highly populated parts of the country on the 25-inch scale, and the other parts in which hills and heaths abounded on the 6-inch scale. The hon. Gentleman regretted that the survey did not proceed more rapidly. According to the Return for 1870 there was a staff of 1,800 persons, including the military, engaged upon it. There was a great difficulty, even if it were desirable, in suddenly increasing very largely an establishment of that kind, every man of which worked in relation to every other, and must have special knowledge and training. It could only, therefore, be increased, if at all, gradually and by adding a certain number of men every year.

MR. WREN-HOSKYNS observed that Sir Henry James stated that he could finish a map in 12 years for one sum, which he mentioned, and another in 21 years for a different sum, and that the latter was preferred.

MR. AYRTON: No doubt Sir Henry James, if he had been allowed 10 years ago to organize a larger staff, might have been able to proceed with the work more rapidly. But reference was now made to the existing staff, and to the difficulty connected with an increased rapidity of the present survey. It was also necessary to consider the annual expense of the survey, to which there was necessarily a limit. Having regard to the demands that were made for the maintenance of the Army, the Navy, and every other branch of the public service, unless the taxation of the country were indefinitely extended, a certain sum must be allocated for this particular purpose; and the Government were of opinion that £100,000 a-year was sufficient to set apart for the prosecution of the Ordnance Survey. He confessed his inability to follow the argument of his hon. Friend when he contended that a rapid survey might be secured for a small additional outlay.

MR. WREN-HOSKYNS explained that Sir Henry James could complete the map in 12 years for £90,000 less than the cost of the map for 21 years.

MR. AYRTON: That sum did not go far in an expenditure of £2,000,000. It was purely an arithmetical question. For example, with an additional outlay of £12,000 a-year you would gain, in proportion, about a year, or little less, in the completion of the survey. The expenditure of £100,000 a-year had been the limit sanctioned by successive Governments. They had to spend about £1,300,000 more on the survey, which, at the rate of £100,000 per annum, it would take 13 years to complete. Again, there would be a danger in employing an enormous staff on such a work with the prospect of their being speedily discharged, because in that case the men would feel very little interest in their work, and the efficiency of the establishment, now so universally recognized, might be impaired. He could not, therefore, hold out the hope of any great diminution of the time required to finish the survey. All things considered, there was no great cause for dissatisfaction with the progress made. The Government were much interested in the prosecution of the undertaking, because it was most desirable for many public purposes to have an accurate map of the country on a large scale. Again, if too long an interval elapsed between the commencement and the conclusion of the survey, the constant changes occurring in reference to land would render the earlier maps comparatively valueless. They could not have an accurate map of the whole country unless they employed some standing body to revise and rectify it according to the changes occurring from year to year. The establishment in Ireland for that purpose, and the revision of the valuation, cost £25,000 per annum; the corresponding charge in the case of England must necessarily be very large indeed, and statutory powers would also be required for the purpose. Before embarking in such an expensive enterprise the matter would demand very grave investigation. With regard to the facility for transferring land, his hon. Friend thought that would be afforded by a 25-inch scale map of the whole country. He now held in his hand one of the books of reference for a single parish, that he had taken at random. The parish, he found, contained 12,459 acres; there were in it no fewer than 2,299 separate plots marked, with the quantities scheduled. There was the basis of every single plot of land, with its area; but not the least information was afforded as to how those plots were brought together in separate holdings, or as to who were the owners. Without such information as that, he could not understand how the land survey might be made the basis of any improved system of land transfer. Having heard the various arguments brought forward in the House for giving facility in the transfer of land, he had come to the conclusion that hon. Gentlemen were on the wrong scent altogether when they confined themselves to the mere machinery connected with the transfer; for the real difficulty was that which arose from the state of the law. As long as they had a law which allowed all kinds of interests to be created—present and prospective—which separated the freehold title from the possession, the possession from the right to the possession, and which gave rise to all kinds of difficulties affecting occupation, so long would the man coming into possession of property with such complications attached to it be at a loss to know what it was he really possessed. If the completion of the survey would facilitate transfer, this was an additional reason for expediting the work; but he feared that it must, under present circumstances, take some years, and could not be materially accelerated without risk of diminishing the accuracy and value of the maps. He hoped that, considering the promise of the Government to deal with the question of transfer as soon as they could, and their consequent interest in accelerating the survey, his hon. Friend would be satisfied with having called attention to the matter, and would not ask the House to adopt the Resolution.

MR. GREGORY regretted that, after the time and money which had been devoted to the survey and the little result at present to be shown for it, the right hon. Gentleman had not given a more satisfactory assurance. It was hardly creditable that this country should not have as complete a survey as continental countries had. If any further outlay or any augmentation of the staff was requisite, the expense would be to some extent recouped by the sale of the maps. Before becoming a Member of the House he had some experience in preparing Private Bills, and never had any difficulty, even in winter, in obtaining the requisite plans and sections of important projects. This question had some bearing on the transfer of land, but this was scarcely a proper occasion for the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman on that matter. In spite of our complicated system of conveyancing, there was always plenty of land in the market, but the investigation of title and the absence of good maps certainly added to the expense of transfer. He hoped to receive the support of hon. Gentlemen opposite to a Bill which he had introduced on the subject.

MR. W. FOWLER said, he was not satisfied with the right hon. Gentleman's statement that the survey would occupy 13 years longer, and that the portion first commenced might then have to be begun over again. It would surely be more economical to expedite the work, so that it would not so soon become useless. As to the difficulty of finding the requisite staff, this was a question of money, for plenty of talent existed in the country if a demand was made for it. A thoroughly good map was essential to greater facilities of transfer; and, on the Continent, where conveyancing was much easier and less expensive, such maps existed. They could not expect to have an easy transfer of land while they had the existing complications in connection with the title of land. The Commission of 1857 said that but for prejudice there was no reason why the transfer of land should not be as simple as the transfer of stock or ships. Fifteen years had elapsed and they were now no nearer a solution of this question than ever. In transferring personal estate they transferred the corpus, leaving the trust outside. The Bank of England, for example, would not go into the question of trusts, the only question with them being, who was upon the register. But in the case of land, speaking generally, all these elaborate trusts were affixed to the title, so that unless all the persons interested were settled with, the land could not be transferred. As long as this system existed the difficulties and expense attending the transfer of land would continue. They must either forbid the creation of these complicated interests—a measure for which the House did not seem prepared—or they must divorce the equitable from the legal interest in land so that the corpus might be transferred perfectly, and the equitable interests made to depend not upon the land, but upon the personal integrity of the trustee. In some way or other, in every European country the transfer of land was easy and inexpensive. It was strange that this country should be a remarkable exception, and all the stranger because most of the Members of this, and all the Members of the other House, were deeply interested in the question. There must be a thorough measure of reform, and for that purpose there must be a thorough map. Much could not be said for a survey which had been 80 years in progress, and had cost £3,000,000, having little to show for it. It ought to be got out of hand at once, for it was a matter of vital interest to poor as well as rich. He had lately cited a case in which a comparatively poor man bought a small piece of land for £20, and the legal expenses were £10. No blame attached to the lawyers employed, who were men of the highest respectability, and did not charge a fraction more than was necessary. Such a state of things was intolerable. The transfer of stock cost nothing; but a man of moderate means was practically precluded from investing in land, because he really did not know what the transfer would cost him, and, moreover, did not know after all whether he should have a good title.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he would not enter into the question incidentally raised of the transfer of land, because it was undesirable to commence an incidental conversation on an intricate question arising out of a matter which was not before the House. It was impossible for anyone in speaking off-hand on so large a topic not to commit himself to more or less than he desired to express. With a regard for the scientific as well as the legal and social well-being of the country, he must join with those who urged the Government to push on this work of the national survey with less consideration for mere economy and more zeal for the general convenience of the people. At the same time, he could not press the Motion with any expectation of seeing the undertaking finished, for he saw no end to the work, which was no sooner done than it must be begun again. Every new street, every new house, every squire who dug a new pond and threw down a hedgerow falsified the Ordnance map. On this ground, and in order that the initiatory standard might be reached, the work should be pushed on, while the question of staff ought not to stand in the way. By the introduction of the competitive system, with its contingent of failures, a large class of proportionably educated, but unemployed, and therefore discontented people had been created; and in the Ordnance survey means of honourable employment might easily be found for persons of this class of sufficient education and good character. There was no fear that the map would not be a marketable commodity. According to the report recently presented from Sir Henry James, his department was remunerative, both in its English maps and its reproductions of historical documents, and in surveys such as those of the Holy Land; and if the 25-inch scale were carried all over the country, the prime cost of so noble a map would, he was satisfied, be more than met by the demand. It was not creditable to us if in a realm of such small area they did not provide the means of carrying on a survey on a uniform scale all over the country. When the map had been completed, and a Government organization established for altering it as it became requisite, he would recommend that it should be made by Act of Parliament a legal document of primary necessity. If to every deed or will dealing with an appreciable area of country the corresponding sheets of the Ordnance map were attached, with such manuscript additions or alterations as were needed to make the documents self-explanatory, legal and scientific proceedings would be greatly simplified. There was one other point to which he wished to refer. There were, no doubt, difficulties in the introduction of estate boundaries; but he did not understand why the name of the owner of every distinctive piece of land having an appreciable boundary should not be engraved upon the map; and he was convinced that such an addition would naturally add to the practical value of the survey.

MR. WREN - HOSKYNs observed that after the discussion which had taken place he should not divide the House, feeling confident that the Government would give the question their best consideration.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (ELECTION OF ALDERMEN).

RESOLUTION.

MR. HEYGATE rose to call the attention of the House to the partial and unsatisfactory operation of the Municipal Corporations Reform Act in the Election of Aldermen, and to move a Resolution. The hon. Gentleman said, that the subject with which he had to deal was admitted by all reasonable persons to be a grievance. By the Corporations Reform Acts of 1833 and 1834 it was provided that, in addition to the councilmen to be elected for the wards, a certain number of aldermen were also to be chosen. But instead of intrusting the election of aldermen to the burgesses of the wards, the Act of Parliament relating to the subject gave it entirely to the councillors voting together. Every member of the Council was competent to vote for any number of persons not exceeding the number of aldermen to be elected. The result was that a bare majority of the councillors in every borough could elect the whole body of aldermen, the latter being one-third of the number of councillors. The consequence was that, unless the councilmen chose to give to the minority some sort of representation, they could unfairly exclude them from all share in the upper ranks of municipal honours. By that means a large number of gentlemen who from their position in society and the taxes which they paid were best entitled to take part in the municipal affairs of the country were altogether excluded from the management of local concerns. The object of the original division of boroughs into wards was to do that which in the election of aldermen had signally failed—namely, to give a fair representation to all the different sections of the community, and if that had been done no complaint would have been made. It was not enacted that aldermen should be distinctly assigned to certain wards; but that was done as a matter of custom, and aldermen were generally understood to represent the wards to which they had been assigned. He was far from imputing to any corporation, though some might of late years have been extravagant, any charge of general mismanagement; but what he did say was this—that there were corporations which gave all their municipal honours as a reward solely for political opinion. The Municipal Corporations Reform Act, while removing many abuses, had failed to effect an alteration in that respect. In discussing this question in 1835, Lord Melbourne cited from the Report of the Corporation Commissioners the following passage:—

“Now let us look at the Corporation of Leicester. . . . From the Mayor to the humblest servant of the Corporation, every office has been filled by persons of the Corporation, or so-called Tory party, to the total exclusion of all who entertained different opinions, however wealthy, however intelligent, however respectable. Now, let me ask your Lordships, what do you think of the working of such a system as this?”—[3 Hansard, xxix. 1347.]

He regretted to say that the government of towns where the balance of parties was all on one side was still carried on with all the political exclusiveness described by Lord Melbourne. To his knowledge, very great objection had been raised to this political exclusiveness, especially in a town which he had in his mind; but, unfortunately, the protests that had been made had been unavailing. He did not think the community would have gained all that they had a right to expect from the passing of the Municipal Corporations Reform Act unless a more satisfactory mode of conducting the election of aldermen was provided. It was said that the minority must bow to the majority, and he would not dispute the principle. In that House of about 650 Members, supposing there were 450 on one side and 200 on the other, the majority must rule; but the House would not so readily respect the decisions of the majority if the same mode were adopted in the House as was prevalent under the present constitutions of the municipal corporations in England and Wales. He only asked that the aldermen should represent their boroughs as fairly as the councillors did, and that both political parties should be proportionately represented by aldermen chosen from among men of property and influence. It was not difficult to find a remedy for this unjust state of things; and, indeed, as long as it was put a stop to he was indifferent as to the precise mode that was adopted to get rid of it. There were three remedies which suggested themselves to his mind for the grievance of which he complained. They might either commit the election of aldermen to the burgesses themselves or the different wards, so that every district should be fairly represented by its alderman and by its councillor. That was the first and simplest proposition, and in that way the London aldermen were elected. Or they might commit the election of the alderman of each ward to the councillors of each ward, and in all boroughs of any size that would be an easy mode of election. Or the election might be conducted on the cumulative system of voting, which was coming greatly into fashion. He hoped his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department would be able to give the House some satisfactory assurance on the subject. The hon. Member concluded by moving his Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That, in the opinion of this House, the present mode of electing Aldermen in Municipal Boroughs by the vote of the Town Council is unsatisfactory, and fails to secure a fair representation in each Borough on the Aldermanic Bench.”—(Mr. Heygate.)

MR. WHEELHOUSE regretted that a question of so much importance did not excite more interest in the House, for it was a question of no mean importance to the good government of the country, and it was desirable that the greatest amount of local interest within the boroughs should be brought to bear on local matters. The fact of a man being a Whig or a Tory, a Radical or a Conservative, could not be a reason why he should be best able to supervise the minute arrangements of a borough. Lord Ellenborough, in a speech upon this subject, had spoken of the professed object of dividing boroughs into wards to be to give to all classes of the community a fair chance of being equally represented. If that had been the object of the Act, it had lamentably failed. What had invariably happened under the present law was that a majority of town councillors were but too often elected on political principles only, and then the majority of town councillors, aided by such aldermen as did not then go out of office, elected aldermen exclusively from one political party, and so the opinions of the burgesses were neutralized. The fact was that the burgesses should elect the aldermen; but the objection to that was that it would destroy the double character of the corporation corresponding to that of Parliament. The second suggestion was that the councillors of each ward should elect their own aldermen; but the manifest objection to that was that the aldermen so elected would merely increase the political strength of the councillors electing them; and nothing could more completely defeat the intentions of those who framed the Municipal Corporations Act. The third suggestion was that aldermen should be elected by the cumulative votes of the burgesses; hitherto, cumulative voting had been eminently successful wherever it had been tried; and the probability was that in this case it would result in the election of the best men. Nothing could be worse than the present system, under which it would take six years to correct a mistake, and in that time irreparable injury might be done by a self-willed majority. In Leeds, as in many other boroughs, the aldermen and the mayors had been elected exclusively from the predominant political party; and the consequence was, that while some of the best townsmen had been excluded from office on account of their politics, the position of aldermen had been held by men on whom it never ought to have been conferred. There was another question—how far political partizanship regulated the giving of offices. It was perfectly possible that might not have been intended; but he should like a Return to be made showing how certain persons had been elected to certain offices; what was their qualifications for that office; and how far they had always voted for the political party in power. He knew aldermen who had become rate collectors; and, in fact, the offices of alderman and town councillor had become a sort of harbour of refuge for people of a certain political phase or class, and offices were, in far too many instances, conferred upon such people as political partizans only. He was, therefore, very much obliged to his hon. Friend for bringing this subject before the House. What he said the other night with reference to the borough of which he spoke applied with ten-fold force to a municipality so large as that of Leeds. In almost every municipality in the North of England the corporations were supposed to be Liberal, as it was called. Why? Not always because the people so desired it. So far as town councils were concerned, the elections fairly represented both sides; but in the corporation the minority was not merely swamped, but the minority was turned into a majority by the mere action of the aldermanic votes. Six years was too long a time to allow that state of things to exist without change. He, therefore, seconded the Motion.

MR. BRUCE said, he hoped the very dismal picture they had just heard of the working of municipal institutions was to some extent due to the personal experience and misfortunes of his hon. Friend, and that all was not quite so bad as he had represented. At all events, it was remarkable that this grievance had been so long pent up; for, so far as he recollected, with the exception of a slight discussion the other night, this was the first time they had heard of it. Ever since he had been in office he had continually received applications from various boroughs throughout the country to bring in a Bill to deal with the question of re-division of wards, on the ground that the balance of wealth and population had altered. What was the grievance of the case before us? The election of aldermen by a majority of the Common Council. A very great portion of legislation had been directed to extend the powers of corporations, and it would be a grievous thing if the most important members of those bodies were to be elected without reference to their fitness for their respective offices, but merely on account of their political opinions. It was undoubtedly the fact that in a great many cases there were aldermen representing both sides of political opinion, and he was constantly receiving evidence of the efficiency, vigour, and zeal with which the affairs of various municipalities were conducted. One of the remedies suggested by the hon. Member for the evil of which he complained was, that the selection of aldermen should be direct by the burgesses themselves, and much might be said in favour of that proposition; but it was, no doubt, the object of the framers of the Act, in leaving the selection to a body of men already themselves elected by the ratepayers, to bring into the municipal government men of influence who would not expose themselves to the risk, annoyance, and expense of a popular election. Another alternative which had been suggested was that the Common Councilmen of each ward should elect the aldermen for that ward. He thought it would be very difficult to carry out any such arrangement. The third proposal was that the system of cumulative voting should be allowed in these elections. No doubt a great deal could be said in favour of that proposition; but it might be objected to it that it was founded on the recognition of the fact that politics played a principal part in the election of the aldermen of corporations, and upon the consequent desire of the hon. Member to obtain a fair representation of political opinion. Now, he did not think that politics ought to enter into the view of Parliament in dealing with this question. What was wanted was, not to secure the ascendancy or proper representation of this or that political party in the borough, but to obtain the best possible representation of the intelligence and public spirit of the locality. The present system had been in force for 40 years, and Parliament ought scarcely to be called upon to condemn it as a failure on almost the first occasion that its attention had been directed to the question. He would suggest to the hon. Member that, instead of pressing the present Resolution, he would adopt a better mode of testing the opinion of the House on the subject by bringing in a Bill, and thereby submitting the matter to the House in a definite shape.

MR. M. CHAMBERS said, that on looking over the Notice Paper he found on it Notices of Resolution which ought never to have been brought before the House. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that when an hon. Member disapproved of an Act or any part of an Act, the proper course for him to pursue would be to introduce a Bill for its repeal, instead of wasting the time of the House by the discussion of abstract Resolutions. He would not discuss the question whether the Municipal Corporations Act had worked well or ill; but he objected to the horrible, the terrible waste of time which was caused by the discussion of Resolutions like that now before the House.

MR. HEYGATE said, he did not think the time of the House had been wasted in discussing the subject which he had brought forward. Having succeeded in obtaining a discussion on an admitted grievance, he was satisfied, and would now, with the leave of the House, withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

IRELAND—LORD LIEUTENANCY OF CLARE.—RESOLUTION.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he rose with deep regret to move the Notice which stood in his name. The Notice was in the following terms:—

“To call attention to the appointment of Colonel the Hon. Charles White to the Lord Lieutenancy of the county of Clare; and to move, That this House has heard with great regret that a gentleman has been appointed Lord Lieutenant of Clare who has never resided in that county, who is a stranger to its Magistrates, and who does not possess that local knowledge of the county and its residents essential to the proper discharge of the important duties of a Lieutenant of a County, and that this House is of opinion that such an appointment is of evil example, and ought not to have been made.”

Under any circumstances, it was a most disagreeable duty for any Member of Parliament to have to bring forward a Motion in condemnation of an appointment made by the Executive Government; but on the present occasion this duty was particularly disagreeable to him, because the gentleman named in the Motion was a personal Friend of his own, and the Government whose act he challenged was one under which he had served, and which still retained the confidence of the party to which it was his pride to belong. But there were occasions on which personal feeling and party allegiance must give way to a sense of duty, and he was satisfied that the great majority of the House—no matter into what lobby they would go when the division bell rang—would be of opinion, when the debate was over, that he could have adopted no other course than the one he was now pursuing, when all private remonstrance had failed to prevent the making of the appointment of which he now complained. For his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel White) he entertained the highest esteem. During the time he had been a Member of that House he had shown that he possessed abilities of no ordinary nature, and if ability was the sole qualification, there could be no objection to his appointment to the Lieutenancy of Clare. It was not on personal grounds that he objected to his hon. and gallant Friend's appointment. He objected to it on the ground that he was not qualified to be appointed to that high office, and that his appointment could not be justified by custom or usage. The office of Lord Lieutenant of a county was an office, as the House was aware, of a very important character. The Lieutenant of a county had practically the appointment of the magistrates of the county, for though legally the Lord Chancellor appointed them, he acted only on the recommendation of the Lieutenant. He had also the selection of Deputy Lieutenants from the magistracy whenever vacancies occurred, and though his duties with respect to the Militia were last year very much curtailed, he had still the nomination to first commissions of gentlemen who entered that force. The office was one of so much patronage and social rank that it was naturally an object of honourable ambition, and when a vacancy occurred it was the duty of the Executive to select a fit person for it. Now, what ought to be the qualifications which a Government anxious to discharge its duty should have in view

in selecting a Lieutenant of a county? He must, of course, be a man of character and integrity; and he thought it would also be generally agreed that he should be a man of property in the county, and a man of position in the county—and of such position, that the appointment, if it did not satisfy every one, should at least commend itself to the general good sense of the county. He should also be acquainted with the resident gentry, for he would otherwise, when applications were made to him for the appointment of magistrates or Deputy Lieutenants, be obliged to lean on the opinions of others, instead of acting on his own judgment. If possible, moreover, he ought to be a resident in the county, for a resident Lord Lieutenant could exercise a great influence. He could soften a good deal of that asperity which naturally arose in the course of party contests, and by exercising a liberal hospitality he might bring together people who would not, perhaps, meet except at the neutral board of the County Lieutenant. He would now inquire whether his hon. and gallant Friend possessed those qualifications? On the 22nd of April Lord Inchiquin, who had for many years with honour to himself and advantage to the country, discharged the duties of Lord Lieutenant of the county of Clare, died, and much speculation naturally ensued as to who would be his successor. Many names were mentioned and their various claims canvassed; but he could assure the House that among those names his hon. and gallant Friend was never mentioned. In the county of Clare he was only known as a younger son of Lord Annaly—as an officer in the Guards, living in London, and attending at London or Windsor, or wherever his regiment was stationed, and Member for Tipperary. When, after a time, the rumour began to circulate that he was to be appointed, it was treated as a joke, more particularly because at the same time it was also rumoured that the Vice Lieutenancy was to be conferred on a gentleman well known in Ireland and also in that House, and a particular friend of the hon. Member for Shaftesbury (Mr. Glyn). [“Name!”] He referred to Mr. William Lane Joynt. When subsequently it became known that the rumour was no joke, and that his hon. and gallant Friend was to be recommended to the Queen for the Lord Lieutenancy of Clare, although he did not possess a single acre of land in the county, had never resided there, and was a total stranger in it, the news not only created a sensation, but also a feeling of deep indignation, and it was considered that the appointment was an insult to the county and to its resident gentry. Upon the assembly of Parliament, after the Recess, his hon. Friend the Member for Kerry (Mr. H. A. Herbert) asked a Question of the Prime Minister, and he must say that a more extraordinary answer was never returned. At present he would only refer to one part of it—namely, that in which the right hon. Gentleman stated, in reply to the hon. Member for Kerry, that there was no legal qualification necessary for a Lord Lieutenant of a county in Ireland. Now, that might, perhaps, be strictly the case in point of law; but he should be able to show that a qualification was contemplated by the Legislature when it passed an Act establishing Lieutenancies in Ireland, and that pledges were given to both Houses by the Government of the day that that qualification should be for ever maintained. In England the Lieutenancy was a common law office, which had existed from the reign of Mary, and Hallam stated in his Constitutional History that it had generally since that time been filled by a Peer or gentleman of large estate in the county. In Ireland, however, up to 1831, no such office existed. Up to that time there was a Custos Rotulorum in each county in Ireland, who partly discharged the duties now devolving on the Lord Lieutenant of recommending magistrates, while there was one, two, or three Governors, according to the size of a county, who discharged the duties with regard to the Militia. It was thought by the Government of Earl Grey, in 1831, that this system of county government in Ireland was a bad one, and that the English system should supersede it. A Bill was accordingly introduced by the Government in that year and was passed into law (1 & 2 Will. IV. c. 17); and the 17th section of that Act showed, he thought, what the intention of Parliament was as to who should be a Lieutenant of a county. That section provided that whenever any Lieutenant of a county should be absent from Ireland, or in any case of sickness or other disability should be unable to act, it might be lawful for the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland by warrant to appoint a Vice Lieutenant during his absence or disability, and on return of the Lieutenant to Ireland he was to notify the fact, and thereupon the Lord Lieutenant would revoke the appointment of the Vice Lieutenant. This, he thought, was a declaration by the Legislature that nobody should be appointed a Lieutenant of a county in Ireland who was not a resident in Ireland. The intention of the Government and of the Legislature of that day was more clear when tested by the declarations made in debate. On July 4, 1831, Lord Melbourne, who had introduced this Bill into the House of Lords, in moving the second reading, said its object was to establish in each county in Ireland an officer through whom there would be a settled communication between the Irish Government and the magistracy of the county—a responsible person of known property, local knowledge, and integrity, who—among other duties—would inform the Government as to the qualifications of persons to be appointed to the Commission of the Peace.—[3 Hansard, iv. 644.] Again, the Duke of Wellington, on the second reading, said—

“He would particularly direct the notice of Government to one point as most essential, which was, that the persons intrusted with this power should be resident generally in Ireland. So important did he consider this that he would like an Amendment to be introduced into the first clause of the Bill requiring that no person exercising the power of recommending magistrates should quit the country without the permission of the Lord Lieutenant; and, when such permission was given, such person should not leave Ireland until he had appointed a deputy (subject to the approval of the Lord Lieutenant) to act for him in his absence.”—[3 Hansard, iv. 949.]

Earl Grey said on the same occasion—

“With respect to the qualifications of those persons, no doubt they should be of high character and rank, and above all, as suggested by the noble Duke, residents in the country. He had considered whether it would be possible to introduce into this Bill any limitation or provision to compel the Lords Lieutenant to reside in the country during the period of their appointment; but there was great difficulty on that point. In the first appointments, undoubtedly, residence would be an indispensable qualification, and he trusted the same qualification would be required under whatever Government the country would be placed The clause proposed by the noble Duke might be effectual, but it would place an extraordinary power in the hands of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, which might at some time be tyrannically exercised. He trusted that residence would be enforced, if not by a provision of the Bill, at least by whatever executive power might be in existence when the appointment was made."—[Ibid. 951.]

On the Report a clause was brought up by Lord Melbourne—the clause he had read—carrying out, as far as the Government thought they could safely do so, the suggestions of the Duke of Wellington. The Secretary for Ireland at that time, who had charge of the Bill in this House, was Lord Stanley, who said—

"This Bill would, he was convinced, tend greatly to promote the residence of the nobility and gentry in Ireland. Every Lord Lieutenant of a county when he left Ireland would be obliged to appoint a Vice Lieutenant, who, during the absence of the Lord Lieutenant, would execute the whole of the patronage. This would be a direct encouragement to the Lord Lieutenant to reside in Ireland."

In the following year, when a Motion was made complaining of one of these appointments, Lord Stanley again said—

"The object of the Government in bringing in this Bill had been to appoint persons residing in or contiguous to the county over which they would preside, who by their influence in the particular district, and by their residence, would be better able to attend to the interest of Ireland."

These passages, he thought, bore out his construction of the Act—that if a local qualification was not prescribed in the words of the Act, yet the intention of the Legislature was that no person should be appointed Lieutenant who had not at the time a bond fide residence in Ireland. He challenged the Government to prove that his hon. and gallant Friend had such a residence. If so, where was it? Where was he rated? Where were his servants? Where did he pay his income tax? On this ground alone the appointment should not have been made. Then what had been the custom since the passing of the Act of 1831? Out of 32 persons first appointed under the Act only six did not reside in the county in which they were made Lieutenants, and not one was without a residence in Ireland. From that time, as far as he was aware, every Lieutenant of a county had been a resident in Ireland, and nearly all had been residents in the county in which they acted. He did not say that residence in the county was indispensable; but he should cite some very high authorities to show that it was highly desirable. At the time when the present Secretary for

Sir Colman O'Loghlen

War (Mr. Cardwell) was Chief Secretary, and the Earl of Carlisle Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, a question arose in reference to the Lieutenancy of Londonderry; and in a debate which was originated by the Earl of Belmore in the House of Lords, Lord Carlisle said—

"I hold, moreover, the primary qualification for the office of Lord Lieutenant to be that of residing in the county; and it is well known that the noble Marquess referred to (the Marquess of Waterford) not only never resides in Londonderry, but resides in the county of Ireland that is most remote from Londonderry."—[3 Hansard, clviii. 1644.]

Then, defending the appointment of Mr. Lyle to the office, he said—

"Mr. Lyle has been for 15 years a Deputy Lieutenant of the county of which he is now made Lieutenant. He has regularly attended the noble juries, and he is intimately acquainted with the business, and with the gentry, and with the best interests of the county in which he resided."

Though he (Sir Colman O'Loghlen) did not go so far as to say that the law required residence in the county to which a Lieutenant was appointed, he did contend that such residence was most desirable. The first ground on which he impugned the appointment of his hon. and gallant Friend was that at the time of his appointment he had no residence in Ireland at all. His next ground of objection related to the possession of property in the county. No one denied that the possession of property in the county to which a gentleman was appointed Lord Lieutenant ought to be a necessary qualification for holding that office. But at the time the Prime Minister recommended his hon. and gallant Friend for the appointment of Lord Lieutenant of Clare the hon. and gallant Gentleman did not hold a single acre of and there. He might say, in passing, that the Act directed that the appointment of Lieutenants of counties in Ireland should be made by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, but the First Minister seemed to have taken the present one upon himself, and at the time he was appointed his hon. and gallant Friend was not the owner of a single acre in the county to which he was appointed. The First Minister stated this fact expressly in answering the hon. Member for Kerry—

"I hope," said the right hon. Gentleman, "I shall be able to answer my hon. Friend in a manner which will give some satisfaction to him. . . . It is true that I have recommended to Her Majesty's Government for the Lieutenancy of the county of Clare my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Tipperary (Colonel White)."

The House would recollect this answer was given on the 23rd of April. The right hon. Gentleman proceeded—

"Whether he is a Justice of the Peace or a Grand Juror of the county I am unable to say, because I have had no opportunity since the Notice of the Question was given of speaking to my hon. and gallant Friend on the subject; but I quite agree with my hon. Friend in what I take to be the substance of his Question—namely, that although there were not any legal conditions, yet there were attached to the office substantial conditions which it was most desirable to secure, and, moreover, that next to the qualifications of character and competent ability are the qualifications of property and residence. . . . My hon. Friend is aware that, although the hon. and gallant Member for Tipperary has not been down to the present time a landed proprietor in the county of Clare, his father, Lord Annaly, has hitherto been possessed of large estates in the county. Lord Annaly has determined to transfer forthwith to his son the absolute possession of those estates. That intention—and I hope it will not be thought a colourable qualification—having been announced to us spontaneously by Lord Annaly as a family arrangement, there still remains the question of residence. But we have also received an intimation that it is his (Colonel White's) intention to reside upon the estate. I believe there is a residence for all purposes that are necessary, and consequently we do not hold it would be necessary to inquire as to qualification, and into the amount of accommodation which the present residence affords, or whether my hon. and gallant Friend intends putting additions to it. I am not able to say whether the transfer of these estates in point of law has been absolutely completed; but substantially, both as to residence and property, my hon. Friend may consider the transfer as entirely and finally made."

Now, he ventured to say that this was one of the most extraordinary statements ever made by a Minister in this House. The right hon. Gentleman submitted to Her Majesty for the appointment the name of a gentleman who, he admitted, was not qualified by property to act as a Lieutenant of Clare. It was true a promise was made that he should be qualified; but he would ask what right had a Minister of the Crown to put the Lieutenancy of a county into a family settlement. It was most extraordinary that the Queen's Sign Manual should be put to a document in order that a family arrangement might be carried out for transferring estates from a father to a son. As he had said, the first question which he would submit was this, had his hon. and gallant Friend a residence in Ireland? He had not, and he challenged the right hon. Gentleman to prove that he had now or at the time of his appointment. In the second place, he submitted that his hon. and gallant Friend was not qualified, because at the time of his appointment he did not possess any property in Ireland. But assuming that residence in Ireland was not necessary; that actual property in Ireland was not necessary; and that a promise of property to be acquired was sufficient, he came to this question—which he considered a vital one—had his hon. and gallant Friend that position in the county at the time of the appointment which entitled him to be made a Lieutenant of Clare, and which would commend that appointment to the good sense of the county? What was the position of his hon. and gallant Friend in the county of Clare? There was no doubt that Lord Annaly did possess or had possessed considerable property in Clare; but it was not ancestral property. The noble Lord possessed ancestral property in the counties of Dublin and Longford, and he believed in other counties in Ireland, but none in Clare. His sole connection with that county was that 22 or 23 years ago Lord Annaly purchased property in Clare which had belonged to the Duke of Buckingham, and he had increased it by other property since acquired. But Lord Annaly never lived in the county nor any of his family. In 1859 there was a General Election, and Colonel Luke White came forward as a candidate for the county of Clare, not to defeat a political opponent, not to recover the county for the Liberal party, but to oust the Liberal Member for the county, Mr. Macnamara Calcott. The White family were new to the county, but Colonel Luke White was declared the sitting Member. A Petition was presented by Mr. Macnamara Calcott against his return. It was heard by a Committee, of which the present Lord Derby was Chairman, and the hon. Member for Berks (Mr. Walter) and the hon. Member for North Hants (Mr. Sclater-Booth) were Members, and the decision of the Committee was that Colonel Luke White was not duly elected, and that the election was void; and Colonel Luke White was disqualified for standing for the county on the ground that he had, by his agents, been guilty of bribery and treating. Mr. Macnamara Calcott started again for the county, and was opposed by the hon. and gallant Member for Tipperary. In the contest that ensued his hon. and gallant Friend was beaten by a majority of 2 to 1. Not satisfied, however, with his defeat, his hon. and gallant Friend petitioned the House against the return of Mr. Macnamara Calcott, but the Committee decided that Gentleman to be duly elected. From that day to this he ventured to say his hon. and gallant Friend had never been inside the bounds of the county. Such was the connection of the White family and of his hon. and gallant Friend with the county of Clare. The hon. Member for Kerry (Mr. H. A. Herbert) had asked whether his hon. and gallant Friend was a magistrate for the county. One reason for asking that question was that being a magistrate was considered to be the qualification in England for the office of Custos Rotulorum, which office was now united in Ireland with the Lieutenancy of the county. Blackstone stated that the Custos Rotulorum was always selected from among the justices of quorum, and was appointed on the grounds of his high character and acquaintance with the county business. But his hon. and gallant Friend was never a Justice of Peace of the county of Clare, or a Grand Juror—he never was a Poor Law Guardian, or even the governor of a lunatic asylum. In a social point of view his hon. and gallant Friend was equally a stranger to the county. He was not a member of the County Club or of the County Hunt. He was, in fact, a total stranger to the county—he had not a relative or connection in it, even if such matters were judged according to the custom of Scotland—where the relationship extended to the 131st cousin. It was a serious thing when they came to consider that a perfect stranger, who knew nothing of the county, and whose justice he had never administered, should have been put at the head of the county magistrates. The other point which Lord Carlisle considered essential for the position of Lieutenant of a county was that he should have a residence in it. He now challenged the First Minister to show that the hon. and gallant Member had any residence in Clare. On this point the answer already quoted was very curious. It ran—

"There still remains the question of residence. But we have also received an intimation that it is his (Colonel White's) intention to reside upon the estate."

Sir Colman O'Loghlin

Of course, if the hon. and gallant Member had said he would give up his position in the Army, abandon the delights of London life, and go and reside on his father's estates in Clare, no doubt he would do it; but it would certainly be a strange thing for him to do, at his time of life, and with the position he occupied in the Army. The answer continued—

"I believe there is a residence for all purposes that are necessary, and, consequently, we do not hold it would be necessary to inquire as to qualification and into the amount of accommodation which the present residence affords, or whether my hon. and gallant Friend intends putting additions to it."

The hon. and gallant Member, he believed, had no residence in the county of Clare at all, and if a month before his appointment to this office a letter had been addressed to "Colonel the Hon. Charles White, County Clare, Ireland," he assured the House it would have been returned to the Department so well presided over by the right hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Monsell)—the Dead-letter Department of the Post Office. He had since heard it said that Lord Annaly had a residence in the county of Clare, which, of course, would be transferred with the estates; and the name of it was given as Annaly Lodge, Broadford. For many years he had represented the county of Clare in this House, and until within the last week he never heard of Annaly Lodge, Broadford. On referring to Thom's Directory, he found mentioned there as residences of Lord Annaly—Woodlands, Clonsilla, county Dublin; Rathcline, county Longford, and Totness Park, Sunninghill, Berks; but Thom did not mention any residence in Clare, and he was glad to see the Attorney General making reference to that authority, as he would find there no mention of Annaly Lodge. Burke's Peerage, and Lodge's Peerage gave the same residences as Thom; and neither of them mentioned Annaly Lodge. The rate-book showed that this lodge, at which the Lieutenant was to dispense a generous hospitality—with all its greenhouses, stabling, &c.—was valued at £13 a-year. As the First Lord of the Treasury had accepted an invitation to Ireland he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would visit Annaly Lodge. The truth was, that eight or ten years ago Lord Annaly, or his agent, thought it expedient to build a small shooting lodge in Clare; and although it was roofed in, it was never finished; there was no furniture in it; and, of course, no member of the family had ever lived in it. True, there was a park or shooting woods attached to it; but the valuation of these, deducting the valuation of the lodge, was £35 10s. Was he not justified in bringing this appointment before the House? The gentleman appointed was most estimable in private life, and he deeply regretted that it was his duty to make these observations about him. "Some are born to greatness, some achieve greatness, and some have greatness thrust upon them;" and in this case the hon. and gallant Member had a position thrust upon him which he had no right to occupy, and for which he was perfectly unqualified, by want of residence in Ireland, by want of residence in the county, and by his being a perfect stranger to the county, and therefore totally unfit to discharge the duties of the office. Was it surprising that the gentlemen of Clare indignantly resented this appointment? They entertained, too, another objection which ought not to be overlooked by the House. Nothing was more dangerous to a Monarch than to have it believed that there was some person behind the Throne who ruled and directed everything. Nothing was more injurious to the Government of Lord Melbourne than the supposition that he acted under the influence of O'Connell, who was then a Member of this House. In modern times a Government had lost prestige because it was supposed to be influenced by a Member of the House not a Member of the Cabinet. A feeling existed in Clare that the real Lieutenant was another person. ["Name!"] It was not necessary to give the name; but he had no objection to state openly that the feeling in the county was that the real Lieutenant would be Mr. William Lane Joynt, Crown and Treasury Solicitor for Ireland. The county gentry had expressed their indignation in these words—

"We, the undersigned magistrates and Deputy Lieutenants of Clare, have heard with deep regret that Colonel the Honourable Charles White has been appointed Lord Lieutenant of this county. While recognizing in the fullest manner the right of the Executive Government to appoint any person they may think fit to be Lord Lieutenant of a county, we cannot but express our opinion that the person appointed to that high office should be connected with the county by residence and local knowledge of its magistracy and gentry. Colonel the Honourable Charles White has up to this time never resided in this county; he is not a magistrate or grand juror of it, and, being a total stranger to its residents, he must be entirely dependent on others, in the discharge of his duties, for local information. On these grounds we respectfully protest against his appointment to the office of Lord Lieutenant of this county, and call on our representatives in Parliament to take such steps as they may think proper to make this our protest known to Her Majesty's Government and to Parliament."

This protest was signed by 16 out of 19 Deputy Lieutenants of the county, and by 69 out of a magistracy numbering substantially between 90 and 100; in addition to which other names were coming in every day. In the face of this protest, he asked whether he was not fully justified in bringing this matter before the House? But this was not all. In pursuance of a requisition signed by Deputy Lieutenants and magistrates of the county, the High Sheriff of the county convened a public meeting of magistrates at Ennis, which was held last Saturday. This meeting was attended by 34 magistrates, and a resolution was passed expressing disapproval of the appointment of Colonel White, with but one dissentient. If Colonel White had friends—he did not mean personal friends, for the hon. and gallant Gentleman had no personal enemy, but if he was backed by any among the magistracy who approved his appointment—it would surely have been easy for them to have come forward and said so by their votes in a meeting of their own body openly convened by the High Sheriff of the county and as openly held. He was sorry to detain the House; but there was another branch of the subject to which he must refer. The appointment of his hon. and gallant Friend was defended out-of-doors on very curious grounds, one of which was that the White family had done good service to the Liberal cause in Ireland. He did not deny that the White family had rendered services to the Liberal cause in Ireland. The history of the election contests they had been engaged in, if written down in a book, would make a most curious and entertaining volume. The counties of Dublin, Longford, Leitrim, and Tipperary had witnessed battles fought by the White family on behalf of the Liberal cause. In the county of Clare they had also fought, but there it was not in support of the Liberal cause, but against a Liberal candidate. The family had not confined their attention either to county constituencies or to Ireland, but had visited the boroughs of Carrickfergus and Kildermister, of which last borough the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer must have a very grateful recollection. He did not dispute the claims of the White family to recognition by the Liberal Government. By the universal sanction of everyone who knew him the head of the family was raised to the Peerage, and was now in his old age surrounded by troops of friends; but why should another member of the family be rewarded by elevation to an office for which he was not fitted? If the family had not been sufficiently rewarded, why not make Lord Annaly a Viscount or an Earl—he would not go further, because Marquisates were reserved for the successful negotiators of treaties, and he did not think all the eloquence of the Crown and Treasury Solicitor in Ireland would be sufficient to induce the hon. Member for Shaftesbury (Mr. Glyn) to recommend the noble Lord for a Dukedom. If there was no other means of showing respect to the White family, he, for one, should not object to his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Tipperary (Colonel White) being raised to the Peerage alongside his father; and if that was not a sufficient reward, let him be made Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, an office which was about to become vacant, or Vice Chancellor of the Queen's University in Ireland, a post which was not at present vacant, but which his hon. Friend (Sir Dominic Corrigan) might, no doubt, be induced "spontaneously" to give up if proper language was used. All he objected to was the attempt to reward any member of the family by appointing him to an office he was not fitted to fill, and for which there were so many eligible candidates. He did not think it necessary to run through the whole catalogue of eligible persons; but as he had himself recommended one, he might mention his name. He alluded to Colonel Francis Macnamara, a descendant of one of the oldest families in the country, the owner of an estate more ample than that of Lord Annaly, a man who voted for the Liberal cause in that House for three years, and whose father held the county of Clare for the Liberal party during 22 years. He could name many other gentlemen who were also eminently well fitted for the office. Why not have appointed his hon. and gallant Colleague in the representation of the county (Colonel Vandeleur), who would be admirably well suited for the post, although he sat on the Conservative side of the House? If there was a proper person for a Lord Lieutenancy who held the opinions of the Government of the day, by all means let him be appointed; but the absence of such a man was no justification whatever for the appointment of an utter stranger. In the debate on a Motion brought forward in that House on the 13th of April, 1869, in reference to the appointment of a Lord Lieutenant of Cumberland, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) used the following words:—

"I am sure the House will not place me in the invidious position of having to go through a catalogue raisonné of the gentlemen in the county of Cumberland who might possibly be fit for the office of Lord Lieutenant; but I may say that their claims were thoroughly examined into, not in the light of party interests only, but with a due regard to the public weal. I have always been anxious, when in office, never to recommend any person to a high post under circumstances which would not command further confidence; and I should not have hesitated, in this instance, to have recommended a gentleman professing Whig politics, if it had been in my power to place before Her Majesty a name which should have immediately been recognized as an unimpeachable appointment. It is not a very easy thing to find a Lord Lieutenant, especially when the number from whom to choose is limited. There are gentlemen in the county who have estates, but who are not resident, and gentlemen who are resident, but have no estates So far from not having given the matter full consideration, I took pains to make myself acquainted with the general opinion of the county of Cumberland upon the subject, and I cannot see that I have been deceived in this respect."—[3 Hansard, cxcv. 736-7.]

In the case, also, of the appointment of a Lord Lieutenant for the county of Londonderry, the gentleman who was appointed differed in politics from the Government of the day. Another argument that had been used in favour of the appointment was that it was desirable to destroy the old régime in the county of Clare, under which "no Papist need apply" to be placed upon the Commission of the Peace. He regretted deeply the use of such language, and disbelieved entirely that the mere fact of a gentleman being a "Papist" would, under any circumstances, cause his being chosen for the magistracy. He at any rate was not animated in any way by considerations of party politics; but desired simply to see that done which would be most to the advantage of the county which he had the honour to represent. The fact was, that out of 32 Lieutenants of counties, 22 were Liberals, so that there was no political reason why a Liberal should be selected for the Lieutenancy of Clare. He apologized to the House for the time he had detained them. He did not consider that the Resolution in any way interfered with the Prerogative of the Crown, this patronage being really exercised by the Ministry. It was casting no slur upon Her Majesty when he asked the House to say that this was an appointment of evil example which ought not to be followed. It tended directly to absenteeism—it tended to disparage the local gentry—it told them—"You may discharge all the duties of your station and act as magistrates and grand jurors; but when the highest honours of the county become vacant you are not fitted to fill them, no matter what may be your title, wealth, or position; and we will put in a stranger over your head," That was not the way to govern Ireland. It was not governing Ireland according to "Irish ideas" when absentees were appointed and the local gentry, who acted in times of difficulty and danger, were passed over. He had brought forward this subject with great regret and pain, for the hon. and gallant Gentleman whose appointment he questioned was a personal Friend of his own, and possessed influence in Clare. It was not a pleasant thing to attack an influential supporter of his in his own county; but he had felt it his duty to do so, and having done his duty must now leave the House to do theirs. The right hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That this House has heard with great regret that a gentleman has been appointed Lord Lieutenant of Clare who has never resided in that county, who is a stranger to its Magistrates, and who does not possess that local knowledge of the county and its residents essential to the proper discharge of the important duties of a Lieutenant of a County, and that this House is of opinion that such an appointment is of evil example, and ought not to have been made." — (Sir Colman O'Loghlen.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON :
I think the House will agree with me that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has brought forward his Motion in a speech of great ability, though we may perhaps think it might with advantage have been somewhat curtailed. I am quite ready to admit that he has, on the whole, treated what must have been to him a painful subject in a temperate and moderate spirit, excepting a few allusions which might, I think, have been omitted. He has given us some details, which were scarcely necessary, as to the history of the White family, the elections they have contested, and the claims he thinks they thus possess upon the Government. But, on the other hand, the right hon. and learned Gentleman has given us a great deal of interesting and valuable information, both respecting the institution of Lieutenants of counties, and the history of the families in the county he knows so well. I do not in the least underrate the importance of the Motion he has brought before the House. To a certain extent, I am perfectly aware, it is a Vote of Censure upon the whole Government, and it is a most direct Vote of Censure upon the Irish Government, which I represent. I say I do not underrate the importance of the Motion; but I hope it will not be thought that I am guilty of any disrespect either to the right hon. and learned Gentleman or to the House, if I do not emulate the length to which he ran, but attempt to dispose of a very simple matter in a short and very simple way. The question before the House is really not whether Colonel White is the most fit of all the candidates for the Lieutenancy of Clare; but whether he is a properly and duly qualified candidate. So far as I can make out, his qualifications are impugned upon three grounds. The first objection is, that when appointed to the office he was not possessed of any property in the county; secondly, it is said that he is not now, and has not been, a resident in the county; and thirdly, that he is not possessed of any local knowledge of the county or the magistracy. Now, the right hon. and learned Gentleman is himself obliged to admit, as to the first of these objections, that the possession of property is not a legal qualification. About that point there is no doubt. Her Majesty's Government are quite as willing to admit, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman can be, that property in the county is an essential though not a legal qualification for the office. As far as I am aware, however, it has never been held that the actual possession of property is essential, if the person appointed were known and recognized as heir to large estates. The right hon. and learned Gentleman can hardly be ignorant of the fact that in several instances the, eldest sons or heirs to large estates have been appointed without the smallest objection by anyone. In this way the present Duke of Rutland, then Marquess of Granby, was, I believe, appointed Lord Lieutenant of Lincolnshire. Though not then possessed of any property in the county, he was no doubt perfectly qualified as the heir to large estates there, and well acquainted with the county. A more recent appointment was called in question in this House. On the resignation of the late Lord Lonsdale, his nephew, Colonel Lowther, was made joint Lieutenant of Cumberland and Westmoreland. He was heir to his uncle; but as far as I am aware, was not possessed of property in either county, and the case is a strong one because, though the appointment was questioned here, not one word was said about the absence of a property qualification. Colonel White was designated by Lord Annaly as heir to large estates in Clare, and we, therefore, considered that, so far as a property qualification was essential, that condition was entirely fulfilled. On this part of the subject the right hon. and learned Gentleman made an allusion which I think cannot be justified. He intimated that property had been transferred to Colonel White, in order to give him the necessary qualification. That insinuation is, I am happy to say, entirely without foundation. I should not have thought it necessary to mention the circumstances, unless that insinuation had been made; but I happen to know that some little time ago, during the lifetime of the late Lord Lieutenant of Clare, who was in extremely bad health, the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland asked Lord Annaly whether, in the event of a vacancy, and in the event of his being considered an eligible candidate, he would desire that the Lieutenancy should be conferred upon his eldest son, Colonel Luke White; and at that time Lord Annaly informed my noble Friend that the Clare estates would be left to his second son, Colonel Charles White. No more was said about the matter at that time; but this fact disposes of the insinuation that the appointment of Colonel Charles White had anything to do with his inheritance of these estates. The second objection to the appointment is, that Colonel White has not hitherto been a resident in the county. I consider this the most important objection, and it seems to me the only point upon which an explanation is really required. I am quite willing to admit that residence is an essential qualification for the office of Lieutenant of a county. Indeed, I go further than the right hon. and learned Gentleman goes on this point. He says that residence in Ireland is an essential qualification, while residence in the county is only desirable. Now, a man may reside in Dublin, and may be no more fit to discharge the duties of the office than if he resided in London. But residence in the county, if not a legal, is, I think, an essential qualification; and upon this point the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and the Government thought it necessary to institute an inquiry. There was a difficulty in the filling-up of this appointment. No doubt the absence of residence in the county was an objection to Colonel White. That was stated both to Lord Annaly and to Colonel White, and we received assurances from them which were satisfactory. The promise of my hon. and gallant Friend was as good as anything more formal, and we received from him an assurance that as, by the act of his father, he had been made one of the largest landed proprietors in the county of Clare, he intended becoming a resident proprietor, and to reside in the county during a part of the year. I acknowledge that my hon. and gallant Friend did not express any intention of giving up either his position in the Army or his seat in this House; but I should be surprised if holding a commission in the Household Troops or a seat in this House should be any disqualification for the post of Lord Lieutenant of a county. Of course, these duties would take up a considerable portion of my hon. and gallant Friend's time; but having the distinct assurance of my hon. and gallant Friend that he will reside during a portion of the year in the county, that is sufficient. The third objection to the appointment is, that my hon. and gallant Friend does not possess any knowledge of the county, or any acquaintance with the magistrates. I presume, however, the explanation I have given on the question of residence will almost answer this point also. We admit that my hon. and gallant Friend does not at present possess a knowledge of the county; but we submit that it is not required that a Lieutenant should have knowledge of the county as regards the past, or even that he should have present knowledge of the county, but that he should be in a position to possess such knowledge in the future. The Lord Lieutenant of a county is not required to write a history of the county over which he is called to preside. His duty is to make himself acquainted with the magistrates, and with the persons who are eligible to be magistrates, and with those also who are eligible for commissions in Militia regiments, that he may judge of their fitness for the posts they seek. If the pledge given to us is acted on—as I have no doubt it will be—residence in the county will give knowledge of the county, and enable my hon. and gallant Friend to watch the interests of the county. The right hon. and learned Gentleman has referred to the debate on the Lieutenancy Bill, and he quoted a passage from a speech by Lord Grey which did not tell very much in his favour. Lord Grey attached so much importance to residence, that he questioned whether it would not be expedient to introduce a clause in the Bill making it imperative. We entirely concur in Lord Grey's view; but Lord Grey did not require that the Lord Lieutenant should have resided in the county, but that he would reside there. It never occurred to Lord Grey, or to any other reasonable person, that previous knowledge of the county was essential, as long as there was a reasonable assurance that future residence would enable the holder of the office to acquire the necessary knowledge. But the right hon. and learned Gentleman went on to assure us that Colonel White was not objected to so much on account of personal unfitness, as from the fact that the real patronage of the county would fall into the hands of the Treasury Solicitor, Mr. Lane Joynt, to whom the right hon. and learned Gentleman alluded as the shadow which stood behind the Throne. This shadow seemed greatly to haunt the imagination of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. Upon one occasion the right hon. and learned Gentleman applied to me with reference to the appointment of a governor of a lunatic asylum in the county of Clare, and when there was some slight hesitation about appointing the right hon. and learned Gentleman's nominee, he wrote an extremely indignant letter to me, saying he knew the question of the appointment had been referred to Mr. Lane Joynt, whose shadow would stand behind the Throne. In my reply to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, I assured him that not a single word had been written or spoken to Mr. Lane Joynt upon the subject, and he assured me on that occasion that he was perfectly satisfied. I hope that upon this occasion he will be satisfied with my assurance, when I tell him that not one word has been said or written to Mr. Lane Joynt upon this subject, either by myself or by any other Member of the Government. I hope the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel White) will, if he addresses the House at a later period of this debate, give the right hon. and learned Gentleman equal satisfaction, by his assurance that in the administration of the affairs of the Lieutenancy he will act upon his own opinion, and not allow himself to be overshadowed by the terrible spectre which haunts the imagination of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. I cannot leave this correspondence without recalling to the mind of the right hon. and learned Gentleman that in one of his letters he laid down the principle that appointment to the governorships of lunatic asylums was the undoubted privilege of the county Member. I do not know whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman thinks the appointment of the Lord Lieutenancy is also part of the undoubted patronage of the county Members. He did not say so to-night in as distinct terms as he laid down the other principle in the correspondence I have referred to; but I must demur to both with equal decision. Now, Sir, I do not know whether the House desires me to enter upon a discussion of the merits of the other candidates for the office. ["No, no!"] I can assure the House I will gladly abstain from doing so. The next point to which I have to refer is the reference made by the right hon. and learned Gentleman to what he describes as a protest signed by the county magistrates against the appointment of Colonel White. I have seen no protest; I do not know anyone who has; I have seen a report in the newspapers of a meeting on the subject; and that meeting does not seem to me to tell in favour of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. We were told there was great excitement in the county, and that the magistrates had met to protest against the appointment. But that meeting was attended by only 32 gentlemen, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman did not inform the House the number of magistrates in the county of Clare.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, there were 150 on the roll, and between 90 and 100 resident in the county.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: But out of the 150 on the roll only 32 met to protest against an appointment which we are told is universally regarded as an insult to the magistracy of the county. The right hon. and learned Gentleman says the resolution was carried unanimously, and asks why, if the feeling were not general, no opposition had been raised against the protest. But it is hardly reasonable to expect that the supporters of the gentleman appointed would attend a meeting called to condemn the appointment. I am not surprised that the solitary gentleman who did attend the meeting in the interest of my hon. and gallant Friend did not secure a seconder; and I must say he is a friend who is more to be commended for the warmth of his attachment than for his discretion. I do know something about the magistrates who attended the meeting, and I am informed that a considerable number of them were not magistrates possessed of any property whatever in the county, but were merely agents of others, and gentlemen whose opinions therefore could not be regarded as of very great weight. But when the right hon. and learned Gentleman asks by whom this protest was signed, I should like to hear from him or from some of his Friends, by whom it was prepared, and whether it emanated from the county of Clare or from the right hon. and learned Gentleman and his Friends. I am quite ready to admit that there is dissatisfaction in the county on the subject of this appointment; but I do not believe that that dissatisfaction originated in the county, nor that it originated in the county, and was transferred to the right hon. and learned Gentleman as the mouthpiece of the county. I believe—and I am sorry to say it—that it originated in a feeling of disappointment—I will not say of anything else—on the part of certain hon. Gentlemen who are a great deal nearer to this House than the county of Clare. I believe it originated much more in London than in the county of Clare. If that be the true explanation, as I believe it is, of all this business, I can hardly imagine that this House, although it likes to take up a great number of multifarious subjects, will deem it to be part of its functions, or one of its bounden duties, to redress the wrongs of gentlemen who might think they have a claim to the office of Lord Lieutenant of Clare superior to that of my hon. and gallant Friend. If it can be shown that my hon. and gallant Friend is in any way unfitted for the post he holds, I can understand the House taking up the matter. But it has been acknowledged in an ample manner by the right hon. and learned Gentleman that every personal qualification that is required for his position is possessed by my hon. and gallant Friend. I have shown that in our opinion—and I hope also in the opinion of the House—the Lord Lieutenant of Clare has all the substantial and legal qualifications that are necessary; and I trust, therefore, the House will not make itself the means of redressing the fancied wrongs—for I cannot allow that they are real wrongs—of any hon. Gentleman who may think that he has been passed over in this instance. The right hon. and learned Gentleman mentioned that this matter of the appointment of Lords Lieutenant of Irish counties is one which is vested by Act of Parliament entirely in the hands of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. Now, my noble Friend the present Lord Lieutenant of Ireland is perfectly ready to take the responsibility of the appointments he has made of Lords Lieutenant of counties in every case, and especially in this case. It is true that these appointments are of such importance that my noble Friend never makes one of them without consulting my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government, and I may here say that my right hon.

The Marquess of Hartington

Friend is perfectly prepared to take any responsibility that may belong to him on this question. The real responsibility, however, practically rests with my noble Friend the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and he is quite ready to bear it. I could have desired that my noble Friend had an opportunity of defending in the House of Lords his appointments, in the same way as the late Lord Carlisle, when Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, once had of defending his; but as the statement of his case has devolved not on him, but on me, I may be allowed to say what my noble Friend could not have said of himself—and that is that I conscientiously believe there never was a Lord Lieutenant of Ireland who has acted under a greater sense of responsibility, or with greater care and attention in regard to all appointments, than my noble Friend has done ever since he became Lord Lieutenant. I do not believe that any Lord Lieutenant of Ireland ever took more pains than he has taken to make himself personally and locally acquainted with that country, and with every county in it—the most remote as well as those near to Dublin. I also do not think that any of his predecessors have taken more pleasure in the discharge of the duties of his office. I think he esteems it a great honour to hold the high office he fills. I am certain he has a feeling of pride in the execution of its duties, and that he would not wish to continue one moment in that position if the House of Commons asserts—as it would assert by assenting to the Motion of the right hon. and learned Gentleman—that he is capable of making a corrupt or an unworthy use of the patronage which is attached to it.

MR. HERON said, he wished to state the reasons why he must vote against the Motion. He entirely disagreed from the right hon. and learned Gentleman who had made it, both as regarded the law he had laid down in reference to his Motion, and also as to the expediency of the Motion itself. He maintained that in England, in Scotland, and in Ireland, the office of Lord Lieutenant of a county being regulated by statute, there was no qualification attached to that office, and that gentlemen had been repeatedly appointed Lords Lieutenant in all three parts of the United Kingdom by previous Governments who had neither residence nor property in the counties over which they were placed. He would enumerate the case of the Earl of Mansfield, who was made Lieutenant of Clackmannan by Lord Derby's Government in 1852; the case of the Earl of Dalkeith, who was made Lieutenant of the county of Dumfries in 1858. Sir Graham Montgomery who was made Lieutenant of Kinrossshire in 1854; and the Earl of Wemyss had been made Lieutenant of Peeblesshire in 1853, having no residence there but the Castle of Nidpath, which for years had been in ruins. Was it, he asked, intended to issue a Commission to inquire whether property and residence in their counties existed in regard to all Lords Lieutenant appointed either by Lord Derby's, Lord Aberdeen's, or any other Ministry, and rightly appointed, as he assumed, because no exception had been taken to their nomination? His own opinion was, that the Motion had been thrust upon the right hon. and learned Gentleman by three owners of property in Clare, who considered themselves entitled to the appointment. References had been made to the elections in which the White family had been engaged from the year 1812 to the present time; but the election proceedings of that family had proved of some use, he believed, to the cause of Catholic Emancipation. On the part of the Irish Roman Catholics he begged to express his satisfaction that the family of Colonel White, who had stood by their cause in the time of Catholic Emancipation, had at length had its claims recognized. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said he had no objection to the appointment of the hon. and gallant Gentleman on either personal or public grounds. It must, therefore, be upon local grounds that the right hon. and learned Gentleman objected to the appointment, and those grounds must be founded in the belief that Colonel White would abuse the trust that was placed in him by permitting Mr. William Lane Joynt actually to make all the appointments which were nominally made by the Lord Lieutenant. He was satisfied that the hon. and gallant Gentleman would not be guilty of such conduct. The hon. and gallant Gentleman had been assailed most unhandsomely on this occasion, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman, while declaring that he only made this Motion on public grounds, had condescended to enter into the meanest personal details. Everyone knew that the hon. and gallant Gentleman would discharge his duties with honour and with great ability; and under these circumstances he trusted the House would not allow to succeed a Motion which was instigated by political hostility, by political rivalry, and by political disappointment.

MR. H. A. HERBERT wished to assure the hon. and gallant Member for Tipperary (Colonel White), that in the remarks he was about to make he was actuated by a feeling of public duty, and not by a wish to annoy him. He must, however, say that he did not like the way in which the hon. and gallant Gentleman had been made the Lord Lieutenant of the county of Clare over the heads of the magistrates who had lived for years in that county, and who must, therefore, possess a knowledge of those who lived in it which he necessarily could not have. While admitting that the hon. and gallant Gentleman had discharged his duties in the Army and in that House with great ability and energy, he could not help being influenced in his judgment as to the expediency of the appointment by the fact that he had not possessed any property in the county at the time he was selected by the Government to fill the office, and that he was not then a resident in Ireland. No doubt his father meant to leave the property to him; but supposing the father were to die in the meantime intestate, there would be a Lord Lieutenant for Clare without any property in the county. Absenteeism had given rise to great evils, and the Government were wrong in encouraging it, by appointing an absentee to such an office. He was glad to hear that the hon. and gallant Gentleman was going to reside in the county; those who knew him as well as he did would acknowledge that he was a good fellow; but he doubted much whether he would reside there—although he said he would—for a sufficient time to enable him to acquire that knowledge of the people, which was requisite for the holder of the office of Lord Lieutenant of the county.

MR. STACPOOLE said, that the appointment of an absentee to this office had given rise to considerable excitement in the county, a feeling which was not confined to the magistracy, but was generally entertained by the people at large. The people of Clare did not like to have a man whom they had scarcely seen put over their heads. The hon. and gallant Member for Tipperary (Colonel White) had stood for the county in 1860, when he had opposed a Liberal candidate, and when there were expressions used which he did not like to repeat. As an ex-magistrate of Clare, he begged to enter his protest against this appointment.

MR. OSBORNE: I wish to say a few words upon this subject, not because I am particularly well acquainted with the county of Clare, although I know that the hunting to which the right hon. and learned Gentleman has alluded is the worst in Ireland, but because I am a constituent of my hon. Friend—and I call him "my hon. Friend" not in the sense in which he has been so called to-night by some of his "damn'd good-natured friends." ["Order!"] Are hon. Members not aware that it is a quotation? If The Critic is an improper book to quote from, I apologize to you, Sir, for having used the expression—I call him my hon. Friend, not because I take a particular interest in Clare, but because I am proud of the hon. and gallant Member for Tipperary, because I know his good qualities as a man and his ability as a Member of this House. While I can do full justice to the feelings evinced on this occasion; while I know the sensitiveness which has been evoked by the hon. Member for Ennis (Mr. Stacpoole), who was a candidate for this office; while I acknowledge the disinterested manner in which, feeling that disappointment keenly, he has thrown up the Commission of the Peace of that county; while I do justice to the motives of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for that county; while I acknowledge the variety of information which, through the means of this Paper, he conveys to the House, the multitudinous Motions which he puts upon it; and while I admire his great ability in every respect—more especially in having lately extracted the longest answer from the Attorney General that ever was given; while I still more admire the paternal ingenuity with which he contrived to make away with his own legislative bantling by performing the "happy despatch" upon it on a late occasion, I regret that in this instance he has been seduced, by what I call the parochial animus, to make this great storm in the House about a very little matter. I regret it the more from one in his position, considering his descent and his politics, and I think I may address him in the words of Cassius to Brutus—

“Brutus, I do observe you now of late :
I have not from your eyes that gentleness
And show of love that I was wont to have.
You bear too stubborn and too strange a hand
Over your friend that loves you.”

I regret that the right hon. and learned Gentleman should have borne so heavy a hand on the present occasion. He did not in the whole course of his very carefully-elaborated speech say a single word to show that my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Tipperary is not a fit and proper person to be appointed Lord Lieutenant of the county of Clare. If the Hon. Charles White is a fit person to represent the interests of the great county of Tipperary in this House, much more is he fit to reign over the magistrates of Clare, and appoint those strange creatures called Deputy Lieutenants, of whom I could never yet make out the use. There is an old proverb which says that if one Irishman is put on a spit there will immediately be found two more to turn him. Of the justice of that proverb we have had an example to-night. An attempt has been made to throw discredit on the White family, on account of the money which they have spent in elections; but my right hon. and learned Friend ought to be the last person to deal in any expressions of that kind. He alluded to the election for Clare in 1859. Has he forgotten that great election for the same county which shook the fetters from the Roman Catholics, when O'Connell stood for Clare, and was materially assisted by the White of that day? He should have recalled that election to mind, before he said a word in disparagement of the grandson of that gentleman. And what, let me ask, is this office of Lord Lieutenant, about which we have heard so much? The qualifications for it, I believe, are generally supposed to be property, residence, and, above all, a political diploma. Well, nobody can deny that my hon. and gallant Friend has, or will have, considerable property in Clare. It is true a most ungenerous attempt has been made to turn into ridicule the rating of Annaly

House; but it is an attempt which is, I think, unworthy of the occasion. As to residence, I congratulate the county of Clare on having got among them a gentleman whom they cannot fail to regard as being one good Irishman the more; and as to political diploma, there may in this respect have been some neglect on the part of the Government, for they might have remembered the unswerving devotion of the hon. Member for Ennis, who, on all questions, except, perhaps, relating to a Royal residence in Ireland, has proved himself to be one of their most constant supporters. I hope he will continue to be so, for I do not understand that he has resigned his seat for Ennis. With regard to my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Tipperary, it is well known that he opposed the Government on the Land Bill, on the Re-organization of the Army Bill, and on the Peace Preservation Bill. I trust he will continue to hold the same independent course, and that he will not be seduced by the baubles of a Lord Lieutenancy. But I regret that this question has ever come before the House. I think it was unworthy of the position of the right hon. and learned Gentleman to have brought it forward, and unworthy of the House to entertain it. Whether the House entertains it or not, and whatever the shortcomings of the Government may be, I do not for a moment imagine that their conduct in this instance will be censured by the Irish votes. The right hon. and learned Gentleman has been commissioned by 31 magistrates out of 150 who met in a hole and corner—no one else being admitted, but I hope he will rest satisfied with having called attention to the subject; but in any case I trust the House will not express its disapproval of the conduct of the Government, but will, I was almost going to say, thank them for having made so bold and good and honest a choice.

SIR DOMINIC CORRIGAN expressed his thanks to the Government for having made an appointment in which not only Clare, but he might say the whole of Ireland, was interested, for the Irish people were glad to see a compliment paid to a member of a family who had fought their battles in past times. The House had been told that 30 magistrates had assembled at a hole-and-corner meeting and protested against the appointment to the Lord Lieutenancy of Clare. But Clare had a population of 130,000. Why was not an aggregate meeting called and the general opinion asked? Why, the result would have been an approval of the appointment. An objection had been made to the appointment of Colonel White that he was a stranger to the county of Clare. The magistrates of Clare had taken that view. But in 1829 the magistrates of Clare took the same view. They objected to O'Connell because he was a stranger. O'Connell replied that he was identified with the people of Clare in everything that could identify man with man. The Government had done nothing more than repay a debt of gratitude which every Liberal in Ireland owed to the White family.

COLONEL WHITE said, it was not his intention to detain the House more than a few moments—in the first place, because he was physically incapacitated from doing so; and, in the second place, because he thought it would be more modest, and would show more proper feeling on his part, if he were to leave the defence of his appointment in the hands of those who were so well capable of defending it, if they deemed it to be right. He would not even touch on the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman who brought forward the Motion (Sir Colman O'Loghlen), save to say that he thought the right hon. Baronet might have spared him and his family the sneer in which in the course of it he deemed it right to indulge. He would say very little or nothing with regard to the compliment the right hon. and learned Gentleman had paid him in supposing that he was not competent to discharge the duties and responsibilities attached to the office of Lord Lieutenant of Clare. The right hon. and learned Gentleman, he durst say, had some reason for thinking that he (Colonel White) was not fit for that office; but he was not quite sure that the sentiment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman was reciprocated by the Gentleman to whom he had referred. The feeling which he (Colonel White) experienced at the present moment on this subject was an intensely painful one—so painful that it might be wondered that he still cared to be Lord Lieutenant of Clare. If his personal feelings were to be consulted in this matter, he should be bound to relinquish the honour which had been conferred upon him; but nothing would induce him to take that step short of a decisive vote of the House, and for this reason—that if he did so, he should be doing that which, in the first place, would be unjust to himself; and, in the second place, would be unjust to those who had done him the honour of appointing him to this post, and of supposing that he was competent to discharge the duties and responsibilities attached to it. But, above all, if he did so, he would be doing that which was unjust to the Liberal gentry and to the people of the county of Clare, and not only to them, but to the Liberal party in the South of Ireland. He looked upon this appointment as the embodiment of the principle that religious or political opinion ought not to debar a gentleman of position, a gentleman of worth, a gentleman of loyalty, a gentleman of high standing and of credit from an equal share, at least, in the administration of local affairs; and that it was not for the public weal that any section or clique should monopolize the privileges, honours, and responsibilities attached to such an office. For his own part, he could only say that it should be his endeavour, if the House thought fit to ratify the appointment the Government had made, by a consistent course of entire impartiality to do his best to obliterate the unpleasant feelings which might exist at present. And as to the future, he had far too exalted an opinion of the sense of fair play, justice, and good feeling of the magistracy and gentry of the county of Clare to suppose for one moment that he would not be welcomed when he went amongst them—as go he would—with that kindness, courtesy, and good feeling which he was sure they could not fail to extend to one whose aim would be to convince them that his only desire was to do that which was right.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, the hon. and learned Member for Tipperary (Mr. Heron) had endeavoured to justify this appointment by referring to the appointments of certain noblemen as Lords Lieutenant in Scotland. The hon. and learned Member said that Lord Wemyss had no residence in the county of which he was appointed Lord Lieutenant. He believed the hon. and learned Member was grievously misinformed on that subject. The hon. and learned Member said the Earl of Mansfield had no property in the county of which he was appointed Lord Lieutenant. On that subject also, he believed the hon. and learned Member was grievously misinformed. And as to the Earl of Dalkeith, he had been a resident during the greater part of his life in the county of which he was appointed Lord Lieutenant, and was the heir of enormous property there. The hon. and learned Gentleman ought to have known the difference between a heir presumptive and a heir apparent. He (Lord Claud Hamilton) complimented the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel White) on his ability. He had always heard him spoken of in the highest terms, and therefore he regretted to have to record a vote against his appointment.

MR. HORSMAN said, he was induced to say a few words in consequence of what had fallen from the noble Lord who had just sat down. He confessed that until a recent period it was his intention not to have taken a part in the division. During the last few hours he made himself acquainted with the facts, which had very much changed his opinion. The noble Lord who had just spoken had alluded to some appointments which were made by Conservative Ministries, between which and the appointment of his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel White) he said there was a great distinction; and he talked of the difference between heir presumptive and heir apparent. Well, what were the facts of this case? A vacancy occurring in the Lord Lieutenancy of Clare, it was quite open to the Government, according to the rule which prevailed in such matters, to select a Peer, and appoint Lord Annaly to the office, as the Earl of Lonsdale had been appointed to the Lord Lieutenancy of Cumberland and Westmoreland, and the Duke of Buccleuch to the Lord Lieutenancy of Dumfries. Lord Annaly, he believed, was in his 83rd year, and was not desirous of taking a new office. Lord Lonsdale did not wish to retain the office of Lord Lieutenant of Cumberland and Westmoreland, and he applied to the Government to appoint Colonel Lowther, who had not an acre in those counties, Lord Lieutenant of them. That appointment was challenged in the House. There was not a Conservative in the House who did not defend that appointment, and who did not feel that Colonel Lowther, from his education, his position and character, was a fit man to fill that appointment, although he had not an acre of property in those counties. The Duke of Buccleuch was appointed to the counties of Mid-Lothian and Dumfries; and for the latter he recommended his son, the Earl of Dalkeith, although he had not an acre of landed property in that county. Was there a Conservative who would not have defended that appointment? Lord Annaly was Lord Lieutenant of two counties and he declined to accept another appointment. What was the difference between the case of Lord Annaly and that of the Duke of Buccleuch? Lord Annaly said—"I do not wish to take this appointment, but there is the heir of my estates in that county; appoint him." What was the difference between an heir presumptive and an heir apparent? It was well known to the Friends of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Tipperary, and also to the Government, that he was as much the heir of Lord Annaly in the county of Clare as the Earl of Dalkeith was the heir of the Duke of Buccleuch. The Government were aware that under family arrangements he would have property which would qualify him for the Lord Lieutenancy of the county of Clare. Allusion had been made to the past election contests of the White family in Ireland, and he might remark that he knew more respecting this subject than his right hon. and learned Friend (Sir Colman O'Loughlen), because it happened that the first Election Committee on which he had ever sat unseated the present Lord Annaly, one of three brothers who had been returned to Parliament in the hottest conflicts ever known in Ireland. Those brothers were regarded as the strength and stay of the Liberal party among Liberal Protestants at a time when Liberal Protestants were rare. Hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House prided themselves on their party zeal and fidelity, and he was surprised, therefore, at their finding fault with Her Majesty's Government for recognizing party services. His hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Tipperary was not a weak specimen of aristocratic imbecility, but a Member of that House whose ability and manliness had made him an object of respect to his opponents, of admiration to his friends, and the pride of the Irish Representatives. His hon. and gallant Friend possessed those qualifications which were calculated to make him popular in the county, and he knew no man who possessed them in a higher degree than his hon. and gallant Friend. He agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for Waterford (Mr. Osborne) in thanking the Government for making the appointment, and he hoped that after the unanimous expression of opinion in the House in favour of the appointment, his right hon. and learned Friend would not press his Motion to a division.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Dowse) said, he rose for the purpose not of delivering a speech, but of making a statement as to a matter of fact. His right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Clare (Sir Colman O'Loghlen) had objected to this appointment on the ground that his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Tipperary had not when appointed a residence in the county of Clare. The truth, however, was, that at the present time the hon. and gallant Gentleman had in the county as good a residence for all practical purposes as any gentleman possessed in it. To show that residence in the county was not a necessary qualification he would cite the case of the Duke of Abercorn, who was appointed Lord Lieutenant of the county of Donegal, in which county he had large estates, but no residence. [Cheers.] He was not detracting from the merit of that appointment, but he was mentioning a fact. The noble Duke had a residence, no doubt, in the county of Tyrone. His hon. and gallant Friend was neither heir apparent nor heir presumptive; but his father made a will some years ago. [An hon. MEMBER: His father is not dead yet.] Well, according to the hon. Gentleman opposite a man could not make his will till he was dead. At all events, he hoped the sapient legislator who had just interrupted him would not wait until he was dead before he made his will. Perhaps, the hon. Gentleman was thinking that a will was an "ambulatory" instrument which could be altered in the testator's lifetime. The truth was that Lord Annaly bequeathed his estates in the county of Clare and in an adjoining county, worth £13,000 a-year, to his son the hon. and gallant Member for Tipperary, and his Lordship had lately, and before the appointment was made, executed a deed conveying them absolutely to the hon. and gallant Member, who was now in possession of them. He apprehended that would satisfy the hon. Member opposite. At the present moment the hon. and gallant Member was possessed of an estate worth nearly £9,000 a-year in the county of Clare, with a residence upon that estate, and also of another estate worth £4,000 a-year in an adjoining county. In his opinion such a man, an officer in the Guards, and a Member of that House, was a fit person to be appointed Lord Lieutenant of the county. It had been objected that his hon. and gallant Friend would be the Custos Rotulorum of the county, albeit he was not a magistrate; but the fact was that every Lord Lieutenant was ex officio in the Commission of the Peace. He might remark, however, that the late Lord Roden was removed from the Commission of the Peace in 1849, but nevertheless he retained the office of Custos Rotulorum until his death in 1870.

MR. BUTT said, he would not have spoken if there was not a voice that ought to be heard, and that was the voice of the people of the county who had the chief interest in this appointment. There had been no expression of local opinion during the debate. The city he represented (Limerick) bordered on Clare, and he had thought it his duty to endeavour to ascertain from his constituents, and from the people of Clare, what was the popular opinion on this subject. He had to say distinctly that the popular opinion—and he was not speaking of discontented magistrates who might, like the "moping owl," feel offended because a stranger had entered into their county to "disturb their ancient solitary reign"—was in favour of this appointment. From intelligence he had received to-day, the popular voice throughout the whole western district of the South of Ireland was in favour of it; and the appointment was a proof that manly independence in that House would not prevent a man from receiving an appointment which had been too often reserved for the obsequious followers of a Minister. He believed there was a great deal of exaggeration about the dissatisfaction of the gentry. He objected, however to the House of Commons reviewing the appointments of the Executive Government. That course was quite unconstitutional; and the power of the House consisted in being at liberty to censure the Government, if there was anything in an appointment that called for interference.

LORD HENRY SCOTT asked the indulgence of the House while he contradicted a statement made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Liskeard (Mr. Horsman), with reference to the appointment of his brother (the Earl of Dalkeith) as Lord Lieutenant of Dumfriesshire. That right hon. Gentleman might no doubt make any statements of facts within his own cognizance; but he had no right to state as facts what he could not be informed of. The right hon. Gentleman stated that his brother had been recommended for that appointment by his father. Now, he did not know what justification the right hon. Gentleman could have for making that statement. Such was not the case. So far from that appointment being made as a party appointment, it was offered to his brother by the most popular Liberal Minister of the day previous to its acceptance under the Minister who succeeded him.

MR. HORSMAN apologized to the noble Lord for the statement he had made. When the Earl of Dalkeith was appointed Lord Lieutenant of Dumfriesshire he (Mr. Horsman) had assumed that the appointment would have been given to the Duke of Buccleuch, if he would have accepted it, and that he preferred his son should be appointed. He had believed that to be so, but he regretted the statement he had made. He made it with the greatest respect for the Duke of Buccleuch and the Earl of Dalkeith, both of whom he had the honour of knowing, and for whom he entertained the most cordial regard.

THE MARQUESS OF HAMILTON said, he wished to say a few words with reference to the statement of the Attorney General for Ireland as to the appointment of the Duke of Abercorn to the Lord Lieutenancy of the county of Donegal. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said the Duke of Abercorn had no residence in that county, and he also stated that the county of Tyrone was contiguous to the county of Donegal.

That was correct; but he ought also to have stated that the estates of the Duke of Abercorn were continuous, running from one county into the other, and situate almost within a ring fence. He had also been associated with the county of Donegal by early connection, and was perfectly well acquainted with every gentleman residing in the county, having been a Deputy Lieutenant of that county himself.

MR. G. BENTINCK said, he thought the House would be pursuing a most unconstitutional, revolutionary, and mischievous course by attempting to take from the Executive appointments of this description, and placing them virtually in the hands of the House. If there was anything in the character of the person appointed which militated against the appointment that would be a different matter; but there was nothing of that kind here. On the contrary, every thing was in favour of the appointment.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he thought that such appointments ought to be canvassed in the House, otherwise there was no restriction on the acts of the Executive Government in such matters. There was no foundation for the remark made by the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland that the meeting at Ennis on Saturday last was a hole-and-corner meeting. It was perfectly true that only 34 magistrates attended the meeting; but it was open to every magistrate who chose to attend, and, as he has said, he held in his hand a protest against the appointment, signed by 69 magistrates and Deputy Lieutenants of the county. He would only say further that if he had in the course of this debate made any observations which he ought not to have made he was sorry he had done so, and he at once apologized for them to his hon. Friend. With respect to the sneer which had been levelled at him on the assumption that he had been a candidate for the office—he treated it with scorn, for there was no foundation for the assumption. He also thought he had a right to complain of the use which the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland had made of private letters relating to another subject. It was the first time he had heard in an Assembly of Gentlemen that such a use could be made of such documents, and all he could say was that it would teach him a lesson as to the way in which he should write to the noble Lord for the future.

MR. BAGWELL concurred in the statement that the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had been appointed Lord Lieutenant of Clare was respected by all parties in that county; and he believed that the meeting referred to by the right hon. and learned Gentleman was a hole-and-corner meeting, attended by very few magistrates, and it was held in the Grand Jury room, which was a private room.

SIR JOHN GRAY said, much stress had been laid on what was called "expression of opinion" from the Clare people. He would confine his observations altogether to that one point, which he thought it was important for the House fully to understand before it went to a division. His right hon. and learned Friend the Mover of the Resolution said, with great unction, that the magistrates had met and protested, but the great demonstration of opinion was the protest of the 69. That ominous figure, 69, was held before their eyes three times in the opening speech, and it was so important, in the view of his right hon. and learned Friend, that he referred to it again in tones of triumph when winding up his observations. Now, the point he was anxious to unravel was, where did this protest come from? Whence did it emanate? Was it from the county of Clare, or was it from that House? His right hon. and learned Friend (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) said he was not a candidate for the Lieutenancy. Every hon. Member present accepted his word for that, and those who knew the details of the case knew he was not a candidate. They also knew that there were three candidates. The hon. and gallant Colonel opposite (Colonel Vandeleur), who, if his party were in, ought to be considered with favour; his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Ennis (Mr. Stacpoole) was the second candidate, and he made good running; and a gallant Colonel, Francis Macnamara, was the third. There were three colonels and a captain, besides the "favourite," as the right hon. and learned Member for Clare called the hon. and gallant Colonel (Colonel White) who obtained the appointment. Now, these 69 names were the result, not of what was amusingly called the "spontaneous" expression of opinion of the people of

Clare, but of the earnest canvass of the three defeated candidates. ["No, no!"] He said "Yes!" and he held in his hand the circular issued from London by two of the candidates, inclosing the London Protest, and asking that, being stamped in Clare, it be sent to the third defeated aspirant, to be called in that House "The Clare Protest" against the appointment of Colonel White.

"[Private.]

"London, April 27, 1872.

"SIR—Sir Colman O'Loughlen having, in deference to the feelings that exist in the county on the subject, given notice of bringing before the House of Commons, on the 7th of May, the appointment of Colonel the Hon. Charles White to its Lieutenancy, it has been deemed advisable that there should be a written expression of opinion on the matter from the deputy lieutenants and magistrates of Clare. We enclose a form of protest which, if you approve of, we will thank you to sign and forward, as soon as possible, either to Sir Colman O'Loughlen or Colonel Vandeleur, House of Commons, London.

"Signed—FRANCIS MACNAMARA, D.L., WM. STACPOOLE, M.P."

The House would, he thought, now understand how Clare opinion was manufactured in London, and the weight to be attached to the jealousy, not of a mortified county, but of the disappointed competitors.

EDUCATION—RIPON GRAMMAR SCHOOL.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty that, in so much as the Scheme of the Endowed Schools Commissioners with reference to the Free Grammar School at Ripon, Yorkshire, would deprive the poor of that city and its neighbourhood of the facilities of obtaining an education, almost free, now possessed by all classes in that city and its neighbourhood, She will therefore be pleased to withhold Her consent from the said Scheme."—(Mr. Wheelhouse.)

MR. ASSHETON seconded the Motion.

MR. W. E. FORSTER defended the scheme proposed by the Endowed Schools Commissioners, which had been assented to by the House, and said that no better proof could be afforded of the excellence of their scheme than the very school which the hon. Member had brought under the consideration of the House.

MR. NEWDEGATE supported the Motion. He had no doubt that if they gave the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster) a certain amount of money he would apply it with great ability; but the question was, whether there was justice in the policy which obtained these funds? There was a great difference in the theory and in the application of a statute. He understood the present theory of education to be this—that the poor were to be educated in what are called elementary schools; the inhabitants of the district were to be rated to provide elementary education for the poorer classes, and the poor were to be rated for that purpose; whilst the education, which under these old endowments they had free, or by a trifling payment, would be taken away from them, in order to facilitate the education of the class above them—a class much better able to provide education for themselves. Such a policy as that was, in his opinion, destined to create division between the middle and lower classes; and the inevitable result must be that they would virtually keep down the lower class from rising by means of the education which the founders of these schools provided for them. That was a most singular exhibition of the democratic principle. They were going to create a second-class aristocracy at the expense of the poor.

MR. PARKER said, the object of the scheme was to give a higher kind of education to the poor.

MR. FAWCETT objected to discussing the scheme of the Commissioners at such a late hour, and moved the adjournment of the debate.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL remarked that the result of adjourning the discussion would be to give effect to the scheme, as the time specified by the Act for objecting to it would have elapsed.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he had pointed out that when the Public Schools Act was under discussion in that House it would render the provision, especially in regard to the Endowed Schools Act, a perfect farce; for they all knew that whatever might be the demerits of a scheme, if it could only be brought under the attention of that House by a Motion towards the end of the Session, it would be impossible in that House to deal with it; unless, therefore, they required in both these Acts—the Public Schools Act and the Endowed Schools Act—an Amendment to the effect that these schemes should always be presented at the beginning of the Session, the provision for bringing them under the consideration of that House might easily be defeated—nay, would almost always be defeated.

PARLIAMENT—ASCENSION DAY.

COMMITTEES.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That no Committees have leave to sit To-morrow, being Ascension Day, until Two of the clock."—(Mr. Glyn.)

MR. BOUVERIE said, he did not intend to oppose the Motion, but wished to give Notice that he should feel it his duty to take the sense of the House on the subject next year. The practice to which the Motion had reference was of quite modern introduction, and inflicted great hardship on the promoters of Private Bills. He believed it was originally proposed by the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire (Lord John Manners), and that it was accepted by the right hon. Gentleman now at the head of the Government, who, on the occasion in question, was the Leader of the House when Lord Russell was Minister. Ever since that time it had become a sort of rule that Committees should not sit till 2 o'clock on Ascension Day; but he ventured to say that not one of the officials of the House, or of the counsel, witnesses, agents, or other persons interested in Private Bills, would go to church to-morrow, and consequently the two hours allowed them for that purpose would be lost. Moreover, he found that two of the Select Committees were investigating Bills of considerable importance relating to Scotland; and, of course, the numerous witnesses who had been brought from that country did not think it at all necessary to go to church on Ascension Day. He would further remind the House that the practical result of Committees not sitting till 2 o'clock on that day was to impose fines amounting altogether to perhaps £2,000 or £3,000 on parties promoting Private Bills, for the counsel, agents, and witnesses had, of course, to be paid just as much as for an ordinary day, although the Committees sat for only two hours. That, he ventured to assert, was unjust and wrong. Not having given Notice, he should not propose to take the sense of the House on the subject; but another year he should take the liberty of dividing the House, with the view of protesting against the imposition of so heavy a fine on parties promoting Private Bills.

PERMISSIVE PROHIBITORY LIQUOR
BILL—[BILL 3.]

(Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Lord Claud Hamilton, Sir Thomas Bazley, Mr. Downing, Sir John Hammer, Mr. Miller, Mr. Dalway.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON, in rising to move "That the Bill be now read a second time," said, that although he might in the course of his speech say many disagreeable things, yet he thought few hon. Members would disagree with him when he said that the question of the liquor traffic had become the irrepressible question of British politics; and not only so in that country, but that it was, indeed, becoming a great question wherever the English language was spoken—in the United States and in our colonies. The question was also beginning to excite interest even in France, where the other day a debate arose in the National Assembly, respecting how far they should carry a law for putting down drunkenness in that country. It appeared to him, in fact, that in all countries where there was any considerable amount of intelligence and knowledge among the people the question was being discussed as to how far law should be made available for the purpose of checking the evil of drunkenness. He should, not, however, dilate upon those evils, for after the recent debate on the Bill introduced by the hon. Baronet the Member for West Essex (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson), he took it for granted that all hon. Members admitted drunkenness to be a great evil, and differed only as to the proper means of preventing it. Whether the evil were increasing or decreasing was a matter of considerable ambiguity and uncertainty, and he should not make any statement to the House in favour of one point or the other, but would mention that a pamphlet entitled The Case against the United Kingdom Alliance and the Permissive Bill stated that all the evidence obtainable from the judicial statistics went to show that drunkenness was not on the increase in the country at large; that, on the whole, it had a tendency to diminish; and that in many places, and more especially in the metropolis, it had materially declined. On reading that passage, he lost no time in referring to the judicial statistics, which showed that the number of persons charged with being drunk and disorderly had greatly increased. It was 93,000 in 1863, gradually increasing to 131,000 in 1870, and last year, according to the Returns made up to October, it had increased to 142,000. He did not know whether, after all, these figures proved very much, but as their opponents had based their case upon those statistics, he thought it right to bring them under the notice of the House. Again, the Return which had been moved for by the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Akroyd) showed that the apprehensions for drunkenness in England and Wales amounted to 1 in every 132 of the population. But they were told that, at any rate, things were improving, and that the case of Liverpool was one in point. Well, so be it; they were quite bad enough in any case. But even with regard to that town, what did they find? Why, that in 1841 the convictions for drunkenness bore the proportion of 1 to every 18 of the population, and in 1869 the proportion of 1 to every 23. Thereupon, Mr. S. G. Rathbone, speaking at a meeting in February last, said—

“The conclusion he had come to was, that not only in Liverpool, but throughout the whole country, the vice of drunkenness was rapidly decreasing among them.”

Did hon. Members know that of late a new system had been adopted in Liverpool, on Mr. Robertson Gladstone's suggestion, and that on every Tuesday there was a drunken Gazette published, in which was printed the name of every person convicted of drunkenness on the Monday morning? The number so printed on January 22 was 135, and on April 30 they had fallen to 92. Those were the facts concerning Liverpool, which was held up to them as an improving town; but let them look at Manchester, where the convictions for drunkenness in 1860 were something over 2,000; whereas in 1871 they had increased to 10,000. The pamphlet before referred to accounted in the following way for this increase:—

“Undoubtedly the chief reason is the extraordinary activity of the police, and the peculiar influence brought to bear upon the magistrates. . . . Harassed by these emissaries (Good Templars, teetotal spies, and adherents of the Alliance), the Manchester constables arrest scores and scores of inoffensive inebriates, who in any other town in the kingdom would be allowed to go quietly home.”

So that, according to that statement of the publican party themselves, there was abounding drunkenness in most of their large towns, if the police would only look out closely for it. Nobody, however, who had paid any attention to this question could doubt the interest which was taken in it by the great mass of the community. He would not lay any great stress upon the number of Petitions presented in favour of this Bill as a proof that that was the case, because it no doubt would be said that these Petitions were got up. Well, of course they were got up; but they were got up by persons who took an interest in the matter, and he, for one, had never heard of Petitions being collected in any other way. And to his mind the spectacle of working men devoting a large portion of their leisure moments to collecting signatures to Petitions in favour of something designed to promote not their own but their neighbour's welfare had something touching in it, and was not deserving of ridicule. But great interest had been shown during the recent Parliamentary elections, and the action of the publicans at those elections, and the undoubted success of which they boasted, tended to prove that the question was daily becoming more and more one between the public and the publican. Another proof of the interest taken in the subject by the people throughout the country was the fact that at the present moment there were no less than six Bills professing to deal in one way or another with the liquor traffic before Parliament; and, in addition, a Committee sitting upstairs, which, while not intending to recommend any extension of legislation with regard to the facilities for procuring licenses, were designed to deal with the evils resulting from that system. The Committee he spoke of, in fact, dealt with the "finished article;" and as they had victims of that abominable traffic, and as it was necessary to put them somewhere, it was proposed to furnish additional receptacles for those poor misguided creatures, there being absolutely no room available in the existing gaols, workhouses, and asylums of the country. Well, then, so far as these Bills tended to lessen the facilities for procuring drink—and two of them did so absolutely, during the whole of Sunday in England and Ireland respectively, because Sunday was the day of greatest temptation to the working man to spend the money which ought to be expended on his wife and family—so far, at least, they were good and worthy of support. But The Scotsman, the other day, speaking on the subject, said—

"The legitimate issue of all proposals to limit public-houses on philanthropic grounds is their complete extinction. Sir Wilfrid Lawson, therefore, is the logical conclusion of Sir Robert Anstruther and Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson."

He was very glad that it had been found, at last, that he was a logical conclusion, for, in the conclusion intended, he thought it proved a great deal in favour of the course of dealing with the subject he put forward. But it would be as well if they looked to what their opponents said further on this question. The great leader of their opponents, the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. M. T. Bass), speaking at the Derby Licensed Victuallers' dinner in November, 1871, said—

"He was the child of the licensed victuallers of the country, and to them he owed the fortune he had acquired, and was still through them able to maintain."

The hon. Gentleman added—

"People in authority asked them what they suggested? He had nothing to suggest. Let things go on as they were."

Thus hon. Members could see that there was one party whose efforts were directed to obtaining some diminution in the drunkenness which was so prevalent, and that there was another party who were in favour of nothing being done. He did not wish to disguise from hon. Members the consequences of voting for his Bill. Hon. Members would, no doubt, support him at their peril, because they would be marked by the great party interested in the continuation of this traffic for political destruction. He desired it to be clearly understood that he did not bring in this Bill as a rival to any of the other schemes before the House. Indeed, he regarded it simply as supplementary to the Bills of his hon. Friends the Members for Fife-shire and West Essex. Scotland possessed already a good licensing law, dealing, among other things, with Sunday closing, yet the people were not satisfied, and demanded further legislation. Sunday closing was popular in Scotland. ["No, no!"] An hon. Member says "No;" but he (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) said it was so popular that no Scotch Member dared vote for its repeal. The opposition which his Bill encountered in that House was almost confined to England, because, on the last occasion, if the second reading had been left to the Members of Ireland, Scotland, and Wales, there would have been a majority of two to one in favour of the measure. The present law he might describe as a Maine Law, with exceptions. No man could engage in the liquor traffic without a license from the magistrates, and in granting this license the magistrates had to consider three questions—the fitness of the applicant, the fitness of his premises, and the wants of the neighbourhood. With the first two points he did not propose in any way to interfere; but by his Bill it was intended to give to the inhabitants themselves the power of stating what their wants really were. He did not wish at that time to make any reflections whatever upon their conduct; but there could be no doubt that, however well-intentioned the efforts of the magistrates were generally, they occasionally failed, and failed lamentably, to exactly meet the requirements of certain districts. No one could contend, for instance, that the requirements of the neighbourhood justified the licensing in Scotland Road, Liverpool, of one in every five houses as a gin-shop. Again, to show that the conduct of the magistrates could not be invariably relied upon, he might take the case of one of the lowest neighbourhoods in London,

Sir Wilfrid Lawson

where Mrs. Bailey, a lady well-known for her benevolence, established a working men's club. That club soon began to make an improvement in the habits of the residents of the neighbourhood to the detriment of the profits of the publicans, who, becoming alarmed, an application for a license to a house close by was made. The license was strongly remonstrated against by the working men in the neighbourhood; but although the magistrates listened to the remonstrances once or twice, they ultimately decided to consent to the establishment of a drink shop close to the club. Could it be contended that he was wrong in wishing that the decision in such a case should be determined, not by the magistrates but by the memorialists, by those who knew their own wants and temptations best? Although objected to on account of the permissive nature of its intended legislation, there was nothing new in the doctrine embodied in his Bill, because not only was the whole of the traffic at present permissive, but they had permissive Acts always in operation for the promotion of public health, sanitary improvement, education by the opening of free libraries, and recreation by the opening of public parks. If they gave power to the majority in all those instances, why should they not equally do so in regard to the licensing system, and so get rid of all the drunkenness, and its accompanying train—sickness, squalor, dirt, and hunger which surrounded them? He was not, however, bigoted in his attachment to this Bill, and he was willing to support any Bill or any clause which contained the vetoing principle for which he contended, and if the hon. Member for Derby would only change his policy and bring in such a Bill, he would give his hearty support to his hon. Friend's measure, or he would be perfectly willing to insert the clause in the Bill of his hon. Friend (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) if he would accept it. In fact, he would give his countenance to any Bill which would give that veto power, and he might further state he should make a point of moving it in any Bill which came under the consideration of the House. In favour of that line of conduct he would state that it was only the other day that the Legislature of New Zealand had carried unanimously a Bill restricting the liquor traffic, and giving at the same time to the people this power of veto.

He felt bound to vindicate his Bill from the charge of being an extreme measure, for it was quite the reverse, being in reality one of the most moderate measures ever introduced. Clause 93 of the Bill of his hon. Friend the Member for Fifehire provided that—

“Houses of persons licensed to sell intoxicating liquors to be consumed on the premises” (elsewhere than four miles from St. Paul's) “shall be closed between 10 at night and 7 in the morning. But the licensing board of every district shall have full power and authority to order the closing of all such houses at any other earlier hour when requested by a memorial signed by a majority of two-thirds of the ratepayers of the district.”

According to that legislation, if the feeling of the board was prohibitory, they could do what he by his Bill wished to do—practically put an end to the traffic, for they could order that any or all houses should close five minutes after opening. He thought that was so from what his hon. Friend (Sir Robert Anstruther), speaking at St. James's Hall in November last, said—

“The Permissive Bill, if it passed, would not take effect except in places where two-thirds of the ratepayers were found to vote in favour of bringing it into action. What they really wanted was a far more radical measure than the Permissive Bill; they wanted to see the issue as well as the regulation of the licenses put in the hands of the people themselves.”

His hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth (Mr. Morrison), speaking on the same occasion, expressed similar opinions—

“We, of the Association, want to get some means into operation which will deal with the evil at once. I think if the Permissive Bill were carried into law, it might perhaps be brought into operation in some localities, but, how long would it be, I ask you, before you could convert such towns as Liverpool and London, and other large towns where the evil is at the greatest? But we go fully with the Alliance, on the point of the people having full control of the issue of licenses.”

The passages which he had quoted would, he thought, be sufficient to show that his Bill was in no way an extreme measure. While striving in the same direction as his hon. Friend the Member for Fifehire, to give effect to the veto of the majority, so that they might be protected from the evils of the liquor traffic, he believed his own plan to be more simple and more easy than that introduced by his hon. Friend. With regard to the opinion of America, the President-elect, Mr. Horace Greeley, speaking on this question, said—

"Our State should have a law requiring the people of each city and township to vote 'license' or 'no license' at each municipal election, and forbidding the traffic whenever and wherever any city or township had voted no license, until they at a subsequent election shall have reversed that decision. We could then determine the effect of either policy on the morals and prosperity of communities. If men drink more and rush to ruin faster because of prohibition, that fact would be made manifest by the increase of pauperism and crime when the liquor traffic was forbidden. Why should not all consent to give this experiment a fair deliberate trial?"

All that he now asked the House to do was to give his proposal a fair trial throughout the United Kingdom, and he asked that with the more confidence because he knew that wherever the experiment had been tried it had proved signally successful. [Mr. GOLDSMID: No, no!] He trusted his hon. Friend would specify some particular instance where the principle of determining this question by the voice of the majority of the inhabitants of a district had failed. [An hon. MEMBER: In America.] He repeated that where it had been decided upon and enforced by a large majority of the people it had not failed. That was his point. It was all very well to speak vaguely about America, or for his hon. Friend to get up and refer to the State of Maine; but his hon. Friend would have to quote chapter and verse, because he had in his pocket an abstract of all the American laws dealing with the subject. He would, however, tell his hon. Friend, that in the State of Maine it had been a great success; and, if so, surely in this country, where they had such a network of police representing the machinery requisite to carry out the law, it would succeed more than it had in the State of Maine. There could be no doubt of the advantages which had resulted to districts in England where benevolent landlords had removed from the inhabitants the temptations which stood in their way; but the removal of such temptations ought to be within the power of the inhabitants themselves if they desired it. From Scotland there was equally satisfactory testimony in its favour, while from Ireland the evidence was perfectly overwhelming as regarded its beneficent effect, so much so, that The Times admitted that if the statements were true—which they undoubtedly were—they entirely settled the question. He would, however, give a further proof how much

legislation on the subject, as devised by his Bill, was required, in an abuse of the present system lately brought under his notice. The facts of the case showed that in a village in Lanarkshire containing a population of about 250 there was no public-house. In 1869 an application was made for a license. A petition against the granting of the license, signed by every male inhabitant but four, was presented to the justices, but they treated the inhabitants with contempt, and thrust the public-house upon them. He thought it was undesirable that any such petition should be so treated, and had his Bill been in operation it would have prevented it. And not only that, but they should consider the situation of the many other places—which there undoubtedly were—who like this village in Lanarkshire were entirely opposed to these drink shops, in deciding upon the merits of the question. He was sorry he had kept the House so long; and, in conclusion, would treat of the objections against the Bill which he supposed he should have to meet, and which he thought would prove to be of the same nature as those he had heard before. One of the objections against this Bill would probably be that it was going against public opinion. But that he denied, for the principle was the one upon which the Bill itself was almost exclusively founded. It could not, indeed, be carried into effect without the aid of public opinion. Another argument was that it would have no effect except in districts where its operation could be dispensed with, but that he believed to be a delusion, for, in his opinion, the existence of such a power as that embodied in the Bill would act as a source of terror to evildoers. Again, they were told that the present law if put in force was strong enough for every purpose required. If that were so, why had the Government brought in a Bill to deal with this subject? The Earl of Kimberley, in introducing that measure, had referred to the case of Luton; but it was only the other day that a magistrate of that division, writing about the state of the neighbourhood, said—

"I believe not one in 50 of the convicted drunkards in our county are from the habitual criminal class. They are, as a rule, from the artizan and labouring classes, who frequent the respectable drink shops, where, now that wages are high and work plentiful, they indulge in this dreadful habit to a greater extent than ever."

From that it would be seen that it was not in the low public-houses that all the tippling was carried on, but that a great, if not the greater part of it was from the respectable houses. Another argument was, that the progress of education under the new step which had been initiated, would gradually eradicate drunkenness from the land; and that being so, there was no necessity for the kind of legislation he proposed. But he would say that it would be a very long time, indeed, before an end would be put to the existence of that necessity; and while he would at once admit that they need not trouble about such legislation when the people were thoroughly educated and trained to act rightly; yet he thought it was an irresistible argument in his favour when they admitted that at that moment the country was full of people who could not resist temptation, and upon whom all agreed it was a cruel thing to force temptation upon. He would, of course, be met by what he might term the rich and poor argument; but without intending to be un-Parliamentary in his language, that argument was one which he could not help thinking savoured of cant and clap-trap. However, rather than that any difficulty should remain on that score, he would accept in Committee a clause proposing the disfranchisement of any person paying rates above a certain amount, and so leave the question as to whether this Bill should come into operation to the decision of the poorer inhabitants alone. Moreover, the Petitions which flowed in from the country in favour of the Bill did not, as a rule, bear the signatures of persons in a superior class of life, and it therefore seemed to him that they should be allowed to remove the temptations which laid in their path; but it was the most refined and educated Assembly possibly in the world which said that those temptations should remain, and that, he thought, was wrong. He thanked the House most earnestly for listening so patiently to his well-worn arguments, on a question which, however popular out-of-doors, was not very popular there, and would appeal to both sides of the House for support to the measure. He appealed for support to his Friends on that side of the House as the advocates of local self-government, and he also appealed for support to hon. Members on the other side of the House, who were essentially the friends of order. Lately, also, they had said—and said well—that the public health was to be the object of their supreme efforts. But he would not put this question on party grounds; and, therefore, more confidently did he appeal to those on both sides of this House, who, refusing to be the blind servants of party, still more disclaiming to be the slaves of one powerful, wealthy, and tyrannical vested interest, found the true charm and noblest object of political life in protecting the weak, in helping those who were desolate and oppressed, and in doing what in them lay to raise the general level of national prosperity, happiness, and virtue. The hon. Baronet concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

MR. CARTER seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Sir Wilfrid Lawson.)

MR. WHEELHOUSE, in rising to move—“That the Bill be read a second time that day six months,” said, he hoped the House would concur in his Motion; and, indeed, he trusted that the time would never come when it would be read a second time in that House. He knew, as well as the hon. Baronet, that the arguments on both sides of the question had been stated so frequently, both in that House and elsewhere, that they were thoroughly and completely—to use a common phrase—“thrashed out.” But the hon. Baronet had thought it necessary to state at great length the grounds on which he asked the House to assent to the principle of the Bill, and it therefore became his (Mr. Wheelhouse’s) duty—though he hoped he should not detain the House so long—to explain his reasons for moving the rejection of the Bill. The hon. Baronet had told them that his Bill was the logical sequence of the Bills of the hon. Member for Fifeshire (Sir Robert Anstruther) and the hon. Baronet below the gangway (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson). He (Mr. Wheelhouse) contended, on the contrary, that this was a Bill which stood alone, and had no resemblance in principle to any Bill which had been brought forward on the subject, either by the Government or by private Members; and that the hon. Baronet wanted the House of Commons to enact a Bill which did not in any degree represent public opinion, but which, if passed, would give certain persons called ratepayers in boroughs and parishes power to meet and determine whether licenses should be granted or not—so that persons must become ratepayers in boroughs or parishes before they could have a voice in the matter, and give a vote. He (Mr. Wheelhouse) said that was not fair. There were many persons in both boroughs and parishes who were not ratepayers, but whose convenience and comfort would be seriously interfered with by a meddlesome and intolerant clique bent upon carrying out their own crotchets. After the ratepayers had met in some small back room belonging to the Alliance or The British Workman, in a borough or parish where there happened to be a teetotal mayor or churchwarden, and found they had the requisite majority of two-thirds of the few ratepayers present, they would have taken the initiative step towards closing the licensed houses in their locality. Notices were to be posted on the doors of the town halls in boroughs where there were town halls, and in the parishes where there were none, and where they would be displayed he could not tell; but it was clear that the notices might be so arranged in connection with a little hole-and-corner meeting that the public opinion might never have been heard at all, and nobody know anything about the matter except the small compact and zealous body who could be reached and set in motion by the agents of the Permissive Bill advocates, who would be the real movers in the matter. The hon. Baronet (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) had pointed with exultation to the rows upon rows of Petitions which had been sent up to the House in favour of the Bill, and to the large number of signatures which were attached to those Petitions. But what did these Petitions really mean? Did it mean that they really represented public opinion? Not at all. It meant simply that the organization which promoted this Bill had a great number of very active secretaries, the payment of whose salaries depended upon the success which attended their going about with sheets of paper and getting signatures wherever and however they could. Let that statement be denied if it could be. Everybody who knew anything of the facts knew that those Petitions were all nonsense so far as they professed to represent a real and genuine opinion upon this question. The hon. Baronet told them that those Petitions were not sent by the rich, but by poor people. That was very true, because the persons who had charge of the sheets did not go to gentlemen whom they knew would refuse to sign. No doubt there were a few weak-minded, capricious, or crotchety people belonging to the educated classes who might be induced to do so; but the agents went about with these sheets and got the signatures of children, women, and persons who were ready to sign anything, whether they understood it or not; and then, when a number of separate sheets had been filled up in this way, they were pasted together, though coming from different localities, a gentleman of some position in favour of the principle was got to head the list with his name, and in this way a very imposing Petition was got up and sent to that House. That accounted for the Petitions said to be signed by 20,000 or 25,000 persons which had been presented. As to the astounding number of 47,000 said to be attached to the Sheffield Petition, he knew Sheffield and the West Riding well, and to say that any such number of signatures could be honestly and fairly got in Sheffield was to tell him what he did not and could not credit. The hon. Baronet said these Petitions represented public opinion. He (Mr. Wheelhouse), on the contrary, said that if they were closely scrutinized and the signatures carefully verified they would be found to be not worth the paper on which they were written. It was said that question was one between the public and the publican. He (Mr. Wheelhouse) thought that it might rather be described as a question between the publican and the pump. Let them get at public opinion really, and it would be found that the Bill was directly contrary to the feelings and wishes of the country at large. Before, however, passing a Permissive Bill in that House, let them set the working classes an example in their own persons. There was a refreshment-bar in the lobby established expressly to supply the Members of the House with needful refreshment, and perhaps many Members who intended to vote for the Permissive Bill might strengthen themselves for the duty by taking a glass of wine before, or refresh themselves after voting by a visit to the bar. Before they shut up the public-houses, which were the clubs of the working men, let them shut up their own clubs in Pall Mall. No doubt there were some Gentlemen water-drinkers in that House; but even they were compelled to act in accordance with public opinion and the general habits of the community, and when they invited their friends to dinner they placed before them champagne and wines of that sort, and invited them to help themselves freely, though they did not choose to partake of the wines personally. The hon. Gentleman who had charge of this Bill and his supporters might say to their friends—"Drink as much as you please, only help us to pass this Permissive Bill into law." He had no hesitation in saying that the great and overwhelming majority of the ratepayers of this country were totally opposed to such a measure as this. Then it was said that those who opposed it were in favour of beer-drinking throughout the country. Well, and what if that were so? If he (Mr. Wheelhouse) could have his claret, or champagne, or Madeira, when he liked, why should not the poor man have his beer? No doubt the poorer classes were the best customers of publicans; and why? Because they knew it was there alone they could get a good glass of fresh beer. It was not in their power to keep it in cellars at home, and those who could do so had only to produce a gallon, or half a gallon of it, for a friend 24 hours after it was there, and they would find that it was not drinkable. The promoters of this Bill said—"It does not affect us; we may have barrels or flagons of beer in our own cellars, and no one can hinder us from partaking of it when we choose; but we will prevent the poor man spending his three-half-pence or two pence for a pint of good beer in a public-house, lest, forsooth! he should be demoralized." That was not fair or just. It was not only not fair nor just, but gross class legislation against the poorer classes of this country, which he trusted that House would never sanction. Then, said the friends of the Bill—"Why don't you allow the majority of ratepayers to decide the question in every district?" Certainly, he should be ready to do so; but who were the majority? In one district a body of people might be found who would not allow a public-house to be within it; but adjoining it, another body, holding contrary opinions, permitted them; and the consequence would be that the locality must become flooded with public-houses. That was neither fair nor just nor politic. Ratepayers holding the opinions of the hon. Baronet would not permit any public-house within their district; but outside this Arcadia or Alsatia as many might exist as circumstances would render necessary, and there not only would the public of the neighbourhood, but many of the dwellers in Arcadia itself go and have their beer. And why should they not? If the hon. Baronet had the right to stop his beer, why should not he (Mr. Wheelhouse) have the right to stop his beef? If a man who drank his beer suffered for it, so did a man who ate too much. The whole question was one of a social and domestic description, and they had no right, by any legislation, to interfere with the freedom of the people; and he was quite sure that even if it were carried, no portion of this Permissive Bill would ever be carried out, or any attempt made to carry it out, in any part of this country. He believed, also, that that House would never consent to pass such a measure. Now they had heard a great deal of talk about the United States of America, and especially of the State of Maine. But, it was notorious to everyone who knew that part of the world, that what was called the "Maine Liquor Law" had failed miserably. The effect of it was—as indeed it would be in all similar cases—that when people did not or could not get a glass of beer in public, they would have it—aye, and treble the quantity—in private. Was it not better that men should do everything openly and above board, so that all their neighbours could know what they did, than go and drink in shops which were illicit and illegitimate, and which were always sure to exist in localities where stringent measures of this description were adopted? Was it not true that it was found necessary to appoint corps of Excise officers to prevent the open violation of the Excise laws in many parts of the country. And if that House came to the conclusion that there should be no open public-houses, they might depend upon it that five or six of those illicit shops would spring up in their stead. The hon. Member for Carlisle might differ from that opinion; but his (Mr.

Wheelhouse's) honest belief was that they had no right whatever to prohibit one class of the people from eating or drinking what they chose, and that being so, he asked the House to reject the Bill.

MR. GOLDSMID, in seconding the Amendment, said, he must protest against the assertion that every one who opposed this Bill was subservient to what the hon. Baronet called the interest of the publican. [Sir WILFRID LAWSON denied that he had said so.] The hon. Baronet had just said that this Bill "was not to be laughed at by those who were in the interests of the publicans," and that "the fight was to be between the public and the publicans," and the only logical deduction from these words was, that all those who opposed his Bill were acting in the interest of publicans. Now he (Mr. Goldsmid) had no interest in upholding public-houses; but on behalf of the public, he opposed the hon. Baronet's Bill, and he believed the great majority of the people of this country were equally opposed to the measure. Two or three Members of Parliament, he regretted to see, had gone wandering about the country in the capacity of itinerant lecturers on teetotalism, and followed the same course as the hon. Baronet ventured upon in the House. For example the other day a meeting was held at Exeter in support of this Bill; and some persons who objected to the Bill having obtained admission wished to discuss the resolutions submitted to it, certainly in an adverse sense. On finding that these persons disapproved the Bill, the chairman stigmatized them as drunkards, and men favouring drunkenness, and refused to hear them. Now, these were mistaken tactics. He could tell the hon. Baronet and his supporters that those who opposed his Bill were as hostile to drunkenness as he could be himself, and it was not by such abuse of those who differed from him, or by such ridiculous legislation as this Bill proposed, that they could accomplish their object. He told them last year on the Sunday Trading Bill, and he told them now on this Permissive Prohibitory Liquor Bill, that they could not make men sober, religious, or well conducted by Act of Parliament. Much had been said of the example of the United States and of the working of the Maine Liquor Law. Well, there were Members of that House who had gone to the United States for the express purpose of observing the working of the Maine Liquor Law, and he believed they were about to inform the House that they found it utterly futile, and intended to vote against this Bill. The hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Wheelhouse) had pointed out that wherever they prevented drinking in public they facilitated it in private. Now, he (Mr. Goldsmid) said that if drinking in public was a bad thing, there was one thing that was worse, and that was private drinking, for the man who got drunk by drinking in public would, in all probability, be prevented from drinking the rest of the day through, and would most likely get sober again before the day was over; whereas the man who got drunk in private would go on drinking to the end of the day. It was better that public drinking should become private sobriety by the man being locked up, through the assistance of the police, than that private drunkenness should remain private drunkenness, as it assuredly would, to the end of the chapter. In Scotland there were certain laws in force with respect to drinking. Now, he had himself learnt that there were more men in Scotland drunk on Sunday than on any other day. When he inquired the reason, he found that though drinking was not allowed in public, there was a good deal of it in private; and it was believed there was more Sunday drinking in Glasgow, and a few other large Scotch towns, in private, than in all England put together. The principle of the Bill was thus seen to be entirely a mistaken one. But there was another, and, as he (Mr. Goldsmid) thought, fatal objection to the proposal of the hon. Baronet. He wanted to know on what principle the hon. Baronet proceeded when he said that two-thirds of the ratepayers should have the power of preventing the remaining third of the ratepayers and all the rest of the population from doing that which, in itself, was perfectly harmless? He knew himself that when, after any arduous exertion, the nervous system was exhausted, a glass of beer was a wholesome and proper stimulant; and he appealed to any hon. Member who had had occasion to consult a medical man whether he had not been told that a certain amount of stimulus was necessary for the restoration of the nervous system? That being so, he contended that it was nothing but tyranny to say that a minority, however small, should not have the articles of food or of drink to which they were entitled. It was the most tyrannical legislation—especially as regarded the working classes—that had ever been brought into that House. That the measure was opposed to the feeling of the country was shown, notwithstanding the enormous mass of got-up Petitions, by the very little way it made in the House. It was shown, too, by the Resolution which the Society formed to promote this legislation had passed on the previous day, and the declaration that if they got a smaller number of votes for this Bill they would thereby be encouraged to make still greater exertions, while if they got a larger number of votes they would take it to be a proof that the feeling of the country was in their favour. Under any circumstances, therefore, they would be equally well satisfied with the division, and he hoped the House would gratify them by giving them a smaller number of votes. He knew that last year many hon. Members voted for the Bill, not because they approved of it, but merely as a protest against nothing being done on the licensing question by Her Majesty's Government. Well, this year the Government had shown much earnestness in their effort to deal with it—though he did not know whether they would be able to pass their Bill. It was a Bill for the regulation of the sale of liquors. Now, it was very necessary to have proper regulations for the conduct of every trade, and especially of such a trade as this; but why there should be prohibitory legislation neither the hon. Baronet, nor any of his supporters, had yet succeeded in showing. The hon. Baronet had no right to come there year after year, wearying the House with his oft-repeated arguments in favour of this wretched Bill. The opponents of the Bill, as he had said before, were not in favour of drunkenness any more than the hon. Baronet himself was—they, the opponents of the Bill, were not the slaves of any vested interest any more than he was; but they said that as long as the country desired to preserve liberty of action they would refuse to accept the Bill which he so persistently advocated. A great majority of the country, he was satisfied, were of that opinion; and in view of that fact he trusted the House would throw out the Bill by a larger majority than they had ever done before, and that the hon. Baronet, whose good intentions he appreciated, would gain wisdom from experience, and would not again trouble this or any future Parliament with a repetition of the Motion he had now made. He begged to second the Amendment for the rejection of the Bill.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Wheelhouse.)

MR. MELLY observed, that he was not a member of the Alliance, and he had but small sympathy with the Maine Liquor Law; but he gave a complete and entire adherence to the principle of local self-government. He thought there should be some check upon the issue of new and the renewal of old licenses, where, in the opinion of those principally concerned, they were not required. He should support the second reading of the Bill, on the ground that it recognized the vital principle of self-government, and gave to the ratepayers a control over the indiscriminate issue of licenses. No doubt it would require much modification in Committee. Clauses giving compensation to existing public-houses when closed by local authority would have to be inserted; and on such a question the vote of all adults, whether ratepayers or not, should be taken. The hon. Gentleman who had moved the rejection of the Bill had stated that the Petitions presented in its favour had not been signed by a single gentleman, and that the signatures attached to them were mainly those of women and children. He (Mr. Melly) could only say that a Petition had been presented from Liverpool in favour of the measure, which was signed by 116 ministers, 213 physicians and surgeons, 329 gentlemen, 353 merchants, and 384 schoolmasters, and another Petition had been signed by 679 ministers of religion residing in the metropolis. It had been charged against those Members of Parliament who supported the Bill that during the Recess they had gone about the country endeavouring to stir up the people on this subject, and to get up an agitation in favour of the Bill. But had not a similar course been adopted during the great Free Trade campaigns of Cobden and Bright? It was a new doctrine that hon. Members were not to go forth and take their proper place as speakers at public meetings. Thus only by popular agitation in all time have the great monopolies of powerful classes been abrogated or controlled. He had welcomed his hon. Friends to his native town, where some 10,000 persons had assembled to hear them. Royal Dukes and noblemen often presided over public meetings called to support associations in which they were interested; but there never was an agitation more real and true than that supported by his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle. Springing from a terrible sense of the injury done by the traffic, of homes made wretched, of widowed mothers and neglected children, of increased rates and a wasteful expenditure of wages, the movement was based upon the daily experience of all classes. It was chiefly supported by the working classes, who were most nearly interested. True, there were but few Members of Parliament who supported the movement, because they dare not; it had sprung, not from the top, but from the bottom of society, and was all the more to be respected on that account. It was a mistake to assume that there was not a Permissive Prohibitory Liquor Law in force in this country at the present time, though most unequally enforced. As a licensing magistrate of some standing he had often listened to "the requirements of the neighbourhood" argument, based on the Statute of George IV. Who was the best judge on this point? The old law said, a dozen magistrates at Quarter Sessions, whose homes, as he should shortly show, were carefully protected from contiguity with gin palaces; the new law they proposed asserted that the thousands amid whose homes it was proposed to thrust "accommodation," not required, which would depreciate their value and demoralize their inhabitants, were the best judges. The old laws contemplated Licensed Victuallers' houses—places of entertainment for man and beast, "hostels," with garrulous host, bar-parlour, newspapers, political and social chat, beds, food, as well as drink. Too many licensed houses were now simply bars for drinking, instead of inns in the old sense of the word. They gathered round them crowds of bad characters, disturbed the peace of the streets, and greatly annoyed the neighbourhood. To attempt to restrict the number of such houses was no attack by the rich upon the privileges of the poor, as the hon. Member for Leeds asserted. The rich protected themselves. The principle of the Permissive Bill was already acted upon in a sort of way by landowners, who took restrictive covenants in reference to licensed houses upon their estates. In this way particular neighbourhoods were protected from the existence of public-houses and the evil of drunkenness; but there was no such protection given in the case of the poor. He had been favoured by Members of the House with copies of the leases of the great ducal estates in the metropolis. The leaseholders for 99 years were guaranteed against any public-house being established other than those already in existence. He himself held a lease for 75 years, renewable, under a rich corporation, and had the same protection. The working man, who through a building society and weekly savings of hard-earned wages had purchased his modest dwelling, might see the baker's shop at the corner of his street converted into a flaming dram-shop, certainly depreciating the value of his property, probably driving him from his home. He had no such protection. He had had occasion before, and on other points, to show that, however equal to all classes were the laws of ownership in the letter, how unequally and unjustly they too often were in the mode in which they operated. But even the Maine Liquor Law was already in operation in this country. In 1,000 parishes in the diocese of Canterbury there was no public-house. Were they the most miserable villages in their respective counties, or the most prosperous? He had shown that the owners of large property in many districts in the metropolis and in several provincial towns declined to permit public-houses to be built on their estates, and in a very large village and shipbuilding yard on the banks of one of their great rivers, the Maine Liquor Law was most strictly enforced, and it was impossible for a man employed there to get a glass of beer without going three or four miles by railway to buy it, and the result was that in that yard 20s. a-week wages was regarded by the wives of the workmen as equal to 23s. a-week in the neighbouring town, while pauperism was unknown. In a new district near one of the large manufacturing towns in Lancashire, 400 houses had been built, and not only were no public-houses allowed, but no grocer was permitted to sell intoxicating liquors. Yet were the houses empty or the work-people discontented? The powerful steamships which sailed from Liverpool to America, India, and Australia, in a majority of cases, carried no spirits, except as doctors' stores, and the men were teetotallers for periods varying from a fortnight to six months. Did they complain or refuse to ship at the ordinary rate of wages? There were 13 steamships in which he was interested trading between China and Liverpool, in which that rule was enforced, greatly to the benefit of the men, the safety of the vessels, and the advantage of the owners. Landowners, manufacturers, and ship-owners, thus enforced temperance at their own discretion; but the opponents of the Bill said it was tyranny that a minority should be compelled by a majority. The common law allowed the absolute power of restricting licenses to every landowner. They insisted that all the occupiers should share that power, and have some direct control in a matter which affected them more nearly, and of which they were the best judges. It had been contended that they had no right to make men moral by Act of Parliament; but was not the whole tendency of penal legislation to enforce the observance of the rules of morality? What were the volumes of statutes on this subject but attempts to make men more sober by Act of Parliament? Why were there any licenses at all, or any hours of closing, or any police supervision? He was convinced that the manner in which the evil of excessive expenditure in drink, and also of drunkenness would be effectually dealt with in the first instance, would be by restricting the hours during which public-houses should be open, and by providing for a more severe police control, and the abolition, as far as practicable, of adulteration. There must be such a system of supervision established as would make it almost impossible to perpetuate those evils which at present existed to so large an extent throughout the entire British dominions, and higher penalties enforced against those who, for the sake of a miserable profit, encouraged the excessive drinking which was robbing them all of so large a portion of the national wealth. He should support every such clause in any of the Bills before the House. But he was not the less persuaded that all these measures would fail to satisfy the real desire of a vast majority of the working classes, who were chiefly interested in this question. They would never be satisfied until a clause was introduced into a Government Bill which should give to them a control over the issue of licenses—a matter which touched in so deadly a manner the sanctity of their homes, and the religion, education, and morality of their children.

MR. HENLEY said, he desired to state his reasons for voting as he was about to do. Much had been said with reference to the Petitions that had been presented to that House; but, for his own part, in view of the prolonged agitation and widely-extended organization that had been got up all over the country in connection with this subject, he was surprised that only 400,000 signatures had been attached to those Petitions—more especially seeing that most people regarded this measure rather as a simple protest against drunkenness than as an actual attempt to interfere with the existing law. He was unable, then, to vote for the Bill—first, because he believed it to be unjust; and, secondly, because he very much doubted whether, even if persons were disposed to commit an injustice for the sake of an eventual good—which he confessed he was not—he believed that, instead of good, evil would certainly come of it. He was also of opinion that there had been no such increase of drunkenness of late as to demand the passing of such a wild and violent measure as the one under discussion, for either its cure or prevention. He, in common, he supposed, with other hon. Members, had received a letter that morning from the hon. Members whose names appeared on the back of the Bill, stating a certain view that would be taken of votes given in favour of the measure, which view, he was bound to say, was not the one which was likely to be taken on reading the terms of the Preamble of the Bill, which went a vast deal further and raised a much larger question than the terms of the letter indicated. The Preamble of the Bill stated that the common sale—what that exactly meant he did not know—of intoxicating liquors was a fruitful source of crime, of immorality, of pauperism, of disease, of insanity, and of premature death. Whether the sale or the abuse of the use of intoxicating liquors led to those results was a question upon which people might fairly entertain different opinions; but, admitting that the promoters of this measure were right in the view they took of the matter, how did they propose to check the evils which they thus pointed out? He should have thought that a trade which entailed all the evils referred to in the Preamble of the Bill should only be dealt with by Act of Parliament, after serious and careful deliberation; but the promoters of the Bill proposed to leave the matter to the chance vote of a parish or a borough where it was said to exist; and to do that would, he thought, be a gross injustice to the community at large. Would it be just, for instance, towards a large portion of the community that their property, in which a vast aggregate sum had been invested, should be liable by such a chance vote to be utterly destroyed? In the letter to which he had referred, hon. Members were asked to vote in favour of giving large majorities some power of checking the establishment of public-houses where there was a desire in the district to do without them. There was something rather Jesuitical in that letter, because it would lead to the supposition that such establishments were not in existence already; whereas the real root of the injustice of this measure was, that it sought to destroy a large existing trade, which had been permitted to grow up in this country with the sanction of the Legislature, and which was founded upon the ordinary and the true principles of supply and demand. He would also remind the House that matters with respect to that trade did not stand in the same position as they did 50 years ago, when the licensing authorities could either license or put down a public-house at their good will and pleasure, for at the present time, a public-house could not be put down without good reason shown, and the decision given could be reviewed on appeal to a judicial tribunal—in fact, the owner of a public-house held his license, not at will, but during good behaviour. Under those circumstances, he asked whether the vast mass of people who had invested their money in this trade were to be exposed to utter ruin by a mere chance vote, which might be the result of an active canvass on one side or the other? He had said that, in his opinion, more harm than good was likely to result from this Bill, and he would explain his reasons for adopting that view. It was not to be expected that when the property of the publicans was at stake all the activity and all the canvassing would be restricted to the temperance side of the question. All who knew what influence the quart pot had in elections would understand that this Bill, instead of restricting drunkenness, would be likely very largely to increase it, and to give rise to habits that were not easily left off. Then, again, who were the persons that it was most desirable should keep public-houses—was it desirable that that trade should be exercised by those who were reckless of consequences, and who would do anything to procure a temporary trade during the uncertain term that they might be permitted to enjoy it? In his opinion, it was of the greatest importance that the trade should be conducted by respectable persons, who would do their best to obey the law, and to restrict, as far as they could, evils which flowed from the abuse of the use of intoxicating drinks; but if this measure were agreed to, the contrary result would ensue, for no respectable man would dare to run the risk of allowing his money to remain in a business that a chance vote might destroy at any time. Was there such a pressing necessity for this measure, that the injustice of putting an end to that enormous trade must be overlooked, in order to stop the consumption of liquor at any price? He believed that drunkenness, instead of increasing, was steadily decreasing in this country—except, perhaps, in Lancashire—and he feared that the agitation that had been got up in favour of this measure had had the evil effect of banding together all those interested in the trade, who would look for some time on all necessary reforms with a jaundiced eye, which otherwise they would willingly have accepted. Another evil result of this agitation had been to induce the public to think that the public-houses were the causes of intemperance, which was far from being the case. In 1831 the population of the metropolitan police district was 1,500,000, the apprehensions for drunkenness being 41,000; whereas, in 1871, the population was 3,800,000, and the apprehensions were 20,000. Thus, while population had doubled, the arrests had decreased by 50 per cent. Considering that the police were under similar arrangements at the two periods, he could not but conclude that drunkenness had decreased. He had, moreover, inquired into the state of Bristol and Liverpool, and Birmingham and Manchester, places which were a fair sample of the large towns of England. Now, in Bristol the number of public-houses and beerhouses in 1870 was 1,220, or 1 to 149 of the population, a very handsome allowance. The number of persons arrested as drunk and disorderly was 1,040, or 1 in 175 of the population. In Liverpool there were 2,294 public-houses or beerhouses, or 1 to every 215 persons, a much smaller proportion; but the arrests were 21,000, or 1 in 23. If public-houses were the cause of drunkenness, and not merely the means which other causes drove people to avail themselves of, how could that great discrepancy be accounted for? Again, in Birmingham the number of those houses was 1 to 185 persons, while the arrests were 1 to 154; whereas in Manchester the public-houses were 1 to 146, and the arrests 1 to 32 of the population. He could only attribute the excessive drunkenness of Manchester and Liverpool to the rapid increase of population having brought together numbers of people who were addicted to drink. Indeed, taking the country generally, the amount of intemperance was in proportion to the ratio of increase of the population. It had been suggested that the Manchester police were extremely vigilant; but that was a question which could be tested by the criminal statistics. Now, in 1870, the number of indictable offences which came to the knowledge of the police in Manchester was 5,744, while 539 persons were committed for trial, or 1 for every 10 offences. At Birmingham, on the other hand, the offences were 822—and, considering that the population of the two places was nearly the same, this showed the close relation between crime and drunkenness—and 360 persons were committed for trial, or 1 for every $2\frac{1}{2}$ offences. It thus appeared that the police at Birmingham were four times as vigilant as at Manchester. At Liverpool the offences reported were 4,500, and the committals one in $6\frac{1}{2}$, while at Bristol the offences were 210, and the committals 104, or 1 in 2. It was evident, therefore, that the comparative efficiency of the police did not explain the anomaly, but that some other cause which could not be exactly got at drove people to drink, and whether a public-house was 100 yards nearer or farther off would not affect the matter. In illustration of the comparative influence of affliction and prosperity, he might mention that at Manchester, in 1861, during the Cotton Famine, the arrests for drunkenness were 1 in 148 of the population, while in 1870 they were 1 in 32, the proportion of public-houses being 1 to 155 in 1861, and 1 to 146 in 1870. He feared that to aim at restricting the number of public-houses would land them in a fool's paradise, and he believed the large sums of money earned in these places, and the great amount of work to be given for it, lay at the root of the terrible state of things of which they all complained. In short, he must repeat that, looking at all those considerations, he could come to no other conclusion than that the Bill was unjust not only to the persons concerned in the trade in question, but also to the country at large, for were public-houses really the direct cause of the evils mentioned in the Preamble it would be the duty of Parliament not merely to close them, but to forbid the brewers to brew, the distillers to distil, the merchant to import wines and spirits, and to oblige everybody to slake his thirst with what the spring afforded him. The mischief was caused not by the sale, but by the undue use of the drink. Nobody had a right to say to another—"You shall not drink, even in moderation;" yet the Bill would have that effect on persons unable to obtain what they wanted except at a public-house. He opposed it, therefore, as a measure which would prevent Parliament from regulating public-houses, and preventing that abuse of them which was so common.

MR. PLIMSOLL said, that he had never yet been able to give a vote in support of that Bill, because he had never been able to see that two-thirds of the inhabitants of a parish had a right to coerce the other third in a matter affecting their personal comfort. The evils of intemperance, however, were so great, so forced upon their attention at every turn, and his sympathy with the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle, in the hon. Baronet's desire to find a remedy for some of those evils, was so intense, that last year, at the expiration of the Session, he determined to visit the United States and see whether prohibitory laws were as efficacious as they had been represented; for if they really reduced drunkenness, crime, and poverty almost to zero, the objection to infringing the personal liberty of the minority might deserve reconsideration. He accordingly went through Canada and most of the States, and would now give the House a few of his experiences on the subject. In Montreal he found that spirit licenses had been extended to grocers, in the hope that intemperance would thereby be checked; but the effect was quite the reverse, and the measure was accordingly repealed. The experiment of vesting the licensing power in the municipality had also been tried, but the members were subjected to such pressure from their constituents, that they unanimously petitioned for relief from the duty, and it was accordingly intrusted to Commissioners appointed by the Legislature. In the State of Ottawa, again, he found a most extraordinary law, passed a few years ago at the instance of the then Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Dunkin, the spirit of which was to make the publican responsible for all his customer might do, if he became intoxicated. For instance, if a man got drunk at a public-house, and assaulted anyone, the publican keeping the house was liable for the consequences arising therefrom. He could also be sued for damages if a man who had become drunk at his house fell down in the street and perished of cold; or if he supplied drink to a person whose husband, brother, or father had warned him against doing so. In fact, there never had been a measure of a more stringent character, and the House would be surprised to hear what was the result. He asked Mr. Dunkin if any convictions had taken place under the Act, and that gentleman said he did not know. He (Mr. Plimsoll) then said to him—"You conducted the Bill through Parliament, and if anybody had been convicted or fined you must have known of it;" and he replied that no such conviction had ever been obtained to his knowledge. It seemed, however, to him (Mr. Plimsoll) folly to legislate if legislation was not to be operative. In Carolina, no new license was issued unless the applicant obtained the written concurrence of two-thirds of the inhabitants, a provision which he thought might be adopted in this country if the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department should think it worthy of consideration. In Massachusetts and Maine, the sale of intoxicating drinks was altogether illegal. On his asking, however, the present Mayor of Portland, a city of 31,000 inhabitants, how many public-houses existed in spite of the law, he was told that there were probably about 300, and that there were about 2,000 arrests per annum for drunkenness, though only 600 persons were brought before the magistrates, those guilty of no violence or disturbance being liberated the next morning. An agency was provided in these States for the sale of intoxicating liquors for sacramental and medical purposes, and to see how that was carried on, he went to the bar and asked for a pint of whisky. To his surprise, the only question put to him was—"Which sort will you have?" He was so taken aback that he was silent, whereupon the barman handed him a list of 13 qualities of whisky. Finding that General Neal Dow, the well-known advocate of the Maine Law, lived at Portland, he called on him. On his putting the same questions to him as to the Mayor, General Dow denied that there were 300 public-houses, expressing his belief that there were only 50, and certainly not more than 100. He (Mr. Plimsoll) was reduced to great perplexity by these conflicting statements; but he resolved to try and clear the matter up, and he did so in the following way:—The State of Maine had decided that the traffic was illegal, and had prohibited it, but the Federal Government treated the matter in a different way. There were two licenses—the one issued by the State and the other issued by the Federal authorities. There was a revenue officer, whose duty it was to collect the license duty from all persons who sold spirits; but as the public-houses did not differ in appearance from other houses, he was obliged to find out the people who dealt in spirits. He (Mr. Plimsoll) got an introduction to that gentleman; he was called Mr. W. H. Smith; and he found him a very pleasant and amiable gentleman. He informed him that in that town of 31,000 people, there were 12 wholesale licenses and 290 retail licenses. Mr. Smith also told him that, though with the exercise of great vigilance, he managed to collect about 300 Federal licenses, there were he supposed 100 more houses that managed to evade it because the traffic was contraband, so far as the State of Maine was concerned. The Mayor also told him that the number of houses was much the same as before the State authorities refused to issue licenses. In Rockland, Augusta, and other towns he found the same state of things prevailed. In order to judge for himself, he turned out of his hotel one night after 12, to see whether the public-houses were open or not. He found them everywhere open. He had with him the dinner bill of the United States Hotel, Boston, Massachusetts, which he would hand to the Home Secretary, from which that right hon. Gentleman would see that one part of the carte contained the dishes for the day, and the other the list of wines obtainable, with the prices affixed. That was in a State where there were stringent liquor laws intended to prohibit drinking entirely. At Portland, he found the same thing at the hotel where he stayed. That being the case, it did not appear to him that legislation such as that proposed by the hon. Member for Carlisle would secure the object which he and his Friends had in view. He (Mr. Plimsoll) was not a partizan in this question. He was as sincerely desirous as the hon. Baronet to put an end to the evils arising from drunkenness; but he would suggest to the hon. Baronet that he should hold his hand until he had obtained accurate information as to the actual working elsewhere of the system he advocated. Until the hon. Baronet had gone to the trouble to do that, and was prepared by practical experience and realised facts to sustain his proposals, he would ask the hon. Baronet whether it was fair in him—whether, in fact, he was entitled to ask the House to legislate before he had ascertained those important facts? What he would suggest to the hon. Baronet was, that at the end of the Session he should visit the United States and ascertain for himself the actual working of the system he recommended for adoption by that House. Surely, it was not unreasonable to ask an hon. Member who had made a much larger request of the House in asking it to pass that Bill to inform himself as to the working of such laws, for if the Alliance would but send out a dispassionate man to report, they would hear the last of that wretched Maine Law. The Foreign Office might also obtain through their Consuls a Return of the amount collected from spirit dealers in Maine Law States, with the number of arrests for drunkenness and of the population, so as to refute what he must term the mendacious statements made at enthusiastic meetings as to the working of the law in America. Before these restrictions were introduced the sum paid for licenses by publicans was $1,200,000 in one district; since then publicans kept houses without paying licenses, and now they had fallen back upon the old system, they had only been able to collect to the amount of $300,000. He certainly could not vote for the Bill of the hon. Baronet; but he was quite as anxious as the hon. Baronet to promote temperance and moderation, and what he would suggest would be that the issue of new licenses should not in future be made, except with the consent of two-thirds of the ratepayers. They must recognize the licensed houses which now existed; but they could empower the local authorities to buy up say, 1 in 20 of the existing houses per annum for 10 years, raising funds to do so by levying a second license payment of a local character upon the remainder, which, in the absence of additional taxation, would be enormously increased in value by the diminution of their number, and that would neither inconvenience the public nor injure those engaged in the trade. When new neighbourhoods grew up the voting power of the inhabitants would be a check upon the issue of an undue number of licenses. One other important point upon which they should insist was the checking of adulteration by severe and stringent regulations. He knew that salt was largely used in adulterating beer, with the express purpose of creating thirst, and he thought it was a shame that when a workman purchased a pint of beer for refreshment he should find himself more thirsty after than before he had drunk it. Above all, he had great faith in the gradual power of education and moral influences, and he could not consent to impose harsh restrictions on the personal liberty of any individual in the manner proposed by the Bill.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he was quite sure that the House would agree with him when he said that the hon. Member for Derby, who had just spoken, had no need to regret having paid the visit to America, and the acquisition of such a mass of valuable and important information as that he had laid before them, and which must be sufficient to prevent the introduction of a system that had proved in its working to be most prejudicial. At the same time, he (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) quite endorsed the statement as to the strong desire which existed on all sides of that House to deal, in some way or other, with the question. He admitted, also, that the hon. Baronet (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) and those who supported the Bill had the same object at heart as they all had; and it was only because he believed that it would not effect the object they had in view that he should that day vote, as he had voted before, against this Bill. Hon. Members of that House had had that day circulated among them a document signed by many clergymen and other respectable persons in its favour, and a large number of Petitions had been presented; but he could not help thinking that the gentlemen who had signed these Petitions and Memorials were utterly misled in the views they had expressed, for he was satisfied that if the Bill passed it would lead them into the greatest difficulty. In the first place, it would cause an annual agitation throughout the country, for those who entertained the same opinions as the hon. Member for Carlisle, and who formed a majority in any district, would, of course, triumph, and in consequence shut up certain public-houses. But did any hon. Member of that House mean to tell him that during the following three years, at the expiration of which only the decision could be reversed, a constant and perpetual agitation would not be kept up to obtain that reversal? And when that was accomplished there would commence fresh agitation by the defeated party for the same end. Then, again, such a perpetual system of turmoil and confusion would only have the effect of establishing public-houses without capital or character, and thus defeat again the object they all had in view. But then came another phase of the question—they would leave entirely untouched those districts where a majority of ratepayers were opposed to the Bill of the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle. No doubt an evil did exist which it was difficult to remedy by legislation; but, in his opinion, they would arrive at their object by steady and gradual means alone, and not by a sudden revulsion or change of the existing state of things in any particular district. Luton, with a population of 21,000, was an instance that by the application of the stringent provisions of the Habitual Criminals Act and of the Beer Act, passed a few years ago, crime and intoxication could be greatly reduced; for since the magistrates of Luton had rigidly enforced those provisions the grave crimes of that district had been reduced to less than a fourth of their previous number, and the minor offences had been reduced more than 40 per cent. In point of fact, night poaching had almost entirely disappeared from that district. The police reported that a very large proportion of those who previously took part in criminal practices had gone to regular work, because the ill-conducted houses in which they previously concocted crimes had been closed, and at the last Assizes there was only one prisoner for trial out of a population of 30,000 in the district. He believed, moreover, that the trade, generally speaking, was greatly maligned in this matter, for there was no body of men who detested seeing drunkards come to their houses more than publicans, seeing that their property was invested in these establishments, and the conduct of such men exposed them to the risk of losing their licenses, and, of course, what they had invested. In his (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson's) opinion, therefore, any legislation which tended to strengthen the publicans' hands in dealing with such persons would not only give them as a body great satisfaction, but produce the best results not only in the management of public-houses, but in the suppression of drunkenness. That was, in his opinion, the course to pursue; but any attempt made to set up the arbitrary rules of the majority of ratepayers throughout the country would never succeed. He held in his hand a passage from a speech made some years ago by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright), who was not now present in the House, in which he stated that a Permissive Bill, if passed, would create confusion and difficulties throughout the country, and that it was a monstrous proposition that a majority of ratepayers should be empowered to suppress at once the trade of 100,000 of the people of the country. Then, again, there was another part of this question with which the hon. Member for Carlisle did not seem to remember — namely, that it was calculated to inflict a large amount of injustice; for by laches, or by some other means, this state of things existed — that the persons engaged in the liquor trade had acquired the right of custom to have their licenses renewed, and that right would be taken from them. This Bill further proposed that great injustice should be done to a large mass of people throughout the country, because a certain number of houses might not have been properly conducted, and because a certain number of the population had not been able to control their own actions. If the House agreed with what fell from a right rev. Prelate in “another place,” they would refuse to support a Bill which would destroy that freedom to which we owed our dearest possessions — namely, the individual freedom of the subjects of this country. The Bill proceeded from a false point of view; it would be a failure here as it had been elsewhere. It would produce such a reaction throughout the country that they would return to a far worse state of things than the present. As to the statistics which had been often quoted in the House, they ought to be looked upon with great caution, because a large proportion of those figures were merely the repetition of convictions against the same person. He would now refer to something that had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley). In dealing with the subject of drunkenness at Manchester, it should not be lost sight of that there had been a strong agitation going on there for some time past in reference to this question. The police had exhibited greater activity there than in other towns, and Manchester could not therefore be properly brought into comparison with other towns for the purposes of that discussion. When he inquired of the police last year as to the cause of the increase of drunkenness at Manchester and other places, he was told they believed it was more to be attributed to the fact that large numbers of public-houses had been just put down, and the frequenters of them had thereby been thrust into more respectable parts of the town, where they had come more under the notice and observation of the police, than to any actual increase in the rate of drunkenness. He believed that to be the case, and that that circumstance should not be overlooked in making deductions from a comparison of one place with another. In conclusion, he would only express his hope that the House would strive, as far as they were able, to deal honestly, fairly, and even stringently with this question, and would not be led away by any such attempts as had been made that day from the calm and rational contemplation of a subject which required careful and gradual treatment, if any successful result was to be expected from the efforts of the Legislature.

MR. T. E. SMITH said, the experience of the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) would, no doubt, be of great value in that debate, if the extent of the country and the diversity of interests to be affected by the proposed legislation were at all comparable to those to which American legislation applied. One of the evils which attended the American system, however, was that the law was passed by the State Legislature, and thereby many classes and many interests were affected by it, and that led to opposition from very large numbers of the population. That evil had, however, been obviated in the Bill now before the House, which placed it within the power of each place to decide for itself. He (Mr. T. E. Smith) went to America quite as unprejudiced as the hon. Member for Derby, and he came away from that country with opinions entirely different from those of the hon. Member; for he returned with the conviction that it was his duty to vote in favour of the Bill; and from what he saw there, he had no hesitation in saying that the principle of the Bill failed in those parts of America in which it was unpopular; but where the people were in favour of that principle it worked well. The hon. Member for Derby advised the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle to take a trip to America, as he would possibly come back with different opinions to those which he set out. Now, on the contrary, he (Mr. T. E. Smith) believed he would come back with his present opinions more strongly impressed upon him, and he would advise the hon. Member for Derby, though he should be sorry to lose him from that House, to return to America and test the feeling of the country there. Let him become a naturalized citizen of America, and if he wanted to get into the Legislature he would soon find that he would have to adopt the prohibitory ticket. He believed the Bill to be based upon a sound principle, because it was based on the principle that it was not the duty of Parliament to interfere in matters upon which the people were quite capable of looking after themselves. It had been often said that this was an attempt to make people sober by Act of Parliament; but a greater mistake had never been made. Last year they had the Bill of the Home Secretary; this year they had a Bill introduced into "another place;" the Bill of the hon. Member for West Essex (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson); and another brought in by the hon. Member for Fifeshire (Sir Robert Anstruther), and all of those had for their aim a diminution of the drunkenness which existed in the country. Now, all of those he maintained were attempts to make people sober by Act of Parliament; but the Bill now under discussion purposed simply to leave it in the power of the people to decide whether they liked or not to have great and enormous temptations for drunkenness in their midst. He believed the people were strongly in favour of a such a system, and he believed that the Bill was not only sound in principle and wise in policy, but that it was also opportune at the present time. They found that all previous attempts to settle the question had failed, and they had good reason to believe that most of the Bills now before the House would be failures also; that being the case, he thought it was the proper time to urge that the question should be left to the people themselves. He had been told by many friends that at the present day they were suffering from over legislation; but in that particular instance the House was not laying down an arbitrary law, but was simply leaving the question to the people themselves, and that, he believed, was the true way of dealing with the subject. Many men were in favour of the Nine Hours' movement; but if anyone had tried to pass a Bill to make it compulsory, it might have been brought in year after year without the slightest chance of its passing. But that which never could have been done by Parliament had been done by the working classes combining, and thus by united action defeating the great army of capitalists and winning the day. They, in dealing with the liquor traffic, had also a great army of capitalists and vested interests to meet. He quite agreed with the hon. Baronet the Member for West Essex that there were vested interests to be considered, and that whenever the Bill got into Committee they would have to consider the subject of compensation. The country might think it unnecessary and very hard that they should have to pay compensation for what had been injurious to them; but they must do it. They paid out the slaveholder, and they compensated the officers of the Army; and he believed that where a trade had been licensed and had received the sanction of the Government, if they abolished it they would have to do as they had done in other changes which had been made for the public advantage — namely, to pay a considerable sum of money. It was said that the country would not stand it; but he entertained a different view of the question. Professor Leone Levi, in a pamphlet upon the subject, had estimated the fixed capital invested in the trade at £80,000,000. Accepting that estimate as correct, did it not seem an enormous amount; but what was the fact? Why, that they spent annually £100,000,000 upon the traffic itself; therefore, he said, they could approach the matter, and that the financial difficulty involved in the question was not so great as upon the face of it it appeared to be. Believing, then, that the Bill was sound in principle, wise in policy, and that it might be made just in practice, he should vote for the second reading.

MR. F. S. POWELL said, it was impossible for him to feel anything but gratitude to the hon. Baronet and others, the object of whose efforts was the diminution of intemperance; but he thought the best way to effect the desired purpose, was not to enforce severe legislation such as that now proposed, but to rely on the beneficial effects of a moral, social, and Christian education. In discussing that question, moreover, they must not devote too much attention to the experience of Scotland. In England, the great consumption was of beer; in Scotland, it was of spirits. Spirits might be easily bought on Saturday and kept until Sunday; but in the condition in which the majority of the artizan class lived in England, it was practically impossible for them to lay by a store of beer for the Sunday. Another great difference which prevailed between the North and the South of the Tweed consisted in the observance of the Sabbath. It was abhorrent to Scotch minds to have any business transactions on that day; while the same objection did not exist in this country. Therefore, he thought, they could not augur that because severe legislation in regard to one day of the week worked well in Scotland, equal popularity and success would attend similar legislation in England. He wished now to say a word on behalf of the right rev. Prelate who had spoken on the subject in "another place." That right rev. Prelate did not say, as the hon. Baronet had stated, that such a Bill as the present was an outrage on the moral sense of the people; but that it was monstrous to enact that it should not be a crime to manufacture, but that it should be a crime to sell liquor. What the right rev. Prelate meant was, that it would be an outrage on moral sense to allow an article to be made, and then forbid it to be sold. Neither did he agree with the hon. Baronet in regard to the brewers and the present law. He was not connected with the liquor traffic; but he believed the brewers wished to have the law amended in at least three particulars—they desired an amendment of the law of a stringent kind against adulteration; they wished keepers of houses to have a stronger protection against evil-doers, and greater power to enable them to preserve order; and they were also of opinion that the terms and administration of the law should be more severe with reference to those who became drunk or exposed themselves in a state of intoxication in the public thoroughfares. He believed that great benefit would result from the more severe punishment of drunkards, and it was a mockery of law that a person who had been convicted some 20 or 30 times should have a merely nominal punishment. He appealed to hon. Members whether the speech of the hon.

Baronet was not a Maine Law speech. Why, the language which he adopted with reference to those who dealt in spirituous liquors was the language of condemnation. They became "drink men"—they were "spoilers;" and he concluded by calling attention to the great controversy between the public on the one hand and the publicans on the other. He (Mr. F. S. Powell) could not concur in that condemnation. The names of Buxton, Hanbury, and other manufacturers of intoxicating drinks, were associated with all kinds of good works that had made this country great and happy. The hon. Baronet further said that this was a moderate measure. Surely, nobody could describe it as such, except those who in their hearts and souls desired a Maine Law. If the scheme of the hon. Baronet, therefore, was not a Maine Law scheme, his speech was a Maine Law speech. The Bill, however, had a Maine Law Preamble, and the Parliament which said that the "common sale of intoxicating liquors was a fruitful source of crime, immorality, pauperism, disease, insanity," and all the rest of it, and a Parliament which adopted that statement and any longer allowed that common sale to continue, was a Parliament not alive to its duties and unworthy of the English people. It had been his fortune, as it had been that of other hon. Members, to pass some time during the last autumn in America; and he was bound to say that his experience went entirely with what had been stated to the House with so much force that afternoon, and he thought the hon. Member who last spoke described not only the experience of travellers, but the judgment of the United States. Now, he (Mr. F. S. Powell) had received during the last few days a document of considerable interest, published by the Medical President of the State Board of Health in the State of Massachusetts. It bore the date of January, 1872. That gentleman was one of the most distinguished physicians in America, and he was a man of enlarged philanthropy. He said—

"From the study I have made of our correspondence with American agents in all parts of the globe, I am induced to believe that the permission to sell mild ale, beer, and light wines would, under very general rules, be really the promotion of temperance in New England, as it apparently is elsewhere."

The hon. Baronet, too, was singularly unfortunate in the reference he made to Mr. Greeley, when speaking of him as the President-elect. [Sir WILFRID LAWSON: I said in the opinion of some persons.] In the opinion of the majority he would never be elected to the office of President. He was one of the staunchest Protectionists that ever lived in America or any other country; and he (Mr. F. S. Powell) would not quote a syllable written or spoken by a man from whose general policy he believed most hon. Members of that House emphatically dissented. The hon. Baronet had said that he had the American laws in his pocket. It must be a very condensed edition of those laws; and he feared the edition consisted but of extracts, and that the hon. Baronet was not familiar either with all the legislation which existed in all the States, or with the current of reform with reference to the liquor law. The circumstances of this country and the circumstances of America differed most widely. In America such was the invigorating character of their translucent atmosphere that comparatively but little desire was felt for intoxicating drinks, and the volume he held in his hand strongly confirmed that view. The amount of spirituous liquors which was drunk in this country with perfect impunity would produce painful intoxication in America. Therefore, the legislation of the two countries, where there were these important differences in their climate, could not be compared. The severity of the law failed in America, and he asserted that the law, where it was carried into execution, was most irregular and uncertain. The testimony of Americans was that the English policy of only attempting to regulate the sale of liquor was much wiser than their policy of nominal prohibition, the only result of which was regulation in an irregular manner. The hon. Gentleman had challenged him to bring forward one instance of a retrograde action; and he could give him two illustrations of it. Some years ago it was impossible to obtain a glass of beer in any public-house in New York on Sundays; but that law had been rescinded, and now there was no difficulty in the matter whatever. Again, in the State of Connecticut, finding it impossible to maintain the restriction, the Maine Liquor Law had been relaxed in favour of beer. It was interesting to state these circumstances, as they showed that where the law was in force it either was not observed, or that the difficulty of enforcing it was so great that it led to the relaxation of the statute. The hon. Baronet said that a Bill such as this was the logical conclusion of the general desire to put an end to drunkenness; but in his opinion it was the illogical beginning of a new movement. He would give another extract from the report of the same distinguished gentleman, the President of the Board of Health of Massachusetts—

“Alcohol is not by any means the only stimulus that brings disease and misery on human beings, although perhaps it is a stronger inducement to crime than all others. Were there, therefore, a strict rule that no article stimulating to the nervous system should be used by the present party of devotees to abstinence the dogma would split that party into innumerable fragments. It would probably be divided into various small cliques, each excluded for its intemperate use of some favourite stimulus—tobacco, opium, coffee, or tea, &c. Scarcely a week passes that I am not called to ‘prohibit’ in a particular case all use of one or other of these articles. There are thousands of what could be happy lives were it not for the ‘demon of intemperance’ in the shape of tobacco.”

It was said that this was a Permissive Bill; but there were no more mischievous laws than those which were permissive. For the last 25 years they had had permissive laws with regard to the public health, and nothing but evil had resulted, and now that Parliament was alive to that fact, compulsory legislation was about to be enacted. If they desired to suppress habits of intoxication, that would best be done not by measures such as that which the House was discussing, but by ameliorating the condition of the people, by giving them better homes, by improving their workshops, and affording them every opportunity of bettering themselves. In conclusion, he hoped Parliament would not give its sanction to legislation such as that now proposed by the hon. Baronet—a legislation of pains and penalties, of bonds and shackles; but that it would resort to such measures as had already done so much to remove evils which had been long believed to be inveterate and invincible.

MR. BRUCE said, he wished to state in a few words the reasons why he must continue that year to give the same opposition to the measure of the hon. Baronet as he had given in former years,

That Bill was brought in by an hon. Member deservedly popular, who always conducted his case with good humour and ability, and it was supported by men of whom no one could speak without the greatest respect—he meant immense numbers of the working classes and of others who looked to the measure as a means of saving themselves from the evils of intemperance. But when he came to look at the Bill his respect ceased, for it was framed on principles so extravagant and unjust that those who supported it were obliged to do so on some principles which they fancied they found in it, while they passed in silence over its main principles. They said that they supported the Bill because it contained the principle of popular control. But the Bill contained two provisions which were, in fact, its leading principles—one was, that by a vote of a certain majority of ratepayers all sale of intoxicating liquors should be stopped; the other was, that it could be stopped without notice or compensation in any form to those who, without any fault of their own, were to be deprived of their licenses. But those who opposed the Bill declared that it was a monstrous thing that popular control should prevent the sale of liquor in all cases whatever. For it should be remembered that this measure went not only to the suppression of public-houses and beershops, but to the prohibition of the sale of liquor by any grocer or wine merchant; so that a majority of two-thirds might prevent the other one-third from enjoying what in many cases was innocent and in some cases salutary. Was there any evidence that the Bill was likely to succeed in its object? On the question of the existence of drunkenness he wished to say a few words. He was bound in doing so to state that nothing was more puzzling than the statistics of drunkenness, for if he was to judge by his own observation and by what others had told him of their experience, he would say that in the last 50 years there had been a marked improvement in this respect and in the general conduct of the people. But if, on the other hand, he were to look to statistics, the picture was by no means reassuring. He had had prepared by a clerk in the Home Office statistics on this subject, and they appeared to indicate a very formidable increase in the vice of drunkenness. For instance, the number of persons drunk and incapable, and drunk and disorderly, in 1861, was 82,000, or about 20 per cent of the persons proceeded against summarily; but in 1871 the number was 142,000, or about 26 per cent of the whole number of persons proceeded against summarily. In the one case, 1 in 244 of the population was charged with drunkenness; in the other, 1 in 159. Hon. Gentlemen who had spoken on the subject had always connected crime and drunkenness, and, undoubtedly, to a great extent they were right. But how was the increase of drunkenness, which would appear from the figures he had quoted, at all consistent with what was admitted beyond all question to be the great decrease of crime which had lately occurred? The year 1871, for instance, was remarkable for the immense amount of drunkenness. It was a year of undoubted prosperity and of high wages, and a large part of those wages found their way into the public-house; yet in that year there was a very large and positive decrease of crime. According to the figures quoted by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) the criminal statistics of such districts as Liverpool and Manchester, showed charges of drunkenness exceeding in their proportion those of London by about 10 times. And if they returned to the criminal statistics of Ashton-under-Lyne, it would be found that 54 per cent of the offences came under the head of drunkenness. In London the cases of drunkenness were only 4·5 per cent of the crimes committed. The explanation was, that here those cases only were reported which were brought before the magistrates; but for everyone that was brought before a magistrate there were 10 who were locked up by the police and discharged next morning. It was clear, therefore, that in London no faith could be placed in our statistics of drunkenness for purposes of comparison with other places. Judging from the fact that there was, on the whole, a close connection between crime and drunkenness, and seeing that crime had greatly decreased, he had come to the conclusion that drunkenness, too, had considerably diminished. He ventured to say that much might be done in the way of regulation. By the stringent application of the Act of his hon. Friend (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson), and of the Act for the Prevention of Crime, the number of beer and public-houses in the district of Luton had been reduced from 226 to 188, and for 1 that had been opened 39 had been closed. But the reduction in crime had been out of all proportion to the reduction in the number of those houses, because the houses suppressed were exceptionally ill-conducted, and really nurseries of crime. The result was, that the number of criminal cases committed were reduced from 257 in the year ending with September, 1869, to 73 in the year ending with September, 1871. But that was not all; for the grosser crimes, such as might have been concocted in those houses, had been actually reduced by 75 per cent. He argued then, from the evidence which had come before him, for measures of regulation; for there was evidence in favour of regulation; but where was the evidence in favour of the measure advocated by his hon. Friend? The hon. Baronet had referred to America, but on that point it was impossible not to give weight to the evidence of the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll), who had given the results of his own observation, and whose figures were very carefully prepared. It should also be borne in mind that England was a country mainly of great towns, in which a large proportion of the population was collected. In some places where public-houses had been suppressed, there had certainly been a great diminution of crime and drunkenness; but that was in rural districts. And so in America. He understood that in the rural parts of Massachusetts, for instance, the law had operated with some success. His hon. Friend the Member for the West Riding (Mr. F. S. Powell) had quoted largely from the evidence of Dr. Bowditch, of Boston. That gentleman was called upon to report on the subject, but a portion of the information he had obtained went so decidedly against what he knew to be the convictions of the people of Massachusetts, that he shrank from embodying it in his report. It appeared from the report of the Chief Constable of Boston, that there had been a steady increase in the number of persons taken up for drunkenness in spite of all that had been done to suppress the liquor traffic, so that the prohibitory law had been altogether violated. Prohibition had not succeeded in checking drunkenness, but there was one thing, however, in which it had succeeded—and that was in bringing about a systematic violation of the law. What they should do, then, was this—they should do their best to regulate the sale of liquor, but should not set themselves against what appeared to be a law of nature—that was, a desire for the use of stimulants—knowing that if they did so they would be only encouraging evasion and even defiance of the law. This Bill comprised principles which were contrary to a strict sense of justice, and which shocked all by their extravagance; and yet a number of men, whom it was impossible to speak of without respect, came to that House year after year raising false hopes by supporting the measure. He hoped the House would give an honest vote on this occasion, and that those only would vote for the second reading who were ready to support the measure to the end.

MR. BIRLEY said, that although the House was doubtless becoming impatient of the continuation of the debate, he was reluctantly compelled to trespass for a few moments on their attention, in consequence of the observations which had fallen from his right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), who had deservedly so much influence with that House. If he had known it was the intention of the right hon. Gentleman to prefer an indictment against Manchester with regard to intemperance, he would have taken care to provide himself with authentic documents which might have gone far to prove a solution to the difficult problem proposed. He did not believe, however, that they would have settled the matter entirely, because in those questions it was almost impossible to arrive at the absolute truth; but he thought it must be quite clear to the House that there was no real relation between the drunkenness of their large towns and the convictions for drunkenness which appeared in the police reports. He held in his hand a Return of the convictions for drunkenness which had lately been presented to the House, and while it appeared that in Manchester they were as 1 to about 40 of the population, they were in Tenterden about 1 in 3,500. It was impossible that that was a true test of the comparative sobriety of the two places. The fact was, that in Manchester there was great vigilance on the part of the police, and there were not those summary discharges which were of usual occurrence in other towns, and therefore the drunken persons in Manchester were really brought before the magistrates. With regard to the Bill now before the House, he thought it worth while to consider for a moment whether the effect of passing it would be so immediate or so startling as either the advocates or the opponents of the Bill seemed to imagine. His confirmed impression was that if the Bill should pass into law they would find that in some places—not, perhaps, very numerous at first—an effort would be made to put the law in practice. He believed they would find that if the Bill were passed, none of those disastrous results which had been predicted would be realized. The demand for the Bill was not, as had been asserted, the work of a few agitators, but an honest expression of the popular feeling. It had been stated that numerous Petitions had been presented against the Bill; but he respectfully submitted that the Petitions in its favour had been far more numerous, as the signatories could not be less than 1,000,000. Of those at least 100,000 were from Manchester, and as he was a Representative of that city, that was his justification for the position he maintained on the present occasion. The Home Secretary had expressed a hope that the vote taken on that occasion would be an honest vote. He (Mr. Birley) hoped so too. By the Bill it was proposed simply to take the veto of the ratepayers instead of the magistrates, and everything else in the measure might be brought into harmony with that principle; while with regard to the question of compensation to those now engaged in the trade, whether brewers, licensed victuallers, or beer-shop-keepers, he was prepared—and he believed the people of the country were prepared—to act on the most liberal basis. In conclusion, he should not trouble the House with any further remarks than to say he should support the second reading of the Bill.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, he would not detain the House more than a few minutes in explaining the manner in which he intended to vote on the present occasion. In common with his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, and the hon. Members who had spoken, he hoped most sincerely that the vote on the second reading of the Bill would be a thoroughly honest one, and would really represent the opinions of Members on the kind and degree of legislation requisite. Formerly he had voted in favour of the Bill, because it was the only chance he had of entering his earnest protest in favour of stringent legislation on this question; but now he found himself in a wholly different position. He found that at present there were no less than four measures before the House dealing with the subject of the liquor traffic, and he should vote for the one which, in his conscience, he believed most calculated to repress drunkenness. He had never supported the Bill as an advocate of the principle of permissive prohibition; and, if it had passed a second reading and not been altered in Committee in that respect, he should have always felt it his duty to vote against it on the third reading. As he had already said, he had hitherto supported the measure because it was the only opportunity he possessed of showing his feelings in favour of legislation to suppress drunkenness. He approved of regulating the liquor traffic rather than the principle of permissive prohibition, as more likely to effect that object. He thought that any attempt to enforce prohibition in this country would fail. He thought it right that they should try a system of regulation first, and, if that should be unsuccessful, he did not know to what extent he might be inclined to go in the direction of prohibition, in order to suppress the intoxication which now prevailed to such an alarming extent in this country. He regretted that that morning, when the House was nearly empty, the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Wheelhouse) considered it necessary to advert to the manner in which he thought Petitions in favour of that Bill were concocted. His belief was, that there was a very earnest desire on the part of a large number of intelligent men and women throughout the country to suppress drunkenness by all the means in their power, and that they believed that that particular measure was calculated to produce that end; and he therefore did sincerely regret that the hon. Gentleman deemed it his duty to allude in the terms he did to the manner in which Petitions were got up. He had himself presented a large number of Petitions from his own county. He believed they came from the very bottom of the hearts of those who signed them. He respected their feelings as much as he respected anything in the world, and he could not, without pain, hear the mode in which they were spoken of. Although in the altered condition of circumstances he did not intend to record his vote in favour of the Bill, he certainly would not vote against it. He felt so strongly in favour of every measure calculated to repress drunkenness, that he would not vote against the second reading of any such measure, even though he could not support its details; he now intended to give his preference to those other measures which were before the House.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON, in reply, said, he rose at that juncture because he wished, before the House went to a division, to reply to some arguments which had been advanced against the Bill, and not because he desired to prevent any other hon. Gentleman from speaking. He would confine himself to one or two points alone. Perhaps the most telling speech of the debate was that made by the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll), who had made an impression on the House in consequence of his experience in America. But he (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) did not mean to say that prohibition enforced against the wishes and habits of the great majority of the people could be successful, or could work the benefits he desired to accomplish. What he wished was, that where public opinion was ripe for it, there prohibition should be introduced; and he believed that if the measure became an Act of Parliament it would be of no use whatever, except where the great majority of the people wished to carry it out. His hon. Friend recommended him to go to America. His hon. Friend and other hon. Members would, no doubt, be very glad for him to go to America next year, and that he might return too late to bring forward this question again, so that thus it might be got rid of. But he wished that his hon. Friend, instead of recommending him to go to America, would go with him somewhere nearer home. Would his hon. Friend go round with him some night to the gin palaces, and view the scenes of indescribable misery and wretchedness there to be witnessed—scenes more horrible than those which any savage country could present—and then say that he would vote in this House to prevent those poor creatures from getting a chance of being saved? In that House they were legislating not for America, but for England, and on the experience of his own country he took his stand, and he defied his hon. Friend to indicate one instance in which, where drink shops had been done away with by the good will of the people, great good had not been done. While the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Henley) was speaking on the question, and condemning the Bill because it admitted of chance votes having effect in the matter, it occurred to him (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) that the right hon. Gentleman had forgotten that nearly every hon. Gentleman in the House was there in virtue of the chance votes of electors. Why was a vote arising from the too sad experience of the drink traffic to be stigmatised as a chance vote? The poor people of this country had had experience for years past of the results which accrued from drink, and he believed they would do away with it, if they had the chance. The right hon. Gentleman proved too much, for he wanted to show by the statistics which he produced that drunkenness prevailed to a less degree in places where public-houses existed in abundance, than where there were few; but if that be true, the right hon. Gentleman must, if he followed the theory to its logical sequence, become an advocate of an indiscriminate extension of public-houses. When he said, however, that their agitation had banded publicans together for mutual protection, he (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) confessed that he never had better testimony of the value and efficacy of their organization. The Bill was objected to by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department on the ground that it would cause perpetual agitation in the attempt to adopt or enforce it. But was there not already agitation enough on this question? That agitation would never cease until justice was done. It would not be stopped by any of the arguments which had been urged to-day, or by the hostility of the right hon. Gentleman himself, and only a feeling of injustice could keep up such an agitation. The people of England had taken up this question, and, having once done so, they would certainly persevere with it. He should, therefore, go to a division with confidence, feeling that, though he might be defeated, he represented a cause which would ultimately triumph.

MR. W. FOWLER, as an hon. Member who, as yet, had neither spoken nor voted upon this question, said, he had made up his mind that it was his duty to vote against the Bill. Many hon. Members did not appear really to understand the nature of the measure proposed, for it had been described as a Bill for giving the ratepayers some control over the licenses; but it was really a Bill to prohibit all licenses. That was not just, and two-thirds of the ratepayers had no right to prohibit the remaining third from doing that which was in itself an innocent act. He could understand a Maine Liquor Law applied to the whole kingdom; but to hand over a prohibitory power in this matter to two-thirds of the ratepayers in any borough was a most anomalous proposal, more especially as a considerable proportion of the two-thirds would be people of the middle and upper classes who never went to public-houses, and would suffer no deprivation if public-houses were closed. He did not yield to any one in his abhorrence of drunkenness, and entertained great respect for many of the supporters of this measure, and should therefore vote with reluctance; but he could not do otherwise than oppose legislation which would be neither politic nor just, and which he thought unworthy of that House.

VISCOUNT BURY said, he had, also neither voted nor spoken on the question, but felt that it was no longer possible to pursue that course, for the Permissive Bill agitation had reached such a height that it was impossible for hon. Members to walk out of the House without voting, hoping that no notice would be taken if they did so. In his opinion that agitation was not right or constitutional, for it endeavoured to influence hon. Members, not by fair argument, but by undue pressure. Moreover, the machinery of the Bill itself supplied the means of applying pressure to the ratepayers, for by a system of voting papers the classes most easily worked on and overawed would be subjected to the same influences, and would find it impossible to give an impartial vote as to the adoption of the Permissive Bill; so that the result would be the result of agitation, not the spontaneous decision of the people. It was not what the hon. Baronet said it was—a moderate measure; it was a measure for the confiscation of important interests, for the Bill provided that, after it passed, no license whatever should be granted or renewed for the sale of alcoholic liquor—

“Provided, nevertheless, that nothing herein contained should affect any rights or privilege conferred or enjoyed by virtue of any license current or in force at the commencement of this Act during its said currency.”

Now, licenses were current only for the year during which they were granted. Many expired in September or October, and therefore those licenses would be absolutely terminated, and the property they represented would be confiscated, without any kind of warning. He would further say, that having lived in America—not merely as a passing traveller—he would add his testimony to the failure of the Maine Liquor Law in those parts of the country where it was attempted to be enforced. It was now found impossible to enforce it, and the attempt to do so was no longer made; but, even then, it was perfectly easy to obtain drink in any town in the State of Maine. For these reasons, he had no option but to vote against the measure under the notice of the House.

SIR FREDERICK W. HEYGATE, who spoke amid considerable interruption, said, that the effects of the Bill upon Ireland would be very serious, and they had not been discussed. He should, therefore, move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Debate be now adjourned.”
—(Sir Frederick Heygate.)

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 15; Noes 369: Majority 354.

And it being after a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT ABOLITION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. BASS, Bill to abolish Imprisonment for Debt, ordered to be brought in by Mr. BASS and Mr. ROBERT FOWLER.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 156.]

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT ACT (1871) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. VERNON HARCOURT, Bill to amend the provisions of "The Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1871," relating to molestation, ordered to be brought in by Mr. VERNON HARCOURT, Mr. JAMES, Mr. MUNDELLA, Mr. DIXON, and Mr. MELLY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 157]

And it being Six of the clock, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House till Tomorrow, without putting the Question.

SCOTLAND—OFFENCES AGAINST WOMEN AND CHILDREN BILL.

QUESTION.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN asked the Lord Advocate, Whether his attention has been directed to the provisions of the Bill introduced into this House by the Honourable and learned Member for Shrewsbury (Mr. Straight), to authorise the punishment of whipping for certain offences against women and children; and, whether he is prepared to co-operate in extending similar provisions to Scotland?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: My attention has been called to the Bill referred to, the purpose of which is to enlarge the power of punishment under an Act of Parliament which does not apply to Scotland. I am not at present prepared to express any opinion as to the merits of the Bill as regards England, nor can I express any opinion as to the expediency of extending it to Scotland; but I shall be prepared to consider the question when the subject comes before the House.

POOR LAW—BOROUGH PAUPER LUNATICS.—QUESTION.

MR. PEMBERTON asked the President of the Local Government Board, whether his attention has been called to the unequal adjustment of the expenses of maintaining Borough Pauper Lunatics in cases where a Union consists partly of a borough which has not contributed to the erection or maintenance of the County Lunatic Asylum and partly of county parishes which have so contributed, such inequality arising from the imperfect remedy provided by sec. 23 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1867; and, whether it is the intention of Government to introduce any Bill or propose any Clause in any Bill now before Parliament, with a view to remedy the defects of the present system?

MR. STANSFELD, in reply, said, he was aware of the existence of the inconvenience referred to in the Question of his hon. Friend. The sure remedy for the inconvenience would be to amend the 23rd section of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1867. There was no Bill before the House for this purpose, and he did not think it would be convenient to introduce a Bill simply and solely to secure this end; but if before the close of the Session it was possible to introduce a clause for the purpose into another Bill of a similar character, it should be done.

AFRICA (WESTERN)—BANK OF WEST AFRICA.—QUESTION.

MR. LAIRD asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether Her Majesty's Government have sanctioned, or intend to sanction, an ordinance of the Legislative Council of Sierra Leone, granting incorporation to a proposed Bank of Deposit and Issue at Sierra Leone and elsewhere in West Africa, under the title of "The Bank of West Africa;" and, whether Her Majesty's Government will lay upon the Table, before giving their sanction to the said ordinance, if not already given. Copies of all Correspondence, Memorials, Protests, &c. relative to the said ordinance and proposed bank?

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN : The ordinance referred to has not yet been sanctioned, but the matter is still under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. Any Papers presented now would be necessarily incomplete, although somewhat voluminous; but as soon as a decision shall have been arrived at, I will consider the desirability of laying such Papers upon the Table of the House, and will communicate with the hon. Member.

AFRICA (WEST COAST)—THE LAGOS TRADERS.—QUESTION.

MR. LAIRD asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether Her Majesty's Government have received information that the Egba Government or authorities have stopped produce coming down to Lagos from Abeokuta, to the great injury of Lagos traders, in retaliation for the "Prohibition of Export of Arms Ordinance" of 11th September last and other measures of the Lagos Government; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will lay upon the Table Copies of Correspondence with the Administration of Lagos relative to the passing, sanction, and publication of such Ordinance, and of objections made to it by or on behalf of persons engaged in the trade and commerce of Lagos?

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN : Her Majesty's Government have received no official or certain information as to the stopping of produce by the Egba authorities, although reports have reached us of that nature. Governor Pope Hennessy, in whose discretion we have great confidence, is at present visiting the coast, and I should prefer to wait for his Report before undertaking to produce Papers upon this subject. The prohibition of the exportation of arms was in consequence of the disturbed state of the Oil River district; but I believe that prohibition will shortly be removed.

DOMINION OF CANADA—SALE OF ARMS AND STORES.—QUESTIONS.

MAJOR ARBUTHNOT asked the Surveyor General of Ordnance, If it is true that on the withdrawal of the British Troops from Canada, guns of a class which were offered for sale and sold at from £5 to £6 per ton in England, were made over by the Control Department to the Dominion Government at £20 per ton; whether old stores and ammunition, including shot, shell, and powder, were charged for as new, while shot and shell not so bought by the Canadians were sold to contractors at the rate of £2 per ton or thereabouts; whether the armament of Kingston was reduced by about one-half, subsequent to and notwithstanding an order from England that it should be handed over complete, the balance of the said armament being sold as old iron to American contractors, and the powder, which in conformity with the War Office Order above referred to should have been given, being sold to the Dominion Government; and, whether any protest with regard to these matters has been since made by that Government; and, if so, with what result?

SIR HENRY STORKS : No, Sir, it is not true. I will, however, answer the Questions of the hon. and gallant Member seriatim. As regards the first Question, guns of every description which would have realized from £4 10s. to £6 per ton in England, were sold to the Dominion Government at £2 2s. per ton; two new 8-inch guns, 65 cwt., at Kingston, and four at Toronto, which would not have been offered for sale in England at all, were sold to the Dominion Government at £20 per ton, the cost price. As regards the second Question, old and depreciated stores were sold at a valuation agreed upon by the Imperial and Dominion officers acting at the transfer, but new and perfectly serviceable stores were sold at cost price; shot and shell not bought by the Canadian Government were sold to contractors at rates from £2 9s. to £2 17s. per ton, but they were such as remained over and above the equipments required for the armaments and reserves. As regards the third Question, the armament of Kingston was not reduced by one-half and the balance sold to American contractors; the guns and carriages were handed over as they stood, in accordance with orders from England, and with the concurrence of the General Officer Commanding and Officer Commanding Royal Artillery in North America, by whom the proportions of powder, ammunition, and stores for the equipment of the armaments were approved. The only powder sold to the Dominion Government was for a reserve. As regards the fourth Question, the Canadian Government forwarded to the Officers of the War Department in Canada a representation from the Officer acting under the Dominion Government as Inspector of Artillery and Warlike Stores, that the armaments and stores had not been handed over in accordance with the orders from England; but the Officer Commanding Royal Artillery reported that the representation was erroneous, and that the statements were hasty and ill-founded. The Dominion Government applied subsequently to keep all the surplus guns and projectiles remaining after the transfer of the armaments and reserves; but this was not agreed to, it not being in accordance with the terms laid down by the Imperial Government. The general arrangements of the transfer of the armaments and stores were carried out in communication with the Treasury and Colonial Office.

MAJOR ARBUTHNOT asked, If the right hon. Gentleman had any objection to lay upon the Table of the House the Returns upon which he (Major Arbuthnot) had relied for his information?

SIR HENRY STORKS: If the hon. and gallant Gentleman will let me know to what Return he refers, I shall then be better able to answer his Question.

ARMY—FERMOY BARRACKS. QUESTION.

COLONEL C. H. LINDSAY asked the Secretary of State for War, If his attention has been drawn to the unsatisfactory and unhealthy condition of the Old Barracks at Fermoy, and whether reports in reference thereto have not from time to time been forwarded to the War Office; if it be true that the latrines are old cesspits, and that the Control Department have great difficulty in getting them emptied; whether a proposal to construct earth closets has not been for some time under consideration; and, if so, when will that proposal be carried into effect; whether it is the case that the water supply during the summer is so limited that it has to be obtained by means of water carts; and, if he will state the number of cases of measles and typhoid fever that have occurred in the said barracks amongst the men, women, and children, during the months of March and April, together with the number of deaths that have resulted in consequence?

MR. CARDWELL: I have, Sir, made inquiry of the proper department as to the details involved in this question, with the following result:—1, Reports specially reporting the unhealthy and unsatisfactory condition of the old barracks of Fermoy have not been received; 2, the latrines are on the old cesspit system, they are emptied satisfactorily under a contract; 3, the substitution of earth closets has been considered, but no steps have yet been taken for the purpose; 4, the water supply was last year represented as deficient, one of the principal wells was thereupon deepened and a good spring of water struck. In the summer it has been found necessary to supplement the supply by the use of water-carts; 5, the occupation of the old barracks is by 856 non-commissioned officers and men; from the 2nd of March to the 3rd of May, inclusive, there had occurred at Fermoy—presumably at the old barracks—one case of typhoid fever—a soldier; of measles—one officer, three soldiers, one woman, 30 children; one child is reported to have died of measles. Measles have been very prevalent, and the spread is referred rather to infection than to any insalubrity in the condition of the barracks.

CRIMINAL LAW—COSTS OF CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. WATERHOUSE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If, inasmuch as the practice still continues of disallowing certain costs of criminal prosecutions by the Treasury, subsequent to their being duly taxed by authorized officers appointed by the Judges of Assize, he is now prepared to give effect to the opinion expressed by the Court of Queen's Bench on the illegality of such re-taxation, bearing also in mind the statement made in March last that the subject was under consideration of the Treasury and the Home Office?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, that the question how to give effect to the opinion referred to was under consideration; but no measure was as yet sufficiently matured for him to be able to state when it was probable that it could be announced to the House.

COUNCIL OF INDIA—DRAFTS ON INDIAN PRESIDENCIES.—QUESTION.

MR. M'ARTHUR asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Secretary of State for India in Council has authorised an arrangement withdrawing for four months, without notice, the fortnightly issue in London of the Council's drafts on the Indian Presidencies, hitherto depended upon by Merchants in their trade operations; and, if so, why public competition has not been invited in order that the best terms might be secured, and the Merchants made aware of the intended change in financing decided upon by the Indian Government authorities?

MR. GRANT DUFF: I have, Sir, to thank my hon. Friend for giving me an opportunity of saying that the Secretary of State in Council has authorized nothing of the kind, and that tenders will be received as usual, according to advertisement.

ARMY—THE IRISH MILITIA. QUESTION.

MR. O'REILLY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the intention of the Government to reduce the establishment of Irish Militia; and, if so, by what number; and, whether it is the intention of the Government to amalgamate any Irish Regiments of Militia; and, if so, which?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, the question of the future establishment for the Irish Militia is not yet finally decided; but in General MacDougall's Report it is stated that, in proportion to the present population, Ireland has too large an establishment as compared with England and Scotland, and it is proposed to reduce Ireland by 5,000 men. The detailed arrangements with respect to the smaller battalions, as far as they have been yet completed, are given in Schedule A, and the very small battalions will eventually be consolidated.

PARLIAMENT—ASCENSION DAY. QUESTION.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE, who moved the Adjournment of the House with the view of putting himself in Order, said, he had given Notice of a Question on this subject to his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government, and he desired to say a few words in explanation. His remarks had reference to the very extraordinary division which took place yesterday. It was one of the Motions which the Government of the day charged themselves with, and his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government put his name down for it, although—so little anticipation was there of any opposition—it was moved by another Member of the Government. No notice of opposition was given, and yet a “snap” division was taken by surprise, and the Motion was rejected by a majority of 5 a few minutes after the meeting of the House. It had been stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) that the custom was of recent date, and its origin was attributable to the efforts of the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire (Lord John Manners), at whose instance the arrangement was made by the present Prime Minister, acting for Lord Palmerston during Lord Palmerston's Government. But the fact was that the adjournment on Ascension Day dated from 1849. It was moved on the 16th of May in that year by his right hon. Friend then and now the Member for North Staffordshire (Sir Charles Adderley), and it was acceded to on the part of Lord Russell, who was Prime Minister, by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey), who was at that time Home Secretary. He would not dwell upon the discourtesy, to say the least of it, of upsetting an arrangement upon which the House relied. But that discourtesy was in this instance exercised in respect to a matter which affected the religious feelings of Members in that House. [“Oh!”] Some hon. Members might doubt that statement; but the fact remained, and he was not ashamed to own that his religious feelings had been hurt by what had been done, and he believed that the religious feelings of others had been hurt in a similar manner. There were, at least, two religious bodies in the House—the Established Church of England and the Roman Catholic Church—both of whom observed Ascension Day with peculiar devotion. Years ago there had been a revived demand for the observance of services of especial religious significance, and that demand had continued to increase, and he ventured to say that the proceedings of yesterday would make a sensation through the country. He undertook to say that there was not a parish in the land in which people would not be surprised and hurt at what took place yesterday. Some people might think that going to church savoured of superstition.

Mr. D. DALRYMPLE rose to Order.

Mr. SPEAKER ruled that the hon. Member for Cambridge University was in Order, as he intended to move the Adjournment.

Mr. BERESFORD HOPE said, that his Question also referred to the observance of Ash Wednesday—an observance for which day, also, the House was accustomed to provide by not sitting till 2 o'clock. He might remark that in the Division List he observed the names of two Gentlemen, with reference to whose religious susceptibilities the House had been recently manifesting its tenderness. He wished to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, regarding the Division which was taken by surprise at the sitting of Wednesday, shortly after the meeting of the House, in reversal of the continued custom of the House for twenty-three years that Committees should not sit on Ascension Day until two o'clock, he will consider the advisability of embodying the custom by which the House does not sit on Ash Wednesday till two o'clock, nor Committees on Ascension Day till two o'clock, in a Standing Order?

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—
(Mr. Beresford Hope.)

Mr. GLADSTONE said, in reply, that he was not surprised at the Question having been put; but he trusted the House would not be led into a discussion on the subject, not only on account of the interruption it would be to Public Business, but because he did not think any discussion of the matter at the moment would promote the spirit which should prevail on such a day. He felt bound to take exception to the use of the word "surprise" in the Question, because the result must have been a surprise to everyone concerned, and could not be said to have been premeditated, as the use of the word in the Question seemed to imply. He regretted the decision, because it had given rise to misapprehension out-of-doors; but he thought it would be better to postpone the consideration of the matter now on the understanding that the question would be raised before another such occasion arrived, so that the deliberate opinion of the House might be taken upon it. He hoped the House would not think that he was to blame in the matter. He was in the House till half-past 2 in the morning of the same day, and he would have been in his place when the question came on if he had anticipated that would have been anything but a matter of form.

Mr. BOUVERIE explained that he did not rise yesterday to oppose the Motion, but simply to give full Notice that he should do so next year. The feeling of the House, however, was against the Motion, and he did not think anyone had a fair right to complain if, upon a Question being put to the House, as hon. Member chose to say "No" to it and proceed to a division. The leg maxim, Vigilantibus non dormientibus veniunt leges, applied in this case. Those who were wide-awake got the benefit of the law. There were upwards of 100 Members in the House at the time, and he believed as a matter of fact that the Speaker's decision was in favour of the "Noes," and that the "Ayes" forced the division. He admitted his error in reference to the origin of the practice, but explained that he spoke from memory, and had confused what occurred on the subject of Ascension Day with the proceedings in connection with a Day of Fast and Humiliation. Having searched the Journals, he found the Motion originated with the right hon. Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington), and was assented to by Lord Palmerston. Afterwards the Motion was made by Sir William Hayter. But was a mistake to suppose, as the hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. B. Hope) had done, perhaps inadvertently, that this division was in reversal of the continued custom of the House. In 1856 the Motion was first made and agreed to, and it was repeated in 1857. Then followed a gap until 1861. In that year and the following the Motion was agreed to. Then there was a gap until 1865, when in that year and the two following the Motion was agreed to. It was not made again until 1870 and 1871, so that out of 17 years the Motion had been made in only nine. Another point upon which some misapprehension seemed to exist was that the decision come to had obliged the Committees to sit at 12 o'clock, in accordance with their ordinary practice. But the Committees were quite able each individually to adjourn to 1 or 2 if they chose, and the only complaint that could be made on the matter was that, if the Motion had been carried, the Committees were suddenly told they should not sit until 2. As a matter of fact, the Committees, having their time of meeting in their own hands, had eight of them met at 12, one at 1, and another at a quarter to 4—for formal business, probably. So that it was evident the only compulsion was the proposed compulsion of the Committees, forbidding them to sit, and not the compulsion of the House by any refusal of the Motion. It was necessary these things should be understood before forming an opinion on the question.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS COMMISSIONERS— EDUCATION OF GIRLS.—QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether he will state the number of schemes framed by the Endowed Schools Commissioners which has already been sanctioned by Parliament, and in how many of these any provision has been made for the education of girls? He also wished to ask, what is the annual value of the endowments dealt with by these schemes, and what portion of this amount has been allotted to the education of girls? And also, why in the scheme considered by Parliament on Tuesday last for Ripon School no provision has been made for the education of girls?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he had had a very short time for making inquiries, but he would state that the number of schemes sanctioned by Parliament was 27, and that the annual income reached £6,688. Of this, £1,000 a-year was the subject of a very limited scheme, simply abolishing the restriction to Trinity College, Cambridge, of Exhibitions from St. Paul's School. Out of those 27 schemes, 14 made funds applicable to the education of girls. The annual income appropriated to girls exclusively was £887, out of which only £60 a-year was previously applicable to girls. The annual income assigned to both girls and boys, without any proportion being defined by the scheme, was £1,042. With regard to the question why the scheme for Ripon Grammar School made no provision for the education of girls, the reasons were—first, that the funds of the grammar schools were not more than was actually required for the education of the boys; secondly, it happened that there was no person at Ripon who required that it should be applied to girls; and, thirdly, there were very considerable endowments at Ripon, out of which the Commissioners hoped to be able to obtain some funds for the education of girls, and they had already suggested that such an application should be made with reference to a part of those endowments. The Commissioners and he himself were as anxious as his hon. Friend could be that girls should be considered in the application of those endowments, and if his hon. Friend would do the Commissioners the favour of calling upon them, he would find satisfactory reasons for the course they had hitherto adopted. In one particular scheme, in which an endowment of £80 a-year had suddenly grown up to £900 a-year, and in which they were not impeded by the past, the Commissioners had devoted that sum equally to the education of boys and girls. They had endeavoured to push the application of the funds in that direction, in all cases, as far as possible.

PARLIAMENTARY AND MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS BILL—[BILL 139.]

(Mr. William Edward Forster, Mr. Secretary
Bruce, The Marquess of Hartington.)

CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Dowse) rose to move the insertion, after Clause 18, of a clause to amend the Law as to polling in wards in certain boroughs in Ireland. There were in that country three or four boroughs in which the municipal and the Parliamentary boundaries were not continuous. The object of this clause was to authorize the Sheriff to treat the portion of a Parliamentary borough which lay outside the municipal boundary as if it were inside of it, and thus to erect booths and compartments outside of that boundary, so as to afford greater convenience to the electors in recording their votes.

Clause (Amendment of Law as to voting in wards in certain boroughs,)—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland,)—added.

MR. HODGKINSON moved, after original Clause 6, to insert the following clause:—

(Limitation of expenses.)

“From and after the passing of this Act, the expense to be incurred by any returning officer and chargeable to the candidates in respect of each polling station at any Parliamentary Election shall not exceed the sum of seven pounds over and above the expense of providing ballot papers and of the fee of the presiding officer; and the charge to be made by the returning officer in respect of the certificate or return to the writ shall be one guinea, and no more; and no candidate at any Election shall be required to pay any charges or expenses incurred for the services or attendance of any police or other constables at any Election.”

The effect of his clause would be to mitigate, though not absolutely to remove, the evil of which many hon. Members had cause to complain. As long as Members were required to possess a property qualification, perhaps it was only fortifying that qualification that they should be obliged to pay a considerable amount of the expenses of elections. But since the abolition of the property qualification that reason for imposing this burden on them fell to the ground. The payment of those expenses by the candidates was a matter of comparatively modern origin. It was only about 40 years ago that there was any decision that candidates should be bound to pay for the erection of hustings; the ground on which that decision rested being that if candidates and their friends used the hustings they must be taken to have assented to their erection, and therefore must pay for it. It was not until the first Reform Act that those expenses assumed any magnitude. Before that time there was only one place for taking the poll at each election, which was generally held in the Town Hall or some other public building, and the expense, consequently was small. But after the passing of that Act the thin end of the wedge got inserted, and the expenses of elections were thrown absolutely on the candidates by the Legislature. Since then the expenses charged to them had been legally, and some of them probably illegally, increased. He proposed by his present clause to deal with three classes of expenses. The first was, the charge of the Returning Officer for making the return, which was now a very arbitrary one, ranging from two guineas and a-half to 30 guineas. In Scotland they were wiser in those matters. There were only two or three cases in which they paid anything beyond a few shillings for the cost of the parchment. The duty of making the return was a very light one, and he proposed that the remuneration for it should not exceed one guinea, which he thought was sufficient. The second charge was that for the polling-booths. By the Reform Act the maximum charge on this head in an English county was fixed at £40, and in English boroughs at £25; but he could not see any reason for such a difference. In Ireland the maximum had been fixed at £5, and he considered that £7 would in all cases be found sufficient. The third charge was that for the police during the time of election, which amounted in some small places, such as Ripon, for example, to £20 8s. 6d., and Windsor to £155, and which, he thought, ought to be abolished altogether. He concluded by moving the new clause of which he had given Notice.

Clause (Limitation of Expenses,)—(Mr. Hodgkinson,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the said Clause be now read a second time.”

MR. W. E. FORSTER entirely agreed with the hon. Member that election expenses ought to be reduced as much as possible, but thought he could show him good reason for not pressing his clause. In the first place, the indenture expenses had been abolished altogether by Rule 43 of the 1st Schedule. The Act 7 & 8 Will. & Mary, c. 25, s. 2, imposed a fine of £500 upon any Returning Officer who received any reward or gratuity for making out the return to a writ. The charge for the services of the police was not legal at the present moment, and the Returning Officer was required by 6 Vict., c. 18, s. 20, to provide them. With respect to limiting the expenses for polling-booths to £7, he thought it was undesirable to put into the Bill any positive limitation, as the circumstances of different places were likely to vary very much. In some cases £7 would be too small a charge, while in others it would be a great deal too much.

MR. MUNTZ said, he hoped that the hon. Member would press his clause, in order to put an end to the present system under which every official at an election endeavoured to make as much money as he could. When himself a Returning Officer, he was offered an allowance if he gave an order for a certain number of polling-booths.

MR. CANDLISH said, he thought the maximum charge of £7 for polling-booths would undoubtedly in some places be taken advantage of for making an increase of the charge to that amount. No such charge was incurred in the borough he represented (Sunderland), as a room was simply hired for conducting the election. If the Mover of the clause would consent to strike out all but the provision relating to the police, he would support the clause. The hon. Gentleman had just informed him that he was willing to accept this Amendment, which he (Mr. Candlish) would therefore move.

MR. SPEAKER: The clause has not yet been read a second time by the House, and it is not competent for the hon. Member to move an Amendment upon it before it is so read. The Question before the House is, whether the clause be read in its entirety or rejected in its entirety?

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 82; Noes 349: Majority 267.

MR. CHARLEY moved the following clause:—

(Offences how to be prosecuted.)

"Any misdemeanour under this Act may be prosecuted before a court of summary jurisdiction in manner provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts."

He said that his Amendment was in the ordinary form in which a clause was framed when it was desired to give summary jurisdiction to try offences. As the Bill at present stood, a single justice sitting in his back parlour could try these offences; but if his clause was adopted, it would then be necessary that the proceedings should be before two ordinary justices or one stipendiary magistrate.

VOL. CCXI. [THIRD SERIES.]

Clause (Offences how to be prosecuted,) —(Mr. Charley,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

MR. W. E. FORSTER observed, that the offences mentioned in the 3rd clause were misdemeanours, and, in his opinion, they were offences that could properly be tried only before a jury. It would introduce a new practice into the law to enact that misdemeanours should be tried by two justices.

MR. HUNT said, he hoped that the clause would not be pressed in its present form, because the offences named in the 3rd clause were not fit ones to be tried before two justices. As to the offences named in Clause 4, he thought that they should not be dealt with by one justice, and he would suggest that the proper time to bring this question forward would be upon the 4th clause.

Motion and Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH moved to leave out Clause 1. Although the question of nominations had been the subject of debate for several days last Session, and had been much commented on in the public Press, still he felt that he owed no apology to the House for giving it another opportunity of considering whether it was worth while to depart from the ancient practice of public nomination, and to establish a system which he thought would be equally unnecessary and unpopular. He doubted whether the House was aware of the great change intended in this respect; and he was sure that the country was not aware of it. The Bill proposed that a candidate should be nominated in writing; that the writing should be signed by such two of the registered electors as might be his proposer and seconder, and by eight other registered electors. The Schedule relating to this subject carried the process further, and pointed out that the place of election should be a convenient room, situate in the town in which the election might be held, and selected for that purpose by the Returning Officer. The Returning Officer was to appoint the nomination sometime between 10 and 2, and he was to attend during two hours. The nomination papers were to be delivered to the Returning Officer at the time and place mentioned, and the candidate, his proposer and seconder, and one person selected by the candidate, were the only persons to be present during the proceedings. If the election were contested, the Returning Officer was to give notice of the day of polling to the candidate and the persons subscribing the nomination papers. The House would perceive that this was an entire departure from the immemorial practice of nominations, and it would require a considerable amount of justification before it was passed. It might be said that public nomination was a useless and generally riotous proceeding; that the proceeding was carried on in dumb show; and that the consequences were scandalous to this country. He wished, however, to point out that in a large proportion of nominations no riotous proceedings took place, so that the remedy proposed was wider than the grievance, which was a very common form of legislation in these days. In the second place, the nomination was, in a very large number of instances, the actual election. He should not so much have objected to a plan for deciding in private whether there should be a contest or not, because the nomination was not so important where the subsequent proceedings were to be of a public character; but it was most objectionable that the election should take place in a room—a garret or an attic perhaps—from which not only would the public be excluded, but even the reporters for the public Press would be excluded also. To do this would be to trust the Returning Officer with a very large discretion. Had it ever been heard in recent times that Parliament proposed by its formal legislation to exclude from a proceeding upon which the light of day ought to be let in, and in which the public and the constituency affected by it took the greatest possible interest, the reporters of the public Press? The only precedent for this hole-and-corner proceeding was the law requiring that executions should be inflicted in private. But, unfortunately, the Government of the day forgot to introduce such exclusive words as this Bill contained, and reporters were allowed to witness the dying agonies of the criminal, and by their description to demoralize the public mind pretty much as public executions had done. It reflected no great credit on the Liberal party that they should propose to carry secrecy to such lengths. There was a plan on the Paper suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Wexford (Mr. M'Mahon), which would be a great improvement on the scheme of the Government; a plan was proposed by the hon. Member for Dorsetshire (Mr. Floyer) last year, and many other plans might be suggested for divesting nominations of their riotous and turbulent character. There was no occasion, therefore, for legislation of this kind. The matter had been very carefully considered by the Select Committee from whose lucubrations this Bill had proceeded, and they did not recommend that nominations should be abolished. The provision of the Bill of last year as finally settled was less objectionable, for the Returning Officer was then authorized to allow 10 persons, besides the proposer and seconder, to be present. [Mr. W. E. FORSTER: Not as finally settled.] The whole position of the Government with regard to the proposer and seconder and the eight registered electors was full of anomalies, and when understood by the country would be considered ridiculous. The Returning Officer was to placard outside the place of nomination the names of the proposer and seconder, and the eight registered electors who recommended each candidate. What became of secrecy in that case? There was an Irish borough which had been often spoken of in this House—he meant Portarlington—which had not above 60 or 70 electors. [An hon. MEMBER: 120.] Well, it was conceivable that there might be six or seven candidates for a small borough like Portarlington, and if the names of the 10 registered electors for each candidate were to be placarded in public, what was to become of the secrecy which the Bill was to secure? He was quite sure that in the majority of counties the change now proposed would be, in the highest degree, unpopular, and the difficulty which had arisen in the case of boroughs might have been got rid of by other means.

Amendment proposed, to leave out Clause 1.—(Mr. Sclater-Booth.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Clause 1 stand part of the Bill.”

MR. WYKEHAM MARTIN said, that the hon. Member who had moved the omission of the clause had hardly given sufficient weight to the fact that this system of public nomination had been complained of by men of all parties for the last 20 years. As long ago as that an eminent writer described the day of nomination in these words—

“Nomination days altogether are a most unsatisfactory affair. There is little to be done, and that little mere form. The tedious hours remain, and no one can settle his mind to anything. It is not a holiday, for everyone is serious; it is not business, for no one can attend to it. It is not a contest, for there is no canvassing. It is not an election, for there is no poll. It is a day of lounging without an object, and luncheons without an appetite; of hopes and fears, confidence and dejection, bravado, bets, and secret hedging; and, about midnight, of furious suppers, grilled bones, brandy-and-water, and recklessness.”

Most hon. Gentlemen could testify from their own experience to the truth of this description, which he had copied that afternoon from a work written by the only Member of this House who could give so true and striking a picture—he meant the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli). It struck him that this passage, which he had repeatedly read, would have more weight with the House than anything he could say on the subject. There were few hon. Members who had attended more contested elections than himself, and in the whole of his experience during the last 17 years he recollected only three nominations, whether for counties or boroughs, at which the candidates were heard, except perhaps by the reporters and a few friends nearest to them. The doing away with open nominations would, in his opinion, be a popular process, because the people who came to make a row were generally not electors, but men who were hired to do mischief.

MR. FLOYER said, he could not agree with the hon. Gentleman who had last spoken. It was not for him to criticise the eloquent language of the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli); but they all knew in what powerful colours the inimitable Hogarth had painted county and borough elections, and did anyone suppose that such a genuine Englishman as Hogarth did not appreciate the freedom, openness, and hard hitting of English election contests? Hogarth was a man who of all others would stand up for elections carried on in the light of day. There were many distinguished men on both sides of the House who were of opinion that nominations should be carried on in the accustomed way, and many others who would support the old system did they not think that it would militate against the passing of the Bill. But the proposal of his hon. Friend had no such intention. There was no reason, if public nominations were continued, why the Ballot should not be carried and pass into use in the country. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had said that he did not wish to check the public expression of opinion or interfere with any use of tongue or voice by Englishmen. But the greatest interference with use of tongue and voice would occur if they abolished the immemorial custom by which candidates appeared on the hustings. The Times, speaking lately of a great question which agitated the public mind, said it must be relegated to consideration at the hustings; but if this Bill were carried there would be no hustings at all, a customary phrase would lose its meaning, and so even the English language must be altered. It was said that you could not hear what occurred at the hustings. In the county which he represented (Dorsetshire) this had never been so, though there had been stout fights on many public questions. To the best of his recollection, on no occasion had the speakers—proposer, seconder, or candidate—failed to make themselves heard at nominations in his county. Surely means might be contrived by which in particular instances—in cases of riot—nominations might be suspended, and perhaps the plan in the Bill adopted, without abolishing nominations altogether. Believing that such abolition was not called for and would cause great dissatisfaction throughout the country, he should cordially support the Motion that the clause should not form part of the Bill.

MR. OSBORNE: Sir, the picture drawn by the hon. Member for Dorsetshire (Mr. Floyer) of elections in that favoured county is so alluring, that if I could by any chance acquire property in that county I should certainly like to stand upon the hustings there. But let me call his attention and the attention of the House to this—that there is a great difference between Dorset and Nottingham “lamps.”

My experience shows that, while those of Dorsetshire come earlier into the market and are less expensive, Nottinghamshire lambs are very dry and tough. We have heard repeated to-night something about the wisdom of our ancestors. I am sure if our ancestors had lived in these days nominations would have been abolished long ago. In my opinion, one of the most valuable clauses in the Bill is that which proposes to abolish nominations. The hon. Gentleman talked about the voices of the electors. As if the individual voice of an elector were ever heard at a nomination, and as if there were not a general agreement to roar, to hiss, and become debased with drink! The true-born Englishman is said to delight in that day. Now, who are the true-born Englishmen who take part in the proceedings at nominations? Why, the representatives of muscular Christianity—prize-fighters and people of that sort. I have spent as much money in retaining the services of those gentlemen as anybody in this House. One of my most efficient supporters in Nottingham was a gentleman who was always clothed as a clergyman of the Church of England, but whose true profession was that of ex-champion of England—Bendigo by name. This is a sample of your true-born Englishman on whose behalf we are to strike out the 1st clause. The clause is essential to the utility of the Bill. If you wish to improve the proceedings at elections and make people reasoning men, do away with nominations. It is all very well for the quiet inhabitants of Dorset to stand up for nominations; but look at the boroughs of this kingdom, not only in England, but in Ireland too. The hon. Gentleman who moved the omission of the clause said, in the simplicity of his heart, that we might do away with open-air meetings, and hold the nomination in some hall or public room. Why, there is more security in open-air meetings than in any other. In Ireland we have no open-air meetings. It is all done in a private room, where we run into infinitely greater danger. You may escape missiles at the hustings; but what are you to do in a closed room in a small Town Hall, where the galleries are seized vi et armis by opposing forces, and there is a general shindy to get the best place? Immemorial custom, indeed! I know it is a custom which often breeds disorder and riot. It is true wisdom to get rid of these immemorial customs, and thus make the proceedings at elections more quiet and orderly. The men who rejoice in nominations are not the electors, but men paid to be there, with a strong development of the biceps muscle and an uncommon power of roaring. These are your "true-born Englishman." I do hope that the Government, who have given way on so many other points, will now stand to their colours; and they will then do more for morality and good order than by many other things they have done lately.

SIR GEORGE GREY: As I served on the Committee alluded to by the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Sclater-Booth), and concurred in the recommendation of the majority of the Committee, I feel it my duty to state my reasons for supporting the Amendment. The Committee state fairly their opinion on the subject. They admit the fact that there are many cases, chiefly in Ireland, in which public nominations are attended by proceedings which are a disgrace to the places in which they occur. The addresses delivered at these nominations are, they say, sometimes inaudible on account of the interruptions which prevail, and serious disturbances occur. The hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Osborne) has had a somewhat exceptional experience in these matters. He stood for Nottingham, and, as everyone knows, the proceedings at elections in that town are not only a disgrace to it—[MR. OSBORNE: Hear, hear!]
—but are almost without parallel in any other town in this country. The Committee, however, say that in the majority of cases the proceedings at nominations are conducted in an orderly manner. I am of opinion that we ought not to depart from an ancient and a beneficial practice because it has in certain instances been abused. Let me take the case of political meetings at which disgraceful scenes sometimes occur, against which my right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Home Department has been appealed to afford protection. Does anybody suppose that because of such proceedings public meetings should be prohibited? Nobody can for a moment imagine that anything of that kind could be done. We must in this world put up with the mixture of evil with good, and in the case which we are discussing the good, in my opinion, greatly predominates. More effectual means might be taken to prevent disorderly proceedings, instead of depriving the whole of the constituencies of the country of their constitutional right under the presidency of the High Sheriff in counties, and of the Returning Officer in boroughs, to choose, in obedience to the Queen's Writ, fit and proper persons to represent them in Parliament. One of the advantages of public nominations is that they afford a candidate an opportunity of meeting his opponents and criticizing their political opinions in their hearing in the presence of a meeting convened not by the candidates themselves, but fairly representing persons in the constituency of every shade of political opinion. By open nomination an opportunity is also afforded to a candidate to vindicate himself from any unfounded charge which may interfere with his prospects of success. I have not had the experience in contested elections of my hon. Friend the Member for Rochester (Mr. Wykeham Martin); but I have had some experience, for I have stood three sharply-contested elections for a borough in the South of England and two for a county in the North. I must, with that experience, say that I felt it a great advantage to meet my rival candidates face to face, and in their presence to try to justify my claim to the confidence of the constituency. When this is done with candour and good humour on both sides, candidates are, on the whole, listened to very fairly. There must, of course, be some interruptions; but not, as a general rule, carried to any great extent. Under the present system, also, candidates are liable to be subjected to cross-examination for the purpose of satisfying any reasonable doubt as to their political conduct and opinions, and they are placed in a position to answer frankly in the face of the constituency. There is, no doubt, sometimes considerable excitement at nominations; but, in my opinion, political excitement to a certain extent is wholesome, and it would not, I think, be desirable that anything like torpor and indifference should prevail in its stead. I look upon nominations, too, as constituting a means of promoting the political education of the country. We are, I am afraid, becoming over-sensitive in these matters. The evils of nominations are not greater now, I believe, than they were at the beginning of the present century. We have all read the accounts of Westminster elections in former times. They were attended frequently by great disorder, and the candidates were exposed to much rougher treatment than in these days. Mr. Fox, however, was not afraid boldly to face these difficulties. He did not come to Parliament and ask to have substituted for public nominations nominations carried on in a private room, from which everyone is to be excluded but the Returning Officer, and some half-dozen privileged persons. I, for one, very much deprecate the proposed change, and I take the line which I am following in the present instance with the less reluctance because this clause has nothing whatever to do with the main object and principle of the Bill. If this clause be omitted every provision of the Bill with respect to the mode of taking votes at elections will still remain. I wish, in the next place, to say a word or two with respect to some of the provisions which are rendered necessary by the proposal to abolish public nominations. The Committee refer to such abolition as tending to fetter constituencies in the choice of representatives, and also as incurring the danger of the fraudulent withdrawal of candidates. The objections based upon both those considerations are, in my opinion, well-founded. Under the existing system any two electors may propose and second a candidate who comes forward on the day of nomination, and when the candidate has been proposed and seconded after a show of hands he is not allowed to withdraw, and becomes in a certain degree the property of the constituency, if a poll is demanded in the event of the show of hands being against him. Under the Bill, however, a candidate may withdraw at the last moment, leaving no time to the constituency to nominate another in his place, and to that extent depriving them of a liberty of choice. It is possible a wealthy candidate might find it his interest to influence a poorer candidate and to induce him to withdraw, so that a state of things which is now impossible might easily occur if the Bill, in its present shape, becomes law. The complexity of the regulations which the abolition of public nominations renders necessary is one of the reasons why I am opposed to that abolition. Under the existing system a candidate appears on the hustings, he is duly proposed and seconded, and the constituency know all about him. Under the new system there is to be a nomination paper, and there is to be a power given to any person who wishes to object to the nomination to state his objection to the Returning Officer during the time fixed for the nomination or within an hour afterwards, and the Returning Officer is to be the sole judge of its validity. Now, Returning Officers are not all infallible, and the objection may be wrongly allowed. Where is the remedy of the candidate? It may be in many cases impossible to present a Petition to Parliament against the return and to try at his own expense the question before the Election Judge. But if he does so and succeeds he cannot get the seat, though his nomination may have been quite in order. But the main ground on which I rest my defence of public nominations is that they afford candidates the opportunity of fairly and openly stating their opinions before the constituencies. I am desirous, if we are to have secret voting, that the conduct of our elections should be attended with as great an amount of publicity as can be retained in the exercise of a constitutional right and performance of a public duty.

MR. DODSON said, he hoped this question would not be decided by appeals to sentiment and immemorial practice, or to the superior courage of Fox in standing on the Westminster hustings to be pelted with cabbage stalks and other missiles, but by the application calmly of common sense. The real question was, what was the use of public nomination followed by a show of hands? Was it really of any use; and, if so, were its advantages so great as to outweigh its disadvantages? Originally elections were decided by a show of hands. The freeholders were summoned to a particular place for a certain hour on a certain day, and made their choice by acclamation, and the election was practically decided there and then. Down to the time of James I. or Elizabeth it was a moot point whether the granting of a poll was not in the discretion of the

Returning Officer; but gradually a poll was invariably resorted to in cases of contested elections. In these days no one would say that the show of hands decided the election in the event of a contest, or even guided the course of a candidate. No candidate really intending to try to be returned to Parliament was deterred by the show of hands if it should go against him, for he knew that the show of hands was valueless as an indication of the feeling of the electors. Such being the case, it might be asked what made persons anxious to obtain the show of hands? The only reason was that there still remained a sort of lingering feeling or superstition in the minds of election agents, committee men, and candidates that if they obtained the show of hands it created a prestige in their favour, and had some effect on a certain number of voters, who liked to be on what seemed the winning side. He was surprised to hear the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Grey) argue that public nominations tended to the political education of the people, for he was at a loss to conceive how such a purpose could be served by a candidate standing forward to be pelted with rotten eggs and flour, or something less agreeable. Such proceedings tended rather to foster brutality and cowardice. It was said to be desirable that candidates should be brought face to face with their constituents for the purpose of explaining their political views; but, in his humble judgment, public nominations were very valueless for that purpose. It constantly happened that the speeches of the candidates were roared into the ears of the reporters only, and, when printed in the local newspapers, they could have very little influence on the election, because the nomination day was one or two days only before the polling. A much better opportunity for candidates to make explanations and clear up misunderstandings was afforded by those public meetings which candidates attended some time before the approach of the election. The hon. Member who moved the rejection of the clause (Mr. Sclater-Booth) did so on the ground that nominations under the Bill would be secret. For his part, he supported the clause, not because it provided for secret nominations, but because it tended to secure orderly nominations without destroying any wholesome publicity or depriving the electors of the opportunity of becoming acquainted with the character, ability, and the opinions of the candidate.

VISCOUNT BURY felt compelled to vote for the rejection of the clause. A Parliamentary election was now going to be one long, solemn, secret ceremony, and he thought it desirable to retain, as far as possible, any amount of publicity compatible with the other objects of the Bill. Nominations would be made so secret under the Bill that the electors would know nothing about them, and it was only when the ballot papers were put into their hands on the day of polling that they would learn from them what candidates had been nominated. Under the Ballot, trades unions would be the real moving power in politics, as their members would vote in organized masses. Individual electors, not belonging to organizations, would exercise little influence on the result. Meetings held before the election would not ensure sufficient publicity, inasmuch as they would be organized by candidates from among their own supporters; and, therefore, it was desirable that there should be public nominations, at which each candidate would be openly proposed and seconded. No one going before a constituency would like to forego the advantage of being proposed by some eminent and respected elector; but by the mode of nomination proposed by the Bill that advantage would be lost, as the nomination would be in secret.

MR. CHILDERS objected to the Motion for the rejection of the clause, both on account of form and substance. As regarded form, he thought it most inconvenient, after they had decided this question very lately and carried the clause by a larger majority than almost any other part of the Bill—["No, no!"] Then, perhaps, he might be permitted to say that after the partial discussions and divisions this year, and after the general principles had been decided last year by a larger majority than supported any other part of the Bill, it was an inconvenient course for the hon. Member now to take to propose the rejection of the clause without letting the House know what he proposed to substitute for it. This was especially inconvenient on the Report. They had had a great deal of experience of the working of public nominations in this country, and there had been no small experience of the working of another system elsewhere. He had been twice asked publicly to explain the working of certain portions of the system of election by Ballot elsewhere, and, therefore, coming to that point, he should say that where Ballot had been substituted for open voting nominations had been abolished, and the result had uniformly been satisfactory, and none of the evils anticipated by his right hon. Friend the Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey) and other Gentlemen had occurred. And what had been their experience of the existing system in this country? Only one special case had been pointed out, and it was said that great benefit had been derived from the addresses of candidates during the Westminster election. Allusion had been made to the speeches of Mr. Fox; but those speeches were delivered during the 20 or 30 days of the poll, not on the nomination day. In the great majority of cases the speeches on nomination days were set speeches, which were not often heard; and as to the effect of those speeches when heard, it was, he believed, correct to say the show of hands was, in the majority of instances, reversed by the result of the poll. He hoped the House would reject the Amendment.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished merely to observe, with respect to what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), that he was citing the experience of the youngest of their Colonies against that of both Canada and England; and he must be allowed to add that the tenor of the right hon. Gentleman's speech reminded him of the objection which most people entertained to accepting instruction from their children. In fact, it reminded him forcibly of the old saying about "teaching one's grandmother to suck eggs." He had had considerable experience of contested elections during the four or five contests he had stood. He had known occasions when attempts had been made to interrupt the proceedings. He had seen a thousand men sent to a nomination by train for the purpose of interruption; but he had seen such attempts put down, and order restored. By thus vindicating the rights which for years they had enjoyed, the people learnt the lessons of self-government, and he was convinced that the majority of that House, by seeking to deprive the orderly inhabitants of the opportunity of catechising their candidates at the hustings, and by the course they were in other respects pursuing, were striking at the great principle of self-government.

MR. BOUVERIE said, if the House accepted this clause, a nomination would become so like a funeral that they might as well have the parish church bell tolled during the proceedings. Whatever the reception of the clause by the House, it would be essentially unpopular with the great body of the English people. If open nominations were abolished, the great mass of non-electors who now took part in the election by the show of hands would be deprived of that right, and the election would then be a matter to be settled only between the electors and the candidates. That would be most unpopular. Nominations were, in fact, the means of an education in politics to the great mass of non-electors, and they were the only practical, feasible method by which they could start a candidate in a simple, plain manner without these technicalities of procedure specified in the schedules, a failure in which would afford the readiest means of upsetting an election. Several provisions in those schedules presented a mass of traps, pitfalls, and snares which would undoubtedly be laid hold of by active election agents; and as the Returning Officer was in certain cases the sole and final judge with regard to the validity of voting papers, it might turn out that of the two electors who were to nominate a candidate, and the eight others who were to sign the nomination, not one might happen to be a registered elector, and a candidate thus be shut out without any poll whatever. The papers might be concocted by an astute election agent, so as to create these difficulties. It was of the utmost importance that the mode of starting candidates should be perfectly free from any technicality. If this clause were adopted, they would be opening the door to disputes and Election Petitions, and means of avoiding seats which had hitherto been entirely closed under the present system, and of which they were now utterly unaware.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 253; Noes 177: Majority 76.

Mr. Newdegate

Offences at Elections.

Clause 3 (Offences in respect of ballot boxes and ballot papers).

MR. CHARLEY said, that when the Bill was in Committee they consented, on the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Serjeant Simon), to qualify certain offences named in sub-sections 4 and 5, by requiring that they should be committed "fraudulently;" but, as the Committee had proceeded too far to insert the word, a proviso was added to the effect that a person should not be convicted unless he had done one of the prohibited acts "fraudulently." He now proposed to get rid of this proviso by introducing the word "fraudulently" into the sub-section, and, as they contained the words "without due authority," which would be unnecessary if "fraudulently" were inserted, he proposed to omit them in order to insert "fraudulently." He also proposed to qualify the offences mentioned in sub-sections 3 and 6 in the same way. Therefore, from the third sub-section, "Without due authority supplies any ballot paper to any person," he moved to omit the words "without due authority" for the purpose of inserting the word "fraudulently."

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 4, to leave out the words "without due authority."—(Mr. Charley.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'without due authority' stand part of the Bill."

MR. W. E. FORSTER remarked that the hon. and learned Member had given Notice of three Amendments on this clause. He could not accept the first of them, but had no objection to those on sub-sections 4 and 5, and the consequent omission of the proviso at the end of the clause. As for sub-section 3, it was thoroughly considered in Committee, and passed as it stood without a division. It was felt that there ought to be a restriction to "fraudulently" in sub-sections 4 and 5; but as it was then too late to insert the necessary words in the clause itself, a proviso was added. He had no objection to the insertion of the words in the body of the clause and the omission of the proviso.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CHARLEY then moved in sub-section 4 to insert "fraudulently;" in sub-section 5 to leave out "without due authority," and insert "fraudulently;" and to leave out the proviso at the end of the clause.

Amendments agreed to.

Clause 4 (Infringement of secrecy).

MR. CHARLEY moved, in page 3, line 35, after "agents," insert—

"Shall communicate at any time to any person any information obtained in the polling station as to the candidate for whom any voter in such station is about to vote or has voted."

Without the insertion of some such Amendment, the words "officer, clerk, or agent" would be superfluous and devoid of significance. In his opinion, the right hon. Gentleman ought to extend to this part of the clause the principle which had been carried with regard to displaying a ballot paper—namely, that punishment should be inflicted, not on the voter who displayed his ballot paper, but on the person who induced him to do so. In like manner, he proposed that a penalty should be imposed on the person who induced an elector to state how he had voted. He contended that it was impossible to carry the clause as it stood into effect, and to impose perpetual silence on voters. Indeed, he had always thought the Ballot would fail to attain the object its supporters had in view; because supposing an elector declined to state for whom he had voted, his landlord or employer would have no difficulty of turning him out of his farm or employment if he could do so under the existing system. Therefore, he maintained that without some such Amendment as that which stood next on the Paper the Ballot would be practically useless.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 35, after the word "agent," to insert the words "shall communicate at any time to any person any information obtained in the polling station as to the candidate for whom any voter in such station is about to vote or has voted."—(Mr. Charley.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he was unable to accept any of the Amendments which his hon. and learned Friend proposed to introduce into this clause. One of them would have the effect of relaxing the operation of the clause, while another would greatly increase the penalty. The Amendment just moved would enable any person who was not an officer, clerk, or agent to communicate any information he might obtain as to how an elector voted. A division on this subject was taken in Committee, when it was agreed that the restriction must apply to all persons.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. CHARLEY next moved the omission of the word "summary," and the insertion of words to the effect that misdemeanours under the Bill should be prosecuted before a court of summary jurisdiction in the manner provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts. As the clause at present stood an offender might, under the provisions of Jarvis's Act, be tried by a single Justice in his back parlour. As, however, these were new offences, he thought it was only fair that persons charged with having committed them should be tried by two unpaid Justices or by a stipendiary magistrate.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 5, to leave out the word "summary," and insert, after the word "conviction," the words "by a court of summary jurisdiction."—(Mr. Charley.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'summary' stand part of the Bill."

MR. ASSHETON CROSS wished to know whether there was any limitation of the time within which a man could be brought before the Justices?

MR. MONTAGUE CHAMBERS said, he thought the omission of the word "summary" would be perfectly useless, if the object were to prevent cases being decided by a single magistrate. He would suggest that the words should run thus—"On summary conviction by two Justices or by a stipendiary magistrate."

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he could not at that moment answer the question put by the hon. Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. Cross), but promised to make inquiry on the point raised. He thought the object of the hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Charley) might be attained by the addition after "conviction" of the words "before two Justices of the Peace."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. W. E. FORSTER moved the insertion of the words "before two Justices of the Peace."

MR. MONTAGUE CHAMBERS suggested the addition of the words "or a stipendiary magistrate."

MR. HUNT said, he believed the latter words would be superfluous, as there was a General Act making a stipendiary magistrate equal to two Justices.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. ASSHETON moved the insertion of words in the clause which would compel the authorities in boroughs as well as in counties to divide them into polling districts, and assign polling-places to each district. There were many boroughs which were as extensive as counties, and he did not see why the voters in such boroughs should not have the same convenience as those in counties. Another reason in support of his proposal was that whereas the cost of conveying voters to the poll might be paid in counties by the candidates, they could not be paid in any large boroughs, except in five which were specified in the Act of 1867.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 8, after the word "county," to insert the words "and of every borough."—(Mr. Assheton.)

Question proposed,—"That those words be there inserted."

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he could not accept the proposal. He thought that Parliament did not possess a sufficient knowledge of the circumstances of boroughs as compared with one another to be justified in laying down any stringent rule such as was applied to counties. It was felt by the Government that they could not go further in this respect than to provide that in boroughs the local authorities should take into consideration the division of the borough into polling districts, and report to Parliament, through the Secretary of State, the conclusion at which they had arrived.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON reminded the House that as the Bill stood the local authorities would only have the option of dividing the boroughs into polling districts, and would not be able to assign a polling place to each district, as would be done in counties. He thought the one power without the other would be of very little use, and might as well be omitted from the Bill.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause 6 (Use of school and public room for poll).

SIR HERBERT CROFT moved the insertion of words in page 5, line 27, to provide that Returning Officers might use schools aided by Government as polling places, unless they could "procure other convenient premises at a moderate cost." He thought the proposal was a very moderate one, and hoped the House would agree to it. Before sitting down he wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to a statement which he was reported to have made in a previous discussion upon this point. The right hon. Gentleman was reported to have said that the managers of rate-aided schools had the power already to allow the schools to be used as polling places. [Mr. W. E. Forster said, he had no recollection of having made this statement.] He was glad to hear the disclaimer, as the report had caused some surprise in his part of the country. If the House would pass his Amendment he should be perfectly willing to accept any words which would prevent the possibility of public-houses being used as polling places. It was said that, these being Government-aided schools, the Government had a perfect right to the use of them; but, as had been stated in a letter to himself by an Association of Schoolmasters, the Government stood to the schools in the relation not of proprietors but of contributors only.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 27, after the word "Election," to insert the words "unless he can procure other convenient premises at a moderate cost."—(Sir Herbert Croft.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he could not assent to the Amendment. The matter had been fully considered, and it was the feeling of the House that this was a proper and patriotic use to which schools might be put. Considering the large share of public money which the schools received, the use of them on these occasions might fairly be requested, and no single complaint had come to his knowledge from the school managers as to this provision in the Bill.

Mr. BERESFORD HOPE regretted that the Amendment could not be accepted. He did not deny that if no other public buildings were available, the use of these schools was a quid pro quo which the State might properly require. But when the House recollected what an election was, and what it no doubt would remain even under this immaculate and transcendental system of voting, was it not desirable that the schools should be kept clear from association with politics? There was a chance of a row, and if in this row any damage was done to the school building, some days must elapse before it could be patched up, so that there would be an interference with the attendance of the children.

Question put, and negatived.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER moved, in Clause 8, page 6, line 9, after "Act," insert—

"All expenses properly incurred by any returning officer in carrying into effect the provisions of this Act in the case of any Parliamentary Election, shall be payable in the same manner as expenses incurred in the erection of polling booths at such election are by law payable."

He expressed his regret that the proposal to throw the expenses on the rates had been rejected.

Mr. HUNT said, some new expenses would be incurred under this Bill, such as the cost of ballot boxes. It would not be necessary that new ballot boxes should be made for every election, and if they were made to last for a generation it was unfair that the first candidate should pay the cost.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER feared it would be impossible to make a fixed rule on the matter.

Mr. RYLANDS said, there would be a number of fittings to put up as well, and they would be of a permanent character, to serve for the municipal elections. These would have to be provided for whichever election came first, and he thought the proper plan would be to charge them upon the municipality.

Amendment agreed to.

THE LORD ADVOCATE moved, in Clause 16, page 8, line 31, after "Scotland," to insert—

"5. The ballot boxes, ballot papers, stamping instruments, and other requisites for a Parliamentary Election shall be provided and paid for in the same manner as polling rooms or booths under the fortieth section of the Act of the second and third years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter sixty-five, intitled 'An Act to amend the Representation of the People in Scotland;' and the reasonable remuneration of presiding officers, assistants, and clerks employed by the returning officer at such an Election, and all other expenses properly incurred by the returning officer, and by sheriff clerks and town clerks, in carrying into effect the provisions of the Act, shall be paid by the candidates."

He said he wished to make one correction in, and one addition to, the clause as it appeared on the Paper. The correction was this—the Act to amend the Representation of the People in Scotland was referred to as of the reign of Her present Majesty, whereas it ought to be of the reign of William IV. The addition consisted of this—his hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd) had put an Amendment on the Paper which was to this effect:—Page 29, line 1, after "Scotland," insert paragraph 57—

"The fee to be paid to each presiding officer shall in no case exceed the sum of three guineas per day, and the fee to be paid to each assistant to the returning officer, and to each clerk, shall not exceed one guinea per day."

Now, he (the Lord Advocate) proposed to adopt that as an addition to the subsection he proposed. He therefore begged to move the sub-section, together with the proviso of his hon. Friend.

Mr. HUNT said, he thought if such a proposal were to be adopted at all, it should be in the form of a general clause applicable to the three kingdoms, and not in that of an Amendment tacked to a Scotch clause.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, he could not speak as to the circumstances of Scotland; but the result of making the proviso general would be to increase the expense in England, where many of the presiding officers had not three guineas a-day.

Mr. MONK considered uniformity of liability should be observed, and if candidates were to pay for ballot boxes in one country they should do so in all parts of the United Kingdom.

Mr. HUNT wished to know whether the ballot boxes were to become the property of the candidates who paid for them?

THE LORD ADVOCATE explained that after the first election new implements would not require to be made, as the old ones would suffice for a number of elections.

MR. GOLDNEY said, he thought the Amendment dealt with matters of detail which were too minute for discussion at this stage of the Bill.

MR. MILLER said, the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Lord appeared to him to take Scotland out of the operation of Clause 14 of the Bill, under which the implements, if he might so call them, to be used at a municipal election might be used in a Parliamentary election, or the implements to be used in a Parliamentary election might be used in a municipal election, the effect of which would be that there would be but one set of ballot boxes, and so forth; and, in consequence, considerable expense would be saved to the candidates. Now, he should like to be informed by the right hon. and learned Gentleman whether the Amendment or addition which he had proposed, and which referred to ballot boxes, ballot papers, stamping instruments, and other requisites for a Parliamentary election, would take Scotland out of the operation of the 14th clause of the Bill as it stood, and thus deprive Scotch candidates of the benefit which it would confer upon candidates in this country?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, his hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh was good enough to ask—

MR. SPEAKER: The learned Lord has already addressed the House, and can only speak again by its indulgence.

MR. CAWLEY was of opinion that the Committee should not deal with the rates in the fragmentary manner proposed by the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, with the indulgence of the House he was prepared to answer the question put to him by his hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh. He meant to explain—he was sorry he did not make himself understood or heard by the hon. Gentleman opposite who had just spoken—that he assented to the Amendment proposed by his hon. Friend the Member for Ayr to a different part of the Bill, because it appeared to him that the more convenient place for its introduction was to append it to the Amendment which he had himself proposed. It related to the fees payable by the presiding officer; and he was of opinion that it was necessary to make some provision upon the subject, because otherwise there would be no limitation to the fees payable to that officer, or to his assistants and clerks, and it was obviously proper and convenient that there should be some limitation. As the limitation proposed by his hon. Friend was in accordance with the present law and practice, he thought it not inexpedient to adopt his Amendment.

DR. BALL said, it was impossible for the sheriff in the interval between the nomination and the polling to have these ingenious pieces of machinery constructed so as to be really impervious to view and defeat the various tricks practised at elections. It was unfair that the candidates should be asked to pay for those things. He thought that ballot boxes might be paid for out of the Consolidated Fund—a fund for which they had a great affection in Ireland. He objected to Irish candidates, who were not at all so rich as the English, being put to the expense of erecting screens to cover the voter, and other things of that kind.

LORD JOHN MANNERS suggested that it would be more advisable to take the Amendment of the hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd) in its proper order, instead of proceeding with it by anticipation. Hon. Gentlemen might come down later in the evening prepared to discuss it in its due course, and then find that it had been already disposed of.

MR. HENLEY believed it would be unfortunate if one law in this matter were adopted for Scotland and another for the rest of the United Kingdom. It would be miserable economy, for the sake of a small saving, to put inferior persons in the responsible position of presiding officers; and mischief might arise from their doing so which it would not be easy to set right afterwards.

MR. GORDON said, the Amendment proposed was quite necessary. The regulation of the necessary expenses should be left in the hands of the sheriff clerks or town clerks, as the case might be, and not in those of the Returning Officer, who was a Judge, and not therefore in a position to enter into a contract for booths or to make the other necessary arrangements for an election.

When, however, they came to the first point—the ballot boxes, ballot papers, and so forth—it was said that they were to be provided in the same manner as the polling booths. It appeared to him to be a little hard that if an election took place, and there was no occasion for any polling, it should be necessary for the Returning Officer to provide these ingenious contrivances, the ballot boxes and the other paraphernalia of this new system of voting, and that the candidate who had derived no benefit from the proceeding should be subjected to the expenses of it. The first candidate in Scotland under the new system was to bear the expense, and was not to be recouped in any way by his successors.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING (for Mr. PRM) moved, in Clause 17, page 8, after line 39, to add as sub-section 3 the following:—

"The provision contained in the sixth section of this Act providing for the use of schoolrooms free of charge, for the purpose of taking the poll at Elections, shall not apply to any school adjoining or adjacent to any church or other place of worship, nor to any school connected with a nunnery or other religious establishment."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING next proposed a sub-section to Clause 17, that no Returning Officer in Ireland should be paid for polling-booths and compartments in court-houses and other public buildings other than the sums actually paid by him for the same. At present the sheriff, who always took possession of the court-house for the purpose of a polling booth, was entitled to charge for 12 compartments in a public building which did not cost him a farthing.

Sub-section agreed to.

MR. O'CONOR (for The O'Conor Don) proposed, in page 9, line 8, to leave out the "first day of January," and insert the "fifteenth day of October." The result of this alteration would be that the voting arrangements would be in perfect order by the time the next General Election was held—namely, by October 15, 1873, instead of January 1, 1874.

Amendment proposed, in page 9, line 8, to leave out the words "first day of January," and insert the words "fifteenth day of October." — (The O'Conor Don.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'first day of January' stand part of the Bill."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. DOWSE) said, that the subject had been considered by the Irish Government, but the difficulties in the way of the Amendment were greater than were apparent. The polling places could not be got ready by the time mentioned in these Amendments unless all the subsequent dates were altered, and it would be necessary to have a special Revision Sessions in every county in Ireland. An appeal from the decision of the sessions must also be provided for, which would occupy several weeks. He should be glad if he saw his way to carry into effect the object aimed at by his hon. Friend. He admitted that with some difficulty the operation of the clauses could be accelerated by some months; but the Amendments on the Paper would be quite unworkable. As far as was in his power he would endeavour before the Bill became law to meet the wishes of hon. Members, unless he found this was absolutely impossible.

MR. O'REILLY remarked, that no sooner was the possibility of accelerating the operation of these provisions perceived six weeks ago than the attention of the Attorney General for Ireland was called to it by nearly all the independent Members from Ireland concerned in securing peaceful and satisfactory elections. He then admitted privately, as he had now done publicly, that the thing could be done, and he promised to look into it and frame provisions for the purpose. At a later period a Member of the Government, having no great confidence in Amendments standing on the Paper in the right hon. and learned Gentleman's name, urged the hon. Member for Roscommon (The O'Conor Don) and other Members to try and frame the requisite provisions. The hon. Member accordingly placed an Amendment on the Paper, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman's attention was called to it. He undertook to consider it, and see whether it was effectual for the purpose, and to give an answer on this point. The Amendment had remained on the Paper some time; but the right hon. and learned Gentleman's answer that it was not effectual was only given privately at 6 o'clock this evening. The right hon. and learned Gentleman now admitted that the object was attainable, and undertook that during the progress of the Bill in "another place," where he would have no control over it, he would endeavour to carry it into effect. Why could it not be carried into effect before the Bill left this House? It was almost impossible for private Members to carry an Amendment, and he would appeal from the right hon. and learned Gentleman to the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill. A pledge by him that the object should be attained would be frankly accepted.

MR. SYNAN urged that it was the duty of the Government to enable additional polling-places to be provided in Ireland, in the event of an Election in 1873. He could see no difficulty in arranging for special Sessions eight or ten months earlier than October, 1873, and surely the expense or the additional duty cast on the chairmen of Quarter Sessions was no obstacle?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, as his right hon. and learned Friend could not rise again, could only confirm what he had said. His right hon. and learned Friend was desirous of bringing the provisions as to polling places into operation as quickly as possible; but he found a difficulty—as was the case also in England—in extemporizing a register out of the usual time. He had on examination found it insuperable, or at least not surmountable without grave inconvenience—such as the work being done badly, and a considerable increase of cost. His right hon. and learned Friend would be glad to communicate with Irish Members, and would undertake, if the thing was found practicable, that it should be considered by those who would be in charge of the Bill in "another place." It was impossible now to assent to an Amendment which would be ineffectual for its purpose.

LORD JOHN MANNERS regarded the proposal that Irish Members should confer with the Attorney General for Ireland with the view of procuring the insertion of an Amendment in the House of Lords as one essentially Irish in its character. Why should not the matter have been considered in time for the insertion of the Amendment here? In England the difficulty had not been found insurmountable, and if the Bill, which he forbore to designate by the epithet it deserved, became law, elections in some counties at an early date under the new-fangled system of voting would be accompanied by the additional polling places which the Government admitted to be necessary. In Ireland, however, as the Bill stood, those polling places could not be provided in time for elections next year. The reasons assigned for this were unsatisfactory. That an appeal from the decision of the magistrates might occupy some weeks was no reason why Ireland should be exposed to the risk of a General Election without additional polling places. If the hon. Gentleman went to a division, he should support him.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, the Attorney General for Ireland had given a pledge that he would do what he could in this matter. They all knew that right hon. and learned Gentleman's powers, and there could be no doubt that he could and would do what was required. If what was asked for were not done, the result would be this—if a General Election were held in 1873, elections in England and Scotland would be by ballot, but in Ireland they would be under the existing system. He thought his right hon. and learned Friend would take care that what was asked for was done.

SIR FREDERICK W. HEYGATE said, he thought the statement of the Attorney General for Ireland was not at all satisfactory. What needed correction in the Bill should be corrected in that House, and not left to be dealt with in "another place." The remedy asked for was a very simple matter. If that remedy were not provided, some electors would be 8, 10, or 12 miles from a polling place. He should support the Amendment.

MR. BRUEN said, when the Bill was going through Committee he drew attention to the fact that there were many schools which ought not to be selected as polling places, and the Attorney General for Ireland said he would put an Amendment on the Paper referring to that question; but no Amendment had been put on the Paper, and but for the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Dublin (Mr. Pim), he believed that matter of the schools would have been left unremedied. The hon. Member for Roscommon (The O'Connor Don) had put another Amendment on the Paper to remove another blot in the Bill, and this he (Mr. Bruen) believed was the proper time to deal with that question.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Dowse) said, he did prepare an Amendment with regard to the schools and had it ready to put on the Paper; but his hon. Friend the Member for Dublin (Mr. Pim) came to him and said that he had an Amendment on the Paper on the same subject, and he (the Attorney General for Ireland) said he would accept it. That Amendment had been moved, and was accepted by the House, in the absence of the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Bruen).

DR. BALL said, the difficulty in the clause was caused by the penuriousness with which everything relating to Ireland was treated. The Attorney General for Ireland would have been able to manage the whole matter if the money had been forthcoming for enabling a more rapid procedure to be made. Of course, if the money were not forthcoming the more rapid procedure could not take place; and there was this objection to leaving the matter to be settled by the House of Lords—that that House could not deal with money questions.

MR. HUNT said, he thought the best plan would be to re-commit the Bill for the purpose of amending this clause, and that course could be adopted without causing much delay. It was not unusual to re-commit a Bill for a special purpose, and in this instance the process would not delay the Bill more than one day, for a little discussion would doubtless enable the House to arrive at some conclusion in the matter. Such a course would be more satisfactory than a postponement of the question to "another place."

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 130; Noes 90: Majority 40.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH rose to move, in Clause 23, page 14, line 27, after "Parliamentary," to insert "and municipal." He said it would be recollected that on the Motion for going into Committee he proposed that this Bill should be referred to the same Committee as the Corrupt Practices Bill. He did so on the ground that the Ballot would introduce a considerable increase of personation and other corrupt practices, and that, therefore, when bringing the disease into the country they ought to provide a remedy. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government acknowledged to some extent the justice of the proposal, for he agreed to admit into this Bill two or three clauses out of the Corrupt Practices Bill. Some hon. Gentlemen did not think that enough; but he did not offer any objection. But how stood the case now? This clause, which defined personation under the Ballot, and imposed more severe penalties upon the offence, applied only to Parliamentary elections; but in the other part of the Bill it was provided that the new method of secret voting was to be adopted both at Parliamentary and municipal elections. Nobody would deny that municipal elections were as liable to personation as Parliamentary. But with regard to them the law as to personation was to remain as at present, while with respect to Parliamentary elections it was to be altered to suit the new method of voting. Under the present law the offence of personation was not held to be committed until the vote was recorded. Under this clause, however, it was provided that the offence should be held to be committed when the ballot paper was applied for. Under the present system of voting personation was checked mainly by the fact that the vote could be traced and struck off the poll. But where the vote could not be traced some further safeguard was necessary, and that was provided as regarded Parliamentary elections by the present clause. What he asked was that the same safeguard should be extended to municipal elections. They all knew that corruption of various kinds was practised at municipal elections with a view to secure the Parliamentary elections for the same side. It was evident, then, that the same stringent measures were required in both cases, and that it would be of no use at all to provide them for Parliamentary elections alone. It might be said that the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Mr. James) proposed to deal with the subject of municipal elections; but the experience of the Session was not very encouraging as to the prospect of legislation in the hands of private Members. The right hon. Gentleman had admitted that personation would become a much more serious evil, and require more stringent remedies, under the new system of secret voting. He was justified, therefore, in asking that these more stringent remedies should be provided in every kind of election to which secret voting was to be applied. He begged to move the Amendment.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the difficulty in accepting the Amendment was that the machinery of this clause was adapted only for Parliamentary elections, and the mode of trying Petitions in Parliamentary elections. The amendment of the law, not only as to personation, but as to corrupt practices at municipal elections would, he hoped, be treated separately, and if it was not dealt with this Session, it could not be delayed much longer. Meanwhile, it would be inconvenient to attempt to make clauses intended for Parliamentary elections and the Parliamentary election tribunal apply to personation at municipal elections.

DR. BALL said, there was no legal objection to the adoption of the Amendment which would make personation a criminal offence, whether committed at Parliamentary or municipal elections, leaving the offence to be punished by the ordinary tribunals of the country. As to dealing with the subject by another Bill he did not think there was any prospect of that, for there was a Bill coming from the other House in which he was interested, and he saw no chance of its being put down in that House till July 31.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would consent to the Amendment. It was acknowledged on all hands that personation at municipal elections trained people to perpetrate the same practices at Parliamentary elections. Why not put a stop to those practices at once? Let the offences of personation be made a felony, whether it was at a Parliamentary or a municipal election.

MR. CANDLISH said, he thought it would give great satisfaction on both sides of the House if the right hon. Gentleman would adopt this Amendment. There was much more personation at municipal than at Parliamentary elections, because the former elections occurred three times as frequently. In both cases the crime was precisely the same, and he hoped there was no machinery in the clause which would make it impossible to deal with it.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the Government were quite as anxious to check personation at municipal as at Parliamentary elections. He had been under the impression that, as regarded municipal elections, the offence could not be included in the clause; but as his hon. and learned Friend (the Solicitor General) did not agree in this construction, he was quite willing to adopt the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH moved the omission, at the end of Clause 26, of the words, "and shall apply to any election for a University or combination of Universities." There were, he pointed out, no such things as ballot papers in the case of University elections; and as the mode of voting in those elections was not to be changed, nothing in this clause ought to apply to such elections. When the Bill of last year came before the House, it contained provisions applying to them; but on the Motion of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Glasgow (Mr. Gordon), these provisions were omitted, with the unanimous assent of the Committee.

Amendment proposed, in page 16, line 19, to leave out from the words "and snall," to the word "Universities," in line 20, inclusive."—(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, Clause 23 had already been made applicable to municipal elections, so far as it was pertinent to them, and he saw no reason why the present clause should not be made applicable to University elections under the same conditions. Why, he should like to know, should not the punishment for personation be quite as severe in the case of University as of any other elections? What particular privilege should Universities have? Why should the offence be a felony in the City of London, and not in the University of Oxford or Cambridge? There was another part of this clause which applied as much to Universities as to other elections, and that was that the candidate who had anything to do with personation should lose his seat. He did not believe there would be a greater amount of personation under the new system than under the old; but, whether there was more or less, the offence was of equal magnitude.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, there was some difficulty with respect to the construction of the clause. The first part of the section was incompatible with the second. The legal advisers of the right hon. Gentleman would, he thought, tell him that having defined the offence of personation in the first part, the second part must be assumed to apply to the definition.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL replied that the definition in question was a mere addition to the existing law, and did not repeal it. It was not an exclusive definition, and consequently the offence of personation still remained.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, that though they were bound to abide by the authority to which they had listened, the words seemed to him to be very exclusive.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Dowse) said, that the use of the words "county or borough" showed that the clause did not apply to Universities.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. HUNT moved in First Schedule, Rule 1, at end, add—

"And in the case of a county election send one of such notices by post, under cover, to the postmaster of the principal post office of each polling place in the county or division of the county, endorsed with the words 'Notice of Election,' and the same shall be forwarded free of charge; and the postmaster receiving the same shall forthwith publish the same in the manner in which post office notices are usually published."

The right hon. Gentleman explained that the object of the Amendment was to limit the expenses of elections. At present Returning Officers, for the purpose of making known when an election would be held, sent deputies to each of the polling-places to proclaim the day. Now that the number of polling-places was likely to be greatly multiplied, that was a practice which would be productive of very considerable expense, and he therefore proposed that it should be sufficient for the Returning Officers to send copies of the notice to the postmaster, who should make it public as was usual in the case of post office matters.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. GOLDNEY moved, as an Amendment on the First Schedule, Rule 8, the insertion of words permitting a Returning Officer to appoint a deputy in the event of his requiring to leave the polling-booth. The hon. Gentleman remarked that the Returning Officer might be called away by illness, or accident, or by design, or by riot, and he therefore ought to have the power of appointing a deputy.

Amendment proposed,

In page 20, line 22, after the word "Election," to insert the words "or in the event of the absence of the returning officer, to a person specially appointed by him as his deputy, to receive such nomination papers during his absence. And no returning officer shall leave the place of Election during the time appointed for the Election, without first appointing in writing a person to act as such deputy for the purpose aforesaid."—(Mr. Goldney.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. W. E. FORSTER trusted the Amendment would not be pressed. The duties of the Returning Officer were so important that he did not wish to encourage their performance by deputy.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HUNT moved in Rule 9, at end, add—

"And, in the case of an election for a county or division of a county, deliver to the postmaster of the principal post office of the place of election a paper, signed by himself, containing the names of the candidates nominated, and stating the day on which the poll is to be taken, and the postmaster shall forward the information contained in such paper by telegraph, free of charge, to the several postal telegraph offices situate in the county or division of a county for which the Election is to forthwith at each such office in the manner in be held, and such information shall be published which post-office notices are usually published."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. RYLANDS rose to propose an Amendment with reference to the nomination of candidates. According to the Bill, if there was any defect in the nomination papers, and that defect was discovered within an hour after the expiration of the time appointed for the election, the Returning Officer might decide that the defect was fatal, and strike off the name of the candidate to whom the objection applied. Under this provision of the Bill, a gentleman who had represented a constituency for a great number of years might be struck off the list of candidates in consequence of its being discovered that one of the persons signing his nomination paper was not a registered elector. He thought there was no necessity for such a strict regulation.

Amendment proposed,

In page 21, line 11, to leave out the words "before the expiration of the time appointed for the election, or within one hour afterwards," in order to insert the words "at or immediately after the time of the delivery of the nomination paper."—(Mr. Rylands.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, it would not be possible for the objection to be taken at the moment of the delivery of the nomination paper, as some little time must be allowed for consideration.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he thought that the object of the Amendment was not understood. It would be a serious thing if through some mistake one of the persons nominating a candidate happened not to be a registered elector, and that defect should not be discovered until one hour after the delivery of the nomination paper. There would then be no time to correct the mistake, and the candidate would be struck out of the nomination paper.

MR. SYNAN said, he thought that some other mode than that proposed for amending this part of the Bill should be adopted.

MR. BOUVERIE said, that under the new arrangements there must be a scrutiny of the ten names upon the nomination paper. All the nomination papers might be open to objection, and in the end there might be no candidate, and consequently could be no election. This was one of the consequences of the abolition of the old system of nomination. The moment this system was introduced they would become involved in all these technicalities and difficulties.

MR. CANDLISH said, he did not think that the Amendment would get rid of that difficulty. He would suggest that additional time should be given to the Returning Officer to correct imperfections or informalities of this kind.

MR. HERMON wished to know what would invalidate a nomination paper? If an elector who signed the nomination paper spelled his name in two different ways, and his name were challenged, would that be sufficient to invalidate the nomination?

MR. GOLDNEY put a case which had occurred in a scrutiny under the Election Petition against the return for Oldham. An elector, whose name appeared on the register as "Jinks," gave his name to the polling clerk as "Ginks." Mr. Justice Blackburn decided that the vote was bad, and struck it off the register. After such a decision, in a similar case, the Returning Officer would be bound to reject the name, and the nomination would be defective.

VISCOUNT BURY remarked that there might be five candidates, so that the names of 50 electors would be handed to the Returning Officer as signing the nomination papers. He would have to decide whether all these papers were in proper form. Suppose the Returning Officer, who was vested with such plenary powers, did not know all these voters, or committed an error in regard to any one of them, there would be no opportunity for him to reconsider his mistake, and the nomination would fail through his default. He did not think one hour sufficient space to allow the Returning Officer for that purpose.

MR. COLLINS believed that they were making a mountain of a mole-hill. Candidates need not restrict the number of voters signing the nomination paper to eight; it might be signed by 20. If candidates could not select eight good men out of the whole constituency, there would be nobody to blame but themselves.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. HUNT observed, that under the Bill a nomination might be rendered invalid by the slightest mistake. He moved to insert the words, that "no nomination paper should be deemed to be invalid by reason of a defect of form only."

Amendment proposed,

In page 21, line 18, after the word "return," to add the words "Provided always, That no nomination paper shall be deemed to be invalid by reason of a defect in form only."—(Mr. Hunt.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he thought it was quite possible the addition of these words would enable the nomination to be conducted very differently from what was intended by the Bill. The form prescribed in the Schedule was sufficiently plain.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 183; Noes 241: Majority 58.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would briefly describe the nature of the Amendment he had put upon the Paper with regard to the hours of polling. The Committee seemed to be of opinion that there was a grievance in this respect, especially in the case of working men, and that it would be advantageous to prolong the hours of polling, if such an alteration could be made without danger to the public peace. At the same time, many hon. Members believed that it would be extremely hazardous to carry on elections in the dark, and therefore his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government promised to consider the subject with the view of introducing an Amendment on the Report. He had now to propose that the poll should close at 8 o'clock in the evening in May, June, July, and August; at 7 o'clock in March, April, September, and October; and at 5 o'clock in the other months of the year. In regard to the hour proposed for the winter months, he might mention that as it was the poll was now kept open till 5 o'clock in Ireland and in English counties. A General Election was rarely held in the depth of winter. It might, perhaps, be objected that the interests of the working classes were more considered in one part of the year than in another; but he did not think this objection was well-founded, because the Government had endeavoured to consider their interests throughout the year as much as they possibly could. Of the 19 General Elections which had been held in the present century, nine had been held in those months in which it was proposed to close the poll at 8 o'clock; six in those periods of the year when the poll would be closed at 7; and only four in the winter months. Again, in the last century six General Elections, were held in May, June, July, or August; 12 in March, April, September, or October; and only two in the winter months. It was also worthy of remark that of the six elections which had occurred in the winter since the commencement of the 18th century, two were owing to the demise of the Sovereign—Queen Anne and George III. The last General Election was, as everyone must remember, held in the winter under very exceptional circumstances. It would be necessary, he thought, to add the following words to the Amendment—"Except in the county of Orkney and Shetland, where the poll shall continue for two consecutive days," as in those islands a poll of less than two days would be most inconvenient.

Amendment proposed,

In page 21, line 25, after the word "Election," to insert the words "The poll at a Parliamentary Election shall continue for one day only, except in the county of Orkney and Shetland, where the poll shall continue two consecutive days, and shall commence at eight o'clock in the morning, and shall be kept open until the hour hereinafter mentioned, and no longer, that is to say:

- (a.) If the poll is held during the months of May, June, July, or August, until eight o'clock in the afternoon;
 - (b.) If the poll is held during the months of March, April, September, or October, until seven o'clock in the afternoon; and
 - (c.) If the poll is held during the months of November, December, January, or February, until five o'clock in the afternoon."
- (Mr. William Edward Forster.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he should propose an Amendment to the effect that at all times of the year the poll should close at 5 o'clock. It was almost essential that the time of polling should be absolutely certain, as otherwise the more ignorant voters would never know at what hour the poll was actually to close. [Murmurs.] He did not think this was by any means a fanciful objection. The Government were professedly extending the hours of polling for the purpose of giving facilities to the working men, but they would say—"If you choose to have an election in the winter time for purposes of your own, you are practically depriving us of our votes." If the right hon. Gentleman's proposal were adopted, the turmoil of the election would extend over two days in counties and large boroughs, because it would be absolutely impossible to get the votes counted the same night if the poll were kept open until 7 or 8 o'clock, and in many cases the ballot boxes could not be sent to the central office until the next day. The inconvenience of keeping open the poll till a late hour was remarkably illustrated by the elections for members of the London School Board, when the experiment was tried of keeping the poll open till 8 p.m. A Gentleman, whose words he would quote, said he much doubted whether this was really of any advantage to the working men, because a large number of them put off voting till the last hour, and the result was, that in several places they found it difficult to record their votes at all. The same Gentleman expressed his belief that it was not desirable to hold out an inducement to voters to poll late. The Gentleman from whom he was quoting went on to say that prolongation of time was of no use, and he did not see how, if it was to be prolonged at all, they could stop short of 9 or 10 o'clock. These were the words of the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the present Bill. The right hon. Gentleman, in his speech in support of his present proposal, made two great omissions. He had not answered any of the arguments which he used in 1870, in answer to the proposal of the hon. Member for Chelsea (Sir Henry Hoare) to keep open the polls to 8 o'clock, nor had he explained the nature of the circumstances which had induced him to change the opinions he held at the time of the first school board elections in the metropolis. He thought great practical inconvenience would arise from adopting the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman, and being of opinion that 5 o'clock all the year round would meet with general approval throughout the country, he moved, as an Amendment to the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman, that all polls throughout the kingdom should cease at 5 o'clock in the afternoon.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment,

To leave out from the first word "until," to the end of the said proposed Amendment, in order to insert the words "five o'clock in the afternoon,"—(Mr. Cross.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words 'the hour hereinafter mentioned' stand part of the said proposed Amendment."

MR. MUNTZ said, he could not agree with either the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman or the Amendment which had been proposed. From time immemorial the practice had been to close polls in boroughs at 4 o'clock, and in counties at 5, and he could see no reason to alter that system, unless an alteration was proposed the effect of which would be to give greater voting facilities to the large number of working men who had been recently enfranchised. To keep open the polls till 5 or 6 o'clock would give no such facilities, and in point of fact he believed that the whole thing was nonsense. From his experience of elections, he did not remember a case where the voters were not nearly polled out by half-past 3 o'clock in boroughs. He could not conceive that an extension to 5 or 6 o'clock would be of the slightest advantage to working men voters if they were at work; but, as a matter of fact, working men generally never worked on the afternoon of a contested election; and if the time were extended a number of persons would, without the slightest real necessity, put off voting until the last moment just as they did at the present time. At any rate it was desirable that the excitement of an election should not continue into the hours of darkness, when no one knew what might result, and with that in view, he suggested that while in June, July and August the poll might be kept open until 8 o'clock, it should be closed at 4 in the other months of the year. That experiment might be tried to see if it would be for the benefit of the working men who had votes.

CAPTAIN GROSVENOR said, one strong objection to the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman was, that it would throw a difficulty in the way of a dissolution of Parliament at any time of the year when the sun set earlier than 8 o'clock. To adopt the system of the right hon. Gentleman would lay all future Ministries open to the charge of forcing on a dissolution at one period of the year, rather than at another, from party considerations. He could imagine no position more disastrous to the general course of legislation than one in which a Minister who enjoyed the confidence of a majority in that House might run the risk of being taunted that his majority did not represent the true feeling of the country, because the Parliament was elected at a period of the year when a large and important body of the electors were hampered by vexatious restrictions upon the exercise of their franchise. He agreed with the hon. Member for Birmingham

(Mr. Muntz) in deprecating any proposition which would carry on the polling far into the obscurity of night; but, at the same time, he thought that with an extended franchise increased voting facilities ought to be given, and he would, if in Order, move as an Amendment to the proposal of the hon. Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. Cross), that the polls should be opened at 6 o'clock instead of 8 o'clock in the morning. Whether his Amendment was accepted or not, he should, at any rate, have had the satisfaction of protesting against a proposal which would create evils far worse than those it was proposed to remedy.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, he hoped the hon. Gentleman would adhere to his proposal, as there would be great dissatisfaction among the working men if the promise—implied at least—which was given to them on this subject was not kept. The Amendment of the hon. Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. Cross) that 5 o'clock should be the hour would be of no use, for it made very little difference to the working man whether the poll closed at 5 o'clock or at 4. He had heard with some surprise one Member for Westminster (Captain Grosvenor) soliciting the Government not to extend the hours for the working men; but he should be still more surprised if the other Member for Westminster who sat on the opposite side would take the same view. An objection to the extension of the hours of polling had been taken on the ground that there would be danger from voting in the dark. But, living in London, and frequenting this and other houses in the evening, he was very little conscious whether it was day or night. Gentlemen walked out of this House at night and found it nearly as light as in the day. To say, therefore, that there would be difficulty in carrying on an election by gas seemed to him not a very forcible objection.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, he had listened with great pleasure to the suggestion that 6 o'clock in the morning should be the time for opening the poll. It struck him—though in this, perhaps, many would not concur with him—that 5 o'clock in the morning would be better still. If the men went to work at 6, and the poll were opened at 5, they could record their votes before going to their duties, without any interference by their employers. He thought this would do better than keeping the poll open late in the evening.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH said, that if the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council was accepted the poll would be open on the 31st of August until an hour and a-half after sunset; on the 11th of December until an hour and a-quarter after sunset; and on the 31st of October until two hours and a-half.

MR. JAMES said, the best course to take would be to reject all the Amendments, and leave the matter as it was. The objections to the change proposed by his right hon. Friend were many and great, and its recommendations slight. A small number of working men in the metropolis who were employed out of the districts in which they lived were said to desire this change. But these men formed but a small portion of the community, and if they desired to take a holiday to go to the Crystal Palace or for any other purpose their employers generally granted it, and at elections often paid them too, in order that they might have an opportunity of voting without incurring loss. It would be almost impossible to carry on elections under the new system if the Amendment of his right hon. Friend was adopted. They were about to increase the number of polling-places, and that would make it necessary that the number of agents and presiding officers should be increased also. But where would they get competent men to perform the duties if they were asked to remain in a booth from 8 o'clock in the morning until 8 o'clock at night? In addition to that, they would never get a statement of the poll on the same evening, and that would necessitate the watching of the ballot boxes, and a dealing with them would be suspected if it did not actually occur. These were only some of the many objections to the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman. As for the Amendment of the hon. Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. Cross), that would confer no advantage whatever on working men. He hoped, therefore, the House would leave the hours as they were.

MR. HENLEY said, that if the polling time were fixed for 12 hours some adjournment must take place, as it was quite impossible to expect during that period from the Returning Officer, who alone was held responsible for the duty, so long a continuance of the service. Any person who had experience of sitting 12 hours at a stretch knew the difficulty of keeping attention awake for so long a period. The proposed change would extend the time of polling to a very convenient time for letting money run. It would be continued to a time when brandy and water would be flowing freely, and things would be done in the last two hours that all would wish should not be done. He would gladly support any Motion to shorten rather than lengthen the hours of polling.

MR. SAMUDA said, that his experience was that to lengthen the hours of polling would not benefit the working classes. The general practice of working men who took an interest in an election was to poll early. No employer would think of preventing this, and if he attempted to do so he would fail. Under the present system elections were virtually over by 2 o'clock in the day. He hoped the hon. Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. Cross) would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he would withdraw his Amendment, and take the division on the original Amendment.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he had, with a view to come to a sound conclusion on the matter, furnished himself with tables of the time of sunset in various parts of the country upon the first and the middle of each month, and, without troubling the House with the particulars, he believed that if the House accepted the Amendment there would be few, if any, more elections in the dark than there were now. The feeling of the House, however, seemed to be against the Amendment, and much divided on the question as to whether there should be any change at all. The proposal was quite outside the Bill, and he could not deny that the balance of opinion was in favour of allowing things to remain as they were. He therefore proposed to withdraw the Motion.

On Question, "That the Motion be withdrawn,"

MR. DIXON said, he had listened with great regret to what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman. He wished to remind him that on a previous occasion the House had expressed its opinion in a very unmistakeable manner on this question, and his right hon. Friend stated distinctly at that time that he would submit this Amendment to meet the feeling of the House, and now when they came prepared to accept the Amendment as a compromise, and when hon. Members refrained from taking up the time of the House in order that the measure might be passed that night, they were to be told that their silence was to be interpreted into a change of that opinion. Now, he ventured to say that there was not a Member of the House who had changed his opinion on the subject. Under these circumstances he should feel it his duty to divide the House on the question.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING approved the course adopted by the right hon. Gentleman, and remarked that this was not the first time he had been led into error by listening too readily to a small section of the House. The present hours had always worked well in Ireland. After an election experience of 30 years, he could state that he had never known a man lose his vote for want of time to go to the poll.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN asked whether there was a single Member who could give a single instance of a voter having lost the chance of polling through the early hour at which the poll closed?

MR. GLADSTONE said, the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) had expressed what was very well known, that he entertained a very strong feeling on the subject, and earnestly desired to lengthen the hours of polling from motives which did him honour. But the House was not so decided on the subject. At first there seemed to be considerable desire for the change; then there seemed to be no unity of opinion on the question, and now the balance of opinion seemed to be clearly against a change. Under these circumstances, as the hon. Member for Birmingham would not allow the Motion to be withdrawn, the manly course for the Government, having abandoned the Amendment, would be to vote against it.

Amendment to the said proposed Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The House divided:—Ayes 48; Noes 350: Majority 302.

Amendment proposed, in page 22, line 15, after the word "station," to insert the words "together with a clerk to assist him in taking the poll."—(Mr. Rylands.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. W. E. FORSTER objected to the Amendment on the ground that although undoubtedly in a large majority of cases a clerk would be required to assist the presiding officer, still in many cases the attendance of such a person would be useless.

MR. COLLINS reminded the House that the presence of a polling clerk would be no security for an accurate return, as was evidenced by the presence of the hon. Member himself among them.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. W. E. FORSTER moved in Schedule 1, Rule 26, page 23, line 14, after "Act," to insert "or of any voter who produces such a declaration and certificate as hereinafter mentioned that he is unable to read." The voter who was unable to read would be able to go before a magistrate, and on convincing him that he was unable to read he would be furnished with a certificate to that effect. He was still of opinion that a voter who was unable to read would have been able to record his vote by means of the ballot papers; but, accepting the decision of the House, he had proposed this Amendment in the belief that no hon. Member would object to this extra precaution against fraud being taken.

Amendment proposed,

In page 23, line 14, after the word "Act," to insert the words "or of any voter who produces such a declaration and certificate as hereinafter mentioned that he is unable to read."—(Mr. William Edward Forster.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR RAINALD KNIGHTLEY said, he thought the Amendment, if carried, would have the effect of disfranchising a large number of respectable voters in counties who would have to go four or five miles in order to find a magistrate, who, in all probability would be out when they reached his house, if he did not purposely absent himself. When they had obtained the certificate in question they would have to take it to the presiding officer, who, after all, would be just as good a judge whether they could read or write as the magistrate himself. Had the Ballot Bill been a real instead of a sham measure there might have been some ground for taking the precautions proposed by this Amendment; but when the majority of the House had passed a clause permitting the voters to flourish their marked voting papers in the face, not only of the presiding officer but of the election agents, it was preposterous to pretend to insure secrecy. Believing, therefore, that the Amendment as it stood would be utterly useless, he begged to move to amend the Amendment by substituting the word "declares" for the words "produces such a declaration and certificate as hereinafter mentioned."

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment,

To leave out the words "produces such a declaration and certificate as hereinafter mentioned," in order to insert the word "declares,"—(Sir Rainald Knightley.)
—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words 'or of any voter who produces such a declaration' stand part of the said proposed Amendment."

MR. VERNON HARCOURT was of opinion that the Amendments placed the House in a very great difficulty with respect to the whole scheme of the Bill. The man who wished to vote secretly ought to be allowed to do so, but this Amendment would not enable the illiterate man to vote secretly. The first thing he would be called upon to do would be to go into a magistrate's room, and that, he imagined, was the very last thing that the illiterate voter would desire to do; and in the interests of those who desired to be protected from intimidation that was the very last thing they ought to be called upon to do. He might divide the illiterate electors into two classes. There was the honest and independent man who, owing to the misfortune of his education, had not learned to read or write—the man who in a tone which was familiar to many hon. Gentlemen said—"I am no scholar," but who was as well fitted to exercise the franchise as any member of the University. That was a class of man whose self-respect would prevent him from going before a magistrate and ticketing himself as a dunce. He would not go and ask a magistrate to give him a ticket-of-leave to exercise his right, and that was the class of man who would be disfranchised if the provisions under discussion were agreed to. There was, however, another and entirely different class of illiterate voters who would not object to take oath or make the prescribed declaration before a magistrate. He would go before the magistrate. And why? Because it would be made worth his while to go. That class of man would be the pot of ointment round which the insects of corruption would swarm and buzz, and there might be a sufficient number of such men to turn an election. Now, looking at those two different descriptions of electors, the proposal before the House was, in his opinion, a most objectionable one. How had it come about? It was originally no part of the Government scheme. On a former night his right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council came down like Pharaoh to the banks of the Shannon, and picked up a Moses among the bulrushes of Limerick who disposed of the question. He could not on that occasion vote against the Amendment, because he was told that the illiterate voter would be disfranchised altogether, and he could not vote for it because he was told that he would be putting votes into the hands of the Returning Officer. He, therefore, took the only course which was open to him, and did not vote on it at all. But his right hon. Friend the moment the proposal was made accepted it, and then the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli), with that adroitness for which he was remarkable, seeing the Vice President of the Council had walked into the trap, got up and immediately shut down the lid. Whereupon the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Mr. James), who was the Archimandrite of secrecy, showed, more in sorrow than in anger, the consternation with which he was filled at the position in which he found himself placed. The voter, he might add, was, according to the provision under discussion, not only to be called upon to go before the magistrate, but he was to be examined. Exemptions had been introduced to meet the religious feelings of the Jews, then exemptions with regard to physical disabilities, and now much larger exemptions were proposed to be made in reference to educational incapacity. Then would come the difficulties in the case of persons who desired to show their votes, and the difficulty with regard to the marks which were to be made, which would, he thought, be found to be a matter of very great difficulty indeed, because if a man were to be allowed to make any mark he liked, how could he be prevented, he should like to know, from making such a mark as would identify his vote? The difficulties, indeed, which beset the subject were greater than had been supposed, and those on the Liberal benches must take their share of blame for not having discussed it more fully last Session. If the Ballot by ball voting instead of by printed papers were adopted the difficulties would in a considerable degree be obviated. He did not think anybody in the House—and especially Her Majesty's Government, who had accepted Amendments from all quarters on the subject—could deny for a moment that a great deal of light had been thrown out by these discussions—that by the conflict of antagonistic minds upon this subject a spark of truth had been elicited. He would vote against the proposition of the Government, because he believed a respectable illiterate voter would rather not vote at all than go through the ordeal that was proposed.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, if by chance his hon. and learned Friend had to undertake the charge of a Ballot Bill he would meet with as many difficulties as those which he had started, and a great deal more. The Government had thought it worth while to encounter the difficulties connected with the Ballot in order to secure the advantage of secret voting. It was undoubtedly easier to say you would have a Ballot Bill than to prepare the details for carrying out the Ballot. The Amendment of the hon. Baronet (Sir Rainald Knightley) would make the Bill a purely permissive Ballot Bill. It would appear from what his hon. and learned Friend had said about the two different classes of voters who would be affected by this clause that he had not done him (Mr. W. E. Forster) the honour of attending to what he had said on this subject. His hon. and learned Friend said there was a class of illiterate voters who desired to perform their duty—and no doubt there was a great many such—but who disliked going before a magistrate. He (Mr. W. E. Forster) believed they would not go before a magistrate, and that they would have the common sense to vote with the voting paper. But there was another class who might make a mark and who might be bribed or intimidated. His hon. and learned Friend said no means had been taken to put a check upon those men. But the fact was that the Government had introduced a provision requiring those men to appear before a magistrate to be examined.

MR. HUNT said, he believed all the difficulty on this point would have been avoided had the Government accepted the proposal to use colours in the voting papers. The proposition before the House would place a difficulty in the way of the illiterate voter. A voter who could read would have no reason for telling the Returning Officer that he could not read and asking the Officer to mark his paper for him.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, that Gentlemen on the Conservative side of the House who had talked so much of protection for the illiterate voter talked as if a free-born Englishman was an idiot. Every Englishman who could not read or write could at least count enough to secure protection under this Bill with respect to his voting at an election.

MR. LEATHAM said, he voted in favour of secrecy the other night because he believed the Returning Officer would not divulge the mark of a voter.

MR. DENISON considered that this Amendment would deprive illiterate voters of the advantage of the concession made the other evening. A declaration to the Returning Officer would be sufficient.

MR. SYNAN congratulated the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Harcourt) upon having had another opportunity of speaking against the Ballot Bill. He hoped on this occasion, however, the hon. and learned Gentleman would not, as he did on the last, act on the principle that—

“He who fights and runs away
Will live to fight another day.”

But that, instead of going out of the House, he would record his vote. This Amendment was intended for the class who bond fide were not able to read, though they might be able to count. In a portion of the country unless the Bill were carried with this Amendment, one-third of the electors would be disfranchised.

MR. ELLICE wanted to know why the illiterate elector was to be dealt with less favourably than persons of the Jewish persuasion. Persons of that persuasion were extremely numerous in this country, and in the City of London the election depended very much upon their suffrages. There was nothing in the clause relating to them which required that they should go before a magistrate, and why, then, should illiterate persons be required to do so? All who were either physically or morally unable to fill up their papers ought to be treated on the same footing, and his impression was that in practice it would be found that no fraud would be perpetrated.

MR. W. E. FORSTER explained that when he assented to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan), what he really intended was that the declaration should be made before a magistrate.

MR. W. H. SMITH, as the representative of a large constituency, expressed his conviction that when ballot papers were to be filled up by the electors the result would be a large disfranchisement. A great number of persons at present abstained from going to the poll, and the result of the Amendment would be that a still larger portion would be deterred from recording their votes. He should, therefore, earnestly protest against any difficulties being thrown in the way of a voter obtaining the aid which under the clause as it stood he would be able to receive.

MR. CRAUFURD said, as it was impossible at that hour to discuss all the suggestions that had been made, he begged to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Debate be now adjourned.”
—(Mr. Craufurd.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he hoped the House would be able to go to a division without adjourning.

MR. DISRAELI said, that they had arrived at a period of the Report when it appeared to him that the House should not hesitate to conclude the business of the evening.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 183; Noes 168: Majority 15.

MR. COLLINS moved the adjournment of the debate.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he had hoped to finish the Bill that night; but it was useless, of course, to proceed if the hon. Gentleman determined to press his Motion at that hour of the evening.

Further Consideration of Bill, as amended, deferred till Monday next.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON. TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA). THE INDIRECT CLAIMS. THE MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, in reference to a promise I made the other evening—namely, that either on Monday next or before that day I would make a statement as to the progress of the negotiations with respect to the Alabama Claims, or present the Papers on that subject—I have now to state to the House that I am afraid we shall not be able to lay those Papers on the Table this evening, so as to have them distributed by Monday morning—that, I am afraid, will be impossible; but I shall adhere to my promise of making a statement on Monday evening, whether with or without the Papers.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: What arrangements will be made as to the Adjournment of the House? Is the question of adjourning on Monday still an open one, as was understood?

EARL GRANVILLE: I am not certain how that stands. I gave an assurance that I would do anything the House might desire and think necessary in order to give your Lordships an opportunity for discussing the statement I had made; but I see by the Minutes that Earl Russell has given Notice that he will move that the House adjourn to the 24th instead of the 31st.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: My impression was that the question of adjournment was to be left open till after a statement to be made by the noble Earl (Earl Granville) on Monday. If that statement should be considered unsatisfactory, then I think we were to have an opportunity of discussing the question between Monday and Friday. I think that was the understanding we arrived at.

EARL GRANVILLE: I am not sure that was exactly the understanding; but my desire was, and is, to do whatever the House might consider most convenient. I think that if a discussion should be thought necessary after my statement it would be more convenient for the House, and more convenient for the public interest, that such discussion should be taken immediately. I do not see what is to be gained by our assembling again on the 24th rather than on the 31st.

BILL—(No. 78.)

(The Earl of Kimberley.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Preliminary.

Clause 1 (Short title of Act) agreed to.

Clause 2 (Extent of Act) agreed to.

Clause 3 (Commencement of Act) postponed.

Illicit Sales.

Clause 4 (Prohibition of sale of intoxicating liquors without license).

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, that as the clause must be taken in connection with Clause 29, he thought it might be convenient if he now stated the nature of an Amendment which he meant to propose on the latter clause, but which had reference to all those clauses of the Bill which dealt with penalties and forfeitures. By Clause 29 it would be enacted that on the third conviction for an offence which was to be recorded on the license, the license of the licensed person should be forfeited, and he should be disqualified for a term of five years from holding any license, and the premises in respect of which the license was granted should be disqualified from receiving any license for two years. The penalty, therefore, would operate both on the owner and the tenant of the house, although the owner might not even have known of what was going on, so as to have the opportunity of getting rid of a tenant who was injuring his property. Now, on a former occasion he had drawn their Lordships' attention to the hardship on the owner of a licensed house thus having his property taken from him, without giving him the opportunity of remedying the mischief—for to disqualify the owner from obtaining a license for his premises for two years was virtually to close his house. Now, he wished the owner to have an opportunity of knowing whether or not the tenant conducted the house in a proper manner. Moreover, he thought that to forfeit a license for three convictions, without reference to the particular circumstances or the penalty in each case, was too stringent a measure. What he should propose by his Amendments in Clause 29 was this—that whenever the amount of penalties imposed by the convictions under the provisions of the Bill should amount to the sum of £30 within a period of five years, the license should thereupon become ipso facto void; and that whenever the penalties imposed upon any holder of a license should amount to £15 in a period of three years, the holder of the license should be disqualified for a period of three years. This proposition was very similar to one contained in the Bill introduced by the Government last year, and a system of cumulative penalties had been advocated by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary. In order to pave the way for the Amendments on Clause 29, he should now move a verbal alteration in the present clause.

("In addition to any other penalty imposed by this Section, any person convicted of an offence under this Section shall, if he be the owner of the license, forfeit such license.")—(The Duke of Richmond.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he concurred with the noble Duke in thinking this was the most convenient time for raising the discussion on the question whether the plan of forfeiting the license on three convictions should be adopted. He knew that objection was taken to the system of accumulating penalties according to the convictions recorded on the license, on the ground that it would be too severe in its operation. He would admit that by the Bill in its present form that punishment was provided in cases where, perhaps, it was not required, and therefore he would himself propose to lessen the number of cases in which that record was enacted. The first case in which a record of the conviction was provided was that of selling any intoxicating liquor without being duly authorized by the license to sell the same, or selling such liquor in any unauthorized place—that was to say, the sale of liquor to be drunk on the premises, when the license was only for the sale of liquor not to be drunk on the premises. The second was the analogous case of evasion of the law as to drinking on the premises by the carrying of any intoxicating liquor from the licensed premises to other premises, there to be consumed, the license being only for selling drink not to be drunk on the premises. The third case in which by the Bill it was proposed that there should be a record of the conviction was that of Clause 9, which provided that the sale of intoxicating liquor by retail should, with certain exceptions, be according to standard measure. Now, although this was undoubtedly an offence which ought to be liable to conviction and punishment, he thought it need not be recorded on the license, as it was not of a sufficiently serious character as to require such a record, and he would propose to amend the Bill accordingly. The next offence for which a record of the conviction was provided was that of the illicit storing of liquor. This was a serious offence, and he thought the punishment should remain as it stood in the Bill. The next offence for which there was to be a record of conviction was that described in Clause 12, which provided for the publication of the names of the licensed persons on the premises in respect of which the license was granted. He did not think so severe a punishment was required in this case, and he proposed to strike it out. In the cases of Clauses 15 and 17, the first of which applied to harbouring prostitutes, and the second to the harbouring of constables, the Bill provided for the record of convictions; that in the former case the conviction should be recorded, but in the latter case such a punishment might be dispensed with, and he proposed to amend the Bill accordingly. With respect to the owner of the premises disqualified, he would propose an Amendment that the disqualification of the owners should be left optional with magistrates; but there would be no option in respect of the occupier who held the license. The plan which the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) proposed was, that when the penalties amounted to a certain sum the license should be forfeited. He could not think that this would be so satisfactory as the plan in the Bill. There might be a great number of convictions before the penalties amounted to £50, because in the imposition of penalties the magistrate might have regard to the costs, and make the fines themselves very small. Moreover, there was much difficulty of obtaining convictions, even in cases where there could be no doubt that offences had been committed. It had been alleged that the system proposed by the Bill was a sort of Draconian code; but this was not so, because many of the punishments which it prescribed were in substitution of, and not in addition to, the existing penalties for breaches of the liquor laws.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that some of the admissions made by the noble Earl (the Earl of Kimberley), coupled with the Amendments which he proposed, had diminished the objections to the plan of punishment provided by the Bill; but still he thought the plan of his noble Friend (the Duke of Richmond) was much sounder, and much more in accordance with the principles of our jurisprudence. The noble Earl proposed a forfeiture of the license for three offences of particular kinds, without reference to the particular circumstances of each case—without regard to the fact whether the offences were more or less mitigated by the circumstances. According to the Bill, therefore, whenever the magistrate thought it his duty to convict, though the offence itself might be perhaps venial, the offender would lose his license. Now, he thought a gradation of offences was a much preferable plan, because where there was an accumulated amount of penalties it showed that the person was a persistent offender. Under Clause 6, if from premises only licensed to sell liquor to be drunk off the premises a person conveyed away drink and drank it round the next street the publican must give proof that he did not know of this, or the offence would be recorded on his license. Again, under Clause 14, if the publican permitted a person to get drunk on his premises—an accident that might happen to any worthy citizen—he incurred the same severe punishment, and three records of convictions would deprive him of his license.

EARL GREY regretted that his noble Friend (the Earl of Kimberley) intended to favour the owners more than the occupiers by allowing the magistrates an option in the case of the former. He thought that to make the law effective it was necessary that the owners should be dealt with as stringently as the occupiers.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK said, that all independent observers were of opinion that it was essential to restrict the liquor traffic. There were two modes of diminishing the number of public-houses—one by regulating the number according to the population, the other by suppressing those which were conducted in an improper manner. He regretted that in this Bill, which was an honest attempt to remedy a crying evil, the noble Earl did not propose to effect a diminution by the former as well as by the latter plan. He believed the penalties proposed in the Bill were not too severe, and if the House retained them, those who entertained the hope of mitigating the evils which now prevailed would have some prospect of the realization of their wishes; but if the Amendment suggested by the noble Duke were adopted, those who hoped for successful legislation on the subject would cease to take an interest in the present Bill. It was very right that the brewers and publicans should have their advocates when a measure of this kind was under discussion; he should be sorry if it were otherwise; but as these two classes of traders enjoyed from the State the advantages of a monopoly, he thought it was not unreasonable that they should be dealt with more strictly than other classes of the community. The Government who granted the privilege were entitled to exercise a strict supervision; and offences should be uniformly visited by sufficient penalties—penalties not too severe, but sufficient to punish the offence or to prevent the repetition.

LORD CAIRNS said, he should support the Amendment of his noble Friend. He objected to so severe a punishment as the forfeiture of the license for a single offence. The clause, in addition to very severe penalties for selling a description of liquor not named in the license, enacted the absolute forfeiture of the license; and it enacted the same punishment for selling intoxicating liquors in a place not authorized by the license. To suppose a case—which was not only possible but extremely probable—the potman of a public-house going round with beer, might sell some on the other side of the street, which would be an offence under this clause; but was it such as should entail upon the publican the forfeiture of his license? With regard to what had fallen from the most rev. Prelate, he was quite aware that if the Amendment of his noble Friend were adopted, there was a large class of persons outside their Lordships' House who would cease to look with any interest on the Bill; but these were persons who would be dissatisfied with any measure which did not curtail the number of public-houses in proportion to the population. The difference between his noble Friend and the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Kimberley) was simply one of degree; but it was another question whether the punishments proposed to be inflicted were not too severe. He (Lord Cairns) was as anxious as any Member of the Episcopal Bench to put down drunkenness; but he did not think it would be justifiable to diminish the number of public-houses by increasing the severity of the penalties.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK said, that what he had advocated was to diminish the number of offences by the certainty of punishment.

LORD CAIRNS said, that the certainty of punishment and the severity of punishment came to much the same thing. Penalties were for one purpose, and for one purpose only—namely, to regulate the conduct and behaviour of those carrying on business in licensed houses; they were not for the purpose of diminishing the number of these houses. If they were to be diminished let it be done fairly and openly; at all events, let the question be argued; but do not let them bring the criminal law into discredit and disgrace by enforcing it for objects which it was never intended to subserve.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY admitted the severity of punishment involved in the forfeiture of the license; but it would be for their Lordships to consider dispassionately whether it were too severe. He would remind their Lordships under the existing law the holder of any license who sold intoxicating liquor other than that for which he was licensed forfeited his license. This was the penalty properly inflicted on him, in addition to that which was inflicted on a person committing the same offence who did not hold any license at all.

LORD PORTMAN said, that in addition to other objections to the clause, he must point out that it contained a further most dangerous provision, giving power to any person without any warrant to apprehend any person found selling or exposing for sale any intoxicating liquors in contravention of the clause, and to detain him until he could hand him over to a constable. He could not be a party to giving such an arbitrary power to anyone. As the Member who had moved to reject the Beer Bill of 1830 in the House of Commons, he was sorry to say that he had lived long enough to see all the evils he had predicted from its operation realized, and none of the predicted benefits realized.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND thought the most rev. Prelate (the Archbishop of York) had reflected unjustly on the course he was adopting; but he repudiated the notion that he was speaking in the interests of the brewers or the publicans. He spoke in the interests of the whole community. He, in common with, he believed, all their Lordships, was desirous of diminishing the evils arising from immoderate indulgence in spirituous liquors, but he did not think that the system proposed by the Bill was the best calculated to attain that object. The very severity of the penalties proposed was calculated to produce the uncertainty of punishment, which was one of the evils most diligently to be avoided in legislation. In offences of this nature it was obviously necessary to distinguish between the license holder and the owner of the premises. Taking the view he did, and holding that they must review the whole system of deprivation of license, which he proposed to effect by cumulative penalties, as distinct from convictions, he felt it necessary to divide on the Motion to strike out the three lines from the clause.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK said, he had not said that the noble Duke spoke as the advocate of the publicans.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY wished to recall their Lordships' attention to the point on which they were about to divide. The question was, whether a man should forfeit the license he held for the offence of selling liquors he was not licensed to sell.

LORD CAIRNS said, that if in this respect the Bill did no more than re-enact the present law he should not think of opposing the clause; but if the Bill proposed a new law for which their Lordships were to be answerable, they ought to be made aware of the fact so that they might address their minds to the consideration of the question whether the penalties were or were not too severe. He wished to put the case of a licenseholder selling a pot of beer to a man on the other side of the street opposite to the place for which he was licensed. For such an offence, which might be an abuse of license, the prescribed penalties were too severe; but if this were the law at present, their Lordships would incur no responsibility by re-enacting it. If it were not the law he asked their Lordships to consider the proposal carefully.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, with reference to the question raised by the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Cairns), he might say that, under the present Excise laws, if a man sold anything he was not licensed to sell, he was for ever disqualified for holding a spirit license. He did not at all mean to suggest that the Bill did not propose an alteration of the present law; for although something analogous existed in the Excise law, it was not police law, which this Bill proposed to make it. Therefore, it would be misleading their Lordships if he were to say that this Bill merely re-enacted the existing law.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 5 (Occupier of unlicensed premises liable for sale of liquor) agreed to.

Clause 6 (Seller liable for drinking on premises contrary to license).

LORD PORTMAN said, the clause ran thus—

"If any purchaser of any intoxicating liquor from a person who is not licensed to sell the same to be drunk on the premises drinks such liquor on the premises where the same is sold or on any highway adjoining or near such premises, the seller of such liquor shall, unless he proves that such drinking was without his privity or consent," be subject to certain penalties, and the conviction was to be recorded on the license. He entirely agreed to the first part of the clause, so far as regarded drinking on the premises; but he could not agree to the second portion as to "drinking on any highway adjoining or near the premises." He could not believe their Lordships would allow these words to stand, for they would have the effect of exposing a publican to those severe penalties if any person who had fetched half-a-pint of beer from the premises was to drink any portion of it on the high road on his way home. Moreover, if the publican wished to evade the law, all he would have to do would be to tell his customers that they must not drink the liquor outside the house, but that they must find some convenient premises next door, or over the hedge, where they might consume it safely. This provision was introduced in the Act of 1870, but it had been found impracticable, and the magistrates in the part of the country where he lived had totally disregarded it. He would move to reject that part of the clause, unless the proof of consent should be thrown on the complainant.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that the words were introduced to meet the difficulty occasioned by publicans who, being only licensed to sell beer to be drunk on the premises, managed to evade the law by placing a bench outside their houses, on which their customers drank liquor. It was extremely difficult to prevent abuses without some hard cases arising, which seemed to show that the proposal was one which could not be maintained. It might be that the words proposed to be omitted went further than the House would sanction; but they did strike at a real abuse, because it was exceedingly easy for a person not having a license to sell beer to be drunk on the premises to evade the restriction imposed by his license by allowing parties to drink the beer on benches at a little distance from the house, or along the highway. He thought that if the words as they stood seemed to be somewhat harsh, the magistrates might be trusted to carry out the enactment with discretion and mildness—unless, indeed, they resembled those justices to whom the noble Lord had referred as having come to the resolution to disregard the law of the land.

LORD KESTIVEN thought the penalties imposed by the clause were much too heavy, and that part of its enactments would be found to work with great hardship.

LORD CHELMSFORD proposed to alter the clause so as to require that the drinking on any highway adjoining or near such premises had been “with the privity and consent of the seller.” His object was to make it necessary, before a conviction could be obtained, to prove the privity and consent of the landlord, because it was obviously impossible that the seller could prove the negative fact that he did not know of such drinking. He proposed to insert the words—“If it shall appear that such drinking was with his privity or consent.”

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY was ready to accept the Amendment proposed by the noble and learned Lord.

EARL BEAUCHAMP put the case of the holder of an excise license, and the occupier of a beershop licensed to sell beer not to be drunk on the premises. If the person purchasing beer drank it on the highway adjoining or near the premises, the seller would be liable to the severe penalties imposed by this clause; whereas the purchaser of a bottle of gin at the shop licensed by the Excise across the road might carouse on the highway without the seller incurring any penalty whatever. So stringent a provision was, he thought, contrary to justice.

Amendment agreed to.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND moved to leave out the last line of the clause—namely—

“Any conviction for an offence under this section shall be recorded on the license of the person convicted,”

in order to clear the ground for the series of cumulative penalties which he had given Notice to propose in Clause 29.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he hoped the Committee would understand that they were now going to divide upon, and to decide upon, the scheme of penalties proposed respectively by the Government and by the noble Duke opposite. It would of course be quite open to any noble Lord to object to any one of the penalties moved by the Government, on the ground of its being either too low or too high; but the present Amendment affected the whole scheme of the Bill in respect of the conditions on which licenses should henceforth be forfeitable.

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH said, he understood the point to be decided was, whether on the one hand they would adopt a system of self-acting penalties, or, on the other hand, give a certain amount of discretion to the magistrates with regard to imposing the penalties, which, on a certain amount of repetition, would have the same result as the self-acting penalties—the magistrates would consequently have a certain amount of discretion in deciding whether the license should be forfeited or not. Now, in connection with this point there was a fact that should not be lost sight of. In the Beer Act of 1830 the power was given to the magistrates of sending to the Excise Commissioners records of the convictions under that Act, and the Excise Commissioners on receipt of such records were to refuse the renewal of the licenses of the offending parties. But it appeared in evidence before the House of Commons Committee in 1854—24 years afterwards—that in no instance had any record of a conviction been sent to the Excise Commissioners. It did, therefore, seem to him that while no one would dream of questioning the purity of the magistrates in respect to the convictions which they pronounced, yet there might be some question whether they would not allow their good nature to influence them too much as to the amount of the penalties they imposed.

Resolved in the Affirmative.

On Question? Clause agreed to.

Clause 7 (Evasion of law as to drinking on premises contrary to license) amended, and agreed to.

Clause 8 (Sale of spirits to children).

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, the clause proposed that any license holder who sold any liquor to be consumed on the premises to any person apparently under the age of 16 years should be subject to penalties of 20s. for the first and 40s. for every subsequent offence. He would suggest that the age should be fixed at 12 instead of 16, contending that a boy of the former age was sufficiently old to be responsible for his own action in such cases, and that there were comparatively harmless liquids, such as shrub, bishop, and negus, which came under the definition of spirits, which it would be absurd to prevent a man from selling to a person of that age. He thought their Lordships could say from their own recollection where these penalties would have been unjust to the landlord and inconvenient to youths of 16. The word sixteen must, he thought, have been inserted in the Bill by an oversight.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, it was owing to no oversight that the age had been fixed at 16. Such was now the law in the whole of the metropolitan district, and it was simply proposed to extend that law to the whole country. They had the evidence of the police that in the metropolitan district the greatest possible evils had arisen from permitting youths of 16 to indulge in spirits. Boys or lads of that age ought to be placed under judicious and reasonable restraint. He had not the slightest objection that a youth should drink sound English beer; but it was by no means desirable, he thought, that he should drink spirits.

On the Motion of the Duke of Richmond, the words "not being a traveller or lodger" were struck out.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 9 (Sale to be by standard measure).

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND moved an Amendment to the effect that the clause should only be operative when the person applying for the liquor expressly desired to be served in measures marked according to the Imperial standards.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that at present gross frauds were committed upon the public by the practice of serving them with liquors not in Imperial standard measures. There would be no difficulty whatever in getting glasses of the Imperial standard instead of pewter, if thought desirable.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 10 (Internal communication between licensed premises and house of public resort).

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH desired to see the clause so worded as to create a complete severance, not only between licensed public-houses and unlicensed premises which were used for public entertainment and resort, but between the license for a public-house and the license for a dancing saloon. The representations he received led him to believe that great evils arose from licenses given to the latter class of house. He would move to insert after ("house") "or with any music hall or dancing room."

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, the Government had not attempted to deal in this Bill with the general question of music and dancing licenses. He admitted that there were evils in connection with them, but he should be sorry to introduce into the Bill a single Amendment without dealing with the whole subject.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, the words of the clause were very large, and imposed penalties on "every person who makes or uses, or allows to be made or used, any internal communication" between licensed premises and houses of public resort. He proposed to leave out the words—

"In addition to any penalty imposed by this section, any person convicted of an offence under this section shall, if he be the holder of a license, forfeit such license."

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, the words "allows to be made" might touch the landlord.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY regarded the offence as a serious one, but promised to consider the points which had been raised, and, if necessary, amend the clause upon the Report.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 11 (Illicit storing of liquor).

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, the clause inflicted the heavy penalties of £10 and £20 on any license holder who should so much as have on his premises any description of liquor not covered by his license; and directed that the conviction should be recorded on his license. Now, he thought it would be hard if a beershop keeper were prevented from having for his own use any wine or spirits. He therefore proposed to insert the words "unless he shall account for the possession of the same to the satisfaction of the justices."

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY accepted the Amendment, regarding it as more effectual than the Amendment with a similar object of which he had himself given Notice.

Words added.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND proposed to omit the latter part of the clause—

"Any conviction for an offence under this section shall be recorded on the license of the person convicted."

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY was inclined to think the offence which the clause dealt with was a serious one. At the same time, this was a police not an Excise Bill, and believing that the offence might be properly met by Excise penalties, he would not oppose the Amendment.

Words struck out accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 12 (Publication of names of licensed persons) agreed to.

Offences against Public Order.

Clause 13 (Penalty on persons found drunk) agreed to.

Clause 14 (Penalty for permitting drunkenness).

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND proposed to omit the words—

"Any conviction for an offence under this section shall be recorded on the license of the person convicted."

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he could not possibly agree to this Amendment. Allowing drunkenness in the house, and supplying liquor to drunken persons, was a great offence, and to punish it severely was absolutely necessary in the interests of good order. He would, however, withdraw the words of the section which imposed a penalty if the publican were himself drunk.

Words ("or is himself guilty of drunkenness") struck out accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 15 (Penalty for keeping disorderly house).

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he proposed to leave out the words "or reputed thieves." The object with which those words had been introduced was more adequately provided for in the Prevention of Crime Act of last year, which contained stringent provisions against the harbouring of thieves in public-houses. Those provisions had worked extremely well, and, as the harbouring of thieves was more properly a part of the criminal law and was already provided for, he proposed to strike out these words. The question between him and the noble Duke would then be narrowed to the harbouring of prostitutes.

Words struck out accordingly.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND proposed to inflict the penalty only where the licensed person was convicted of permitting prostitutes, reputed thieves, or other persons of notoriously bad character to remain on his premises longer than was necessary for the purpose of obtaining reasonable refreshment. He thought it would be inconvenient to deal with reputed thieves in the Act of last year and with prostitutes in this Bill. The object surely was to prevent publicans from harbouring those persons, but not to prevent them from obtaining reasonable refreshment.

Amendment moved, to leave out all the words from ("person") down to ("be,") in line 19, and insert—

("is convicted of permitting prostitutes, reputed thieves, or other persons of notoriously bad character to remain on his premises longer than is necessary for the purpose of obtaining reasonable refreshment.")—(The Duke of Richmond.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, this clause was not so severe as the clause in the existing Act with respect to persons who knowingly harboured thieves. The clause to which he referred was no experiment, for it had been in operation for three years, and the police spoke of it as very valuable. He was ready, however, to accept the words of the noble Duke, if the Committee thought them preferable. But there was great difficulty, under the present law, in preventing prostitutes from assembling in night-houses in London. Attempts had been made again and again without success, and it was on that account that this severe clause was proposed. He was informed that the words proposed would not affect a woman who merely went casually into one of those houses to obtain refreshment.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he was not wedded to his own words, and if the noble Earl was satisfied that the clause as it stood would not prevent persons from entering a house for the purpose of getting refreshment, he would not insist upon his Amendment.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he had considered the words of the noble Duke in no unfriendly spirit, and he had come to the conclusion that it would be necessary to retain the words "habitual resort of or place of meeting."

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 16 (Penalty for permitting premises to be a brothel).

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY objected to the severity of the penalty in the latter part of the clause, according to which, not only was the licensed person to forfeit his license and pay heavy penalties, but, for a single conviction, the premises were to be disqualified from receiving a license for five years. It seemed to be assumed that these premises were always the property of licensed brewers who had, or might have, full knowledge of the way in which the house was conducted. He need not say that this was by no means the case. They were very frequently private persons who had very little means of knowing how the occupier was conducting it. Besides, such a penalty would enable the holder of the license to injure the owner, however innocent. For if the latter wanted to get rid of a bad character, or only threatened to distrain for rent, the license-holder might turn round on him and say—"You intend to ruin me, I will see what I can do to ruin you." He hoped this severe penalty would be struck out.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, the owner ought to receive notice before the house should be disqualified. The penalty for a third conviction of a publican would be easily avoided by bringing in a new tenant after the second conviction; but in this case one conviction would be ruinous to the owner, and it would be unjust to punish him if he was ignorant of the offence and had received no warning.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that very considerable difficulty arose with regard to the owner, and as this was the first proposal referring to owners they had come to in the Bill, he wished to point out that the principle of the clause was not entirely new, and that there was already, in more than one instance, a discretionary power for disqualification of this kind. In the case of permitting drunkenness or disorderly conduct there was already the power of disqualifying a house on the third offence; and the Wine Licenses Act of 1860 gave somewhat similar penalties. The objection to the penalty in this clause was, that it was imposed for a first offence, and was not discretionary with the justices. As to the gravity of the offence there could be no difference of opinion; but there arose a question as to whether the infliction of a penalty upon the owner was unjust. There were good reasons for calling upon the owner to prevent a licensed house being used in this way, but there might be other modes of compelling him to do so that might not be open to the same objection as this clause. They might give the owner power, when he found that his house was improperly conducted, to give the tenant immediate notice to quit and to remove him. That, however, would be a forcible interference with contracts, and if such a practice were admitted to a large extent it would lead to difficulties. If, however, the clause was too strong, discretionary power could be given to the justices. He should be quite ready to introduce a system of notices to owners. They might also require owners to be registered, or perhaps it would be preferable to allow them to be registered if they thought fit. With such a register, whenever an offence was committed which was recorded upon the license, the justices could send a notice to the owner that his tenant was conducting his house disreputably so that he might have a reasonable opportunity of preventing it being so used.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND thought that if the owner was wholly ignorant of the abuse of his house no injustice would be involved in his terminating the contract, which ought not to be valid under such circumstances.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY agreed with the noble Earl as to the danger attending an interference with contracts, but remarked that the noble Earl did not feel that difficulty quite so keenly when the Irish Land Bill was under consideration. It seemed to be a more serious matter to punish a man for what he had not done; but if the slightest degree of complicity could be proved against the owner then he ought to be punished. There would be no difficulty about the register, for the name of the owner could be written on the back of the license; and as soon as a conviction took place notice could be sent to the owner, who might have power given him to terminate the tenancy thereupon, or to be exempted from punishment if he forthwith gave such notice as the contract would enable him to give for the purpose of terminating the tenancy.

LORD CAIRNS said, nothing could be more unjust than to enact with reference to existing leases where the landlord had no power over the tenant, that the misconduct of that tenant should entail a forfeiture of property upon the landlord. With regard to future leases and contracts, it seemed to him that some system of notices was extremely desirable, because if a third conviction was to forfeit the license owners, for their own protection, would stipulate that two convictions should be, ipso facto, an avoidance of the lease, and it would be necessary that they should have notice of the second offence. Owners would thus be compelled to exercise a species of control over their premises and to secure good tenants; and as soon as a man had proved by his second conviction his unworthiness he would be superseded by a better tenant. But whatever might be done, nothing could be more unjust than to apply the penalty of this clause to the case of existing leases, where the landlord had no power over the tenant.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY was willing on the Report to modify the clause, so as to provide that the owner should have notice of the first conviction, and that a second conviction should involve disqualification for a license. On this understanding he would consent to the words being now struck out.

Words struck out accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 17 (Penalty for harbouring constables) agreed to.

Clause 18 (Penalty for permitting gaming) agreed to, with Amendments.

Clause 19 (Power to exclude drunkards from licensed premises).

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND objected to the proposal that a constable required to assist in expelling a disorderly person might "use force for that purpose without being responsible for the consequences of such force."

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY believed "force" would be construed as "reasonable force," but would consent to use the term "such force as may be required."

Clause amended and agreed to.

Adulteration.

Clause 20 (Adulteration of intoxicating liquors).

LORD BUCKHURST proposed that the punishment should not be confined to the use of "deleterious" ingredients, but should extend to any ingredients.

Nothing was more adulterated than beer before it reached the consumer, but he excluded from the charge the higher branches of the trade. He moved to insert the words "or other adulterating."

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY was anxious for stringent regulations to prevent adulteration, but was sure their Lordships would not desire to carry the clause too far. The proposed Amendment seemed to him to go too far. The Schedule enumerated cocculus indicus, copperas, opium, Indian hemp, strychnine, tobacco, darnel seed, extract of logwood, salts of zinc or lead, and alum. If anything further were needed it could be supplied by making additions to the list of adulterating ingredients, rather than use a general term, which might raise the question whether the ingredient was adulterating or not.

LORD LYTTELTON said, the question was whether they would treat it as adulteration to put into drink things that were not deemed deleterious, but which were put in simply to provoke thirst, and to induce persons to drink more than they otherwise would.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, the question also arose with reference to anything which would weaken the liquor. It seemed to him that the clause was sufficient as it stood, and that any necessary Amendment could be made by correcting the list of ingredients in the Schedule.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND agreed with the noble Earl (the Earl of Kimberley). The proposed Amendment would include water, and it would be unwise to accept it. He thought the words "deleterious ingredients," coupled with the list in the Schedule, would meet the case; and therefore he would advise the noble Lord not to press the Amendment.

LORD HYLTON said, that much adulteration was produced by mixtures supplied to publicans by brewers. He thought that everyone who adulterated should be deprived of his license.

THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY said, it would be very hard that a man should forfeit his license for selling liquor that was adulterated without his knowing it.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Lord Buckhurst

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he objected very strongly to the last paragraph of the clause, which required that a person convicted of any offence under this section should affix to any part of his premises prescribed by a public-house Inspector a placard stating his conviction, and should not remove it for two weeks. The offence of adulteration was no doubt a grave one; the penalty attached to it by the clause was very severe, and he was glad it should be so; but, if his Amendment to a later part of the Bill were carried, it would be necessary to qualify this clause. He objected to this additional penalty of compelling a man to placard his own guilt on his own house. It was a novel mode of punishing a man, though he understood it had been tried in New Zealand. He objected to it, and if he were encouraged, he should take the sense of the House upon it. The paragraph further directed that if any one were to pull down or deface the placard, the man should put it up again, and so, for the stipulated time, he would become a continual bill-sticker.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he hoped this clause would not be regarded merely as compelling a man to become a bill-sticker. He thought no more appropriate punishment could be inflicted than that of compelling a man to make it known to everybody that he had been convicted, and so to inflict the punishment upon himself. As to the penalty being novel in form, it did not follow that it was necessarily bad. At all events, he hoped that noble Lords on his own side of the House would not condemn the proposal because it was new; and if it was new, he believed it would prove to be a useful innovation, and that it would have a good effect on the keepers of public-houses. The very circumstance of a house being so placarded would attract a good deal of attention, and no doubt it would produce a good effect. They had passed laws to prevent adulteration, yet it was notorious almost everything they ate or drank was adulterated. He did not want to go too fast, and this was a small step in the right direction. The clause provided that the man who mixed with his liquors materials positively deleterious should be punished, not with the pillory as in the time of our ancestors—for in these days that would be deemed cruel and barbarous—but with something very like it, by making him display to the whole world the fact of his conviction in front of his house.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY thought the provision was, on the whole, a wise one, and that it followed a sound principle in legislation. What was said to the publican was—"You shall not deceive your customer; if you do you shall be punished for it." The penalty proposed would be most effective, without being very cruel. He was bound to say that the objection of the publicans was that they were singled out from other tradesmen for this form of punishment; and if the objection were allowed to endure it would be a sound one:—but he trusted that it would not endure, and that the grocer who sanded his sugar would be punished in a similar manner by subsequent legislation.

THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE thought the clause, as it now stood, had in it something ludicrous. It proposed to say to the guilty publican—"You shall not only have capital punishment, but you shall commit suicide." Surely it was enough to enact that the placard should be affixed to the man's house without compelling him to affix it with his own hands. How were they to compel the publican to do so?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, the publican would be fined 40s. for every day that the notice was not exhibited or was defaced.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 21 (Possession of adulterated liquor or deleterious ingredients), and Clause 22 (Schedule of deleterious ingredients) agreed to.

Clause 23 (Analysis of intoxicating liquor).

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND moved to insert—

"Any person required in pursuance of the foregoing provisions to furnish samples of any intoxicating liquor for the purpose of analysis may at the time of supplying such samples require the same to be sealed in his presence with his own seal, and a corresponding sample sealed by such superintendent, inspector, or officer, shall, if required, be left with the person for reference, in case of dispute as to the correctness of the analysis or otherwise. No sample so sealed shall be opened except by a public analyst, and such analyst shall give a reasonable notice to the person by whom such sample was furnished, in order to enable such person, if he shall think fit to attend at the time when such sample is opened."

He should presently propose that the person whose liquor was to be analyzed should be present if he should think fit when the analysis was made. When the Legislature was enacting very stringent penalties, it was but right that the party accused should be satisfied that the analysis was perfectly fair.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY felt that the noble Duke had the same object with himself. He would consider if any further words were necessary to be inserted in the clause, and if they did not entirely carry out his view, the noble Duke might object to the whole clause. He would confer with the noble Duke how the provision could best be made. He should object to the appointment of a public analyst.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, it would be useless for the publican to be present when the analysis was made, as he would know nothing of the process carried on.

EARL BEAUCHAMP said, it would be much less expensive to have a public analyst than to follow the clause as it stood; and the analysis of such an officer would command more confidence than an analysis performed by any gentleman appointed by the Excise. The public analyst need not be a salaried officer—he could be paid some small fee when his services were required. This year a public analyst had been appointed in Worcestershire at an annual salary, with great satisfaction to the ratepayers.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that the plan proposed by the Bill already existed, and worked well. There were nine Acts of Parliament against adulteration, and they were enforced by the Excise, and were not ineffective; for in the 10 years from 1857 to 1867 there had been 106 convictions.

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Closing Licensed Premises in case of Riot.

Clause 24 (Power of justices to close licensed Premises in case of Riot) agreed to.

Closing of Licensed Premises on Sundays and Holidays.

Clause 25 (Times of Closing).

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY hoped that the noble Earl who had charge of the Bill would not give too

Puritanical a character to the measure. The clause would not allow licensed houses to open till 7 o'clock in the morning. He supposed the object in view was to strengthen the hands of the police, and to prevent disorder and breaches of the law. But was there any danger of such things happening before 6 in the morning? If the object was to prevent the working man from taking his breakfast in a public-house and having beer with it instead of tea or coffee—there could be no doubt that beer was much less wholesome for him; but in the same sense pork was much less wholesome than mutton—yet Parliament would never legislate to force working men to eat mutton and not pork. Such a point as this, then, was entirely outside the purview of legislation, and to adopt it would be to apply an utterly false principle. There was also another point which he thought might be altered for the better. It was proposed to close public-houses at 12 at night—he thought that the time should be extended to 1 o'clock. There were many places of entertainment which did not close till 12, and it would be extremely hard upon those people who had been trying to obtain a little innocent amusement if they were to be prevented from going into a public-house after that hour. He thought the hours for week days should be altered so that these houses should be allowed to open at 5 A.M. and close at 1 A.M.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, it was difficult to fix upon what were the best times for opening and closing. No doubt the clause did propose a great increase of stringency over the present law, and he (the Earl of Kimberley) would at once admit that one object of the Bill, without being Puritanical, was to limit the extent of drinking by indirect checks. He was not disposed to advise the House to adopt the extreme views of those who would give power to the majority of a locality to prevent the minority using intoxicating liquors. At the same time there were considerable bodies of people, and among them a great number of the working classes, who entertained strong opinions on this subject; and it was necessary to take those opinions somewhat into account in dealing with the matter. There was a great difference of feeling in different parts of the country, and there might be cases of hardship and inconvenience if there were no loop-hole in the Bill, and that loop-hole was provided by the 27th clause, which empowered the magistrates to make exceptions in particular cases, in which it might be desirable to provide accommodation for persons attending markets or engaged in certain trades. In Scotland the magistrates had generally in their discretion fixed the hour of opening at 7 o'clock in the morning, and the arrangement had been found to work well. He trusted the Committee would not agree to make 5 the general hour for opening. The Bill proposed a uniform system for public-houses, beerhouses, and winehouses, which were at present under different regulations, and though it would be more severe as regarded public-houses, it would make less alteration in the other classes. It would be as well that he should point out exactly what were the present hours of closing. Within the limits of the Public-houses Closing Act of 1864—that was to say, within the City of London, the metropolitan police district, and such corporate boroughs or districts as had adopted the Act—the hours were from 1 A.M. to 4 A.M. Beerhouses were under the statute of 1860, and were closed from 12 P.M. to 5 A.M. in London and the metropolitan district, and in other districts they closed at hours varying according to the population. The present Bill proposed to introduce a general law for closing—namely, 12 o'clock at night, for London within the four miles radius, which was one hour earlier than public-houses were compelled to close at present; 11 o'clock for the metropolitan police district, and towns with 10,000 inhabitants, and 10 o'clock elsewhere. It was during the hour between 12 to 1 o'clock that the greatest amount of drunkenness took place; and if their Lordships wished to introduce order into our towns, they could not take a more effective measure than to close the houses earlier. He hoped their Lordships would take up the hours of opening and closing separately, as they were separate questions.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET preferred 6 A.M. to 7 for London; while in the country the case would be met by the clause giving power to the magistrates to relax the rule if they thought it necessary. He presumed that the clause proposed no alteration in the existing law as to Sunday.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, the alteration as regarded Sunday was this—The present hour of opening on Sunday afternoon was 12 30: the Bill proposed that it should be 1 o'clock, that was, half-an-hour later. The next hours for closing at present on Sunday were from 3 P.M. to 5 P.M., and the Bill proposed that the hours of closing should be from 3 P.M. to 6 P.M. Then, with regard to the closing on Sunday night, the hour of closing in London was left the same—namely, 11 o'clock, and the hour of closing in other parts of the country was made 10 P.M. for large towns, and 9 P.M. elsewhere.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET thought it hardly worth while for the sake of so slight a difference to re-open the Sunday question, which on a former occasion led to demonstrations in Hyde Park.

LORD PORTMAN thought 12 a better hour than 1 for closing, and 6 a better hour than 5 for opening.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY moved the insertion of a regulation at the beginning of the clause, providing that all licensed premises should be closed on every weekday between 12 o'clock at night and 7 o'clock in the morning. This was the intention of the clause as at present framed, but in its existing shape there was some ambiguity.

Amendment moved, p. 9, line 29, having inserted after ("Closed") ("on every day between") moved to insert ("twelve.") —(The Earl of Kimberley.)

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY, in order to raise the question, said, he should object to the hour of 12 in the noble Earl's proposal.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, his scheme of hours was as follows:—He proposed that the closing hours in the metropolis should be from 1 A.M. to 5 A.M.—which would meet the case of a number of persons employed in certain classes of occupation in London; he also proposed that in places with a population over 10,000 inhabitants the hours of closing should be from 12 at night to 6 A.M.; and with a population of less than 10,000 inhabitants the hours of closing should be from 11 P.M. till 6 A.M.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY remarked, that if houses were not opened till 7 o'clock persons arriving in London by the early trains would be much inconvenienced.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY believed there would be no more difficulty than at present in the admission of travellers into hotels during the closed hours.

On Question if their Lordships divided:—Contents, 46; Not-Contents, 31: Majority, 15.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET moved that the hour of opening be 6 o'clock, instead of 7.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that if this proposal represented the sense of the House, he would accept it.

The word ("Six") was accordingly substituted, with consequential Amendments.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, they now came to sub-section 2, which applied to houses in the metropolitan police district, but outside the four-mile radius from Charing-cross, and to towns containing not less than 10,000 inhabitants. The sub-section now provided that they should close at 10 o'clock. He had already agreed that houses should open at 6 o'clock on week-day mornings, and if the House thought that the houses contemplated in this sub-section should remain open on Sundays till 11 instead of 10 he should not object.

THE EARL OF BEAUCHAMP asked why the Bill should apply a different measure to people outside the four-mile radius from that applied to people inside? The East-end of London would not be included within that area, as the West-end would be, yet the people there had the same habits and the same mode of living.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, it was necessary to draw the line somewhere, but it was competent to the noble Earl to propose an extension of the limits.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY was sorry that the House was so given up to the fanatical party as to propose to close the public-houses in parts of the metropolitan district at 10 o'clock. The Bill was a piece of Puritanical legislation which he was sure would not work, for it was utterly opposed to the habits and feelings of the people, and he should be very much surprised if it were accepted by the other House of Parliament.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he was willing to take the metropolitan police district, instead of the four-mile radius for sub-section 1. With regard to towns of more than 10,000 inhabitants, he proposed to amend the sub-section by fixing the morning hour at 6, the other hours remaining as they were.

Amendments made accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 26 (Punishment of persons found on premises during closing hours) amended and agreed to.

Clause 27 (Exemption from closing by order of local authority, in respect of certain houses) agreed to.

Clause 28 (Amendment of law as to refreshment-houses) agreed to.

Effect of repeated Convictions.

Clause 29 (Forfeiture of license on repeated convictions).

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he proposed to mitigate the effect of this clause by inserting words making it discretionary, instead of compulsory, with the magistrates to disqualify the premises in respect to which there had been repeated convictions. He would therefore move in page 12, line 40, to leave out "shall," and insert "may if the Court having cognizance of the case in its discretion so thinks fit to order." With regard to the transfer of license, it had been complained that, except in the case of the transfer of the license to another person, the convictions would run against the house, and that the owner of the house might suffer by the license being taken away without any fault on his part. No real hardship, however, would be inflicted if the owner had notice. If any owner came forward and said he should wish to be registered, notice might be sent to him. He should be willing to propose words in another part of the Bill to effect that object.

LORD CAIRNS said, it was impossible to judge what the effect of the Amendments would be until they saw the words which the noble Earl intended to propose. He would suggest that they should wait until the Report before anything more was done with regard to these Amendments.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he should feel himself bound to amend the clause in the manner he had proposed with regard to giving discretionary power to the magistrates.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY suggested that an owner should not be punishable if he showed he had given notice to his tenant at the earliest possible moment after he became aware that an offence had been committed.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY proposed to take the suggestion of the noble Marquess into consideration.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 30 (Conviction after five years not to increase penalty) agreed to.

Supervision of Licensed Premises.

Clause 31 (Appointment of Public-house Inspectors in every police district.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND expressed his belief that the clause was unnecessary, as the machinery now in existence was better adapted for carrying out the object in view than that proposed by the noble Earl. Under the existing system the magistrates could direct every police Inspector to lay before them a report concerning the character of all public-houses, beerhouses, and refreshment-houses in his district. The clause provided that one Inspector should be appointed for every 100,000 inhabitants; but the result of this would be that in some cases an Inspector would have under his charge a district of 40 miles by 30. In his judgment, an Inspector could not furnish the magistrates with trustworthy information as to the character of all the public houses in so large a district. He also objected to the appointment of officers whose special duty would be to find fault with a particular class of people. Believing, therefore, that the present machinery was superior to that now proposed, he begged to move the omission of the clause.

Moved, "To leave out Clause 31."—
(The Duke of Richmond.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, the meaning of the clause was that there should be at least one Inspector to every 100,000 inhabitants; but there was nothing to prevent the appointment of additional Inspectors. The present inspection of public-houses by the constabulary no doubt worked satisfactorily in certain counties; but, owing to various causes, that was not the case in boroughs, where the inspection was flagrantly neglected. Last year the Government proposed that special Inspectors should be appointed by the central authority, and that they should have a sort of concomitant jurisdiction with the police; but it was objected that such Inspectors would go about the country like spies. The Government thought there was some force in this objection, and to meet it they proposed to take by the present Bill the least power they could in order to insure that the inspection of public-houses should be complete. The Inspectors appointed under the clause would remain attached to the constabulary force, and if the duty of inspecting public-houses did not occupy all their time they might be otherwise employed. He attached great importance to the clause. It would impose only a slight additional burden on the ratepayers, and was necessary for the proper working of the Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, it would rest with the Secretary of State to determine what the increased burden upon the rates should be, and that would depend upon his view of what was required to carry out the stringent provisions of the Bill; and it appeared from the speech of the noble Earl that he and the present Home Secretary intended to have a new police, which, of course, the counties would have to pay for. Surely, it was hard upon the counties to impose this additional burden on the rates so soon after the House of Commons had determined by a large majority that the money required for the administration of justice should be taken out of the Imperial Exchequer? They were told that the sum would be small; but the burden of rates that now pressed upon them so heavily was made up of small items. He thought it was clearly the duty of the Committee to divide upon this clause, and so mark their sense of a direct attempt to violate a Resolution which had been passed by the House of Commons.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET complained that the effect of the clause would be to treat the rural and the urban districts in a very different manner, with a balance of inequality and injustice against the rural districts. He thought the existing police arrangements were quite sufficient to meet the requirements of the case.

LORD EGERTON OF TATTON instanced several northern counties in which the public-houses were regularly and efficiently inspected and reported upon to the magistrates by the present police force.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, all that was desired by Her Majesty's Government was to procure an efficient inspection. He was aware that a considerable section of the public objected to every proposal which could increase local rating; but he would ask their Lordships whether it was possible to allow all improvements not provided for by Imperial taxation to remain in abeyance until the question of local taxation had been settled—this last question being one which would touch the deepest questions, and which could not possibly be settled for one, two, or three Sessions to come?

LORD KESTIVEN said, the question of local taxation was now at a deadlock, and must be settled before any new system of taxation could be adopted in the suburban districts.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND agreed with those noble Lords who urged the importance of efficient inspection, but maintained that the existing police force was perfectly sufficient for the work.

THE EARL OF POWIS thought one effect of the clause would be to leave the towns under a supervision much more lax than that which would be the rule in counties. It would be better, instead of singling out special members of the police force to carry out the law, to leave it to the force generally, as at present; and the magistrates would see that the instructions contained in the Act of Parliament were carried into effect.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY wished it to be understood that the effect of the clause would not be to create a new police force, but simply to add to the existing force in districts where it was not sufficiently numerous to ensure a proper inspection.

On Question, That the said clause stand part of the Bill? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 36; Not-Contents 53: Majority 17.

Registers.

Clause 38 (Register of Licenses) agreed to.

Amendment of Law as to Grant of Licenses.

Clause 39 (Licensing Committee in Counties).

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND objected to the proposal in the Bill, partly contained in this clause, with reference to the granting of new licenses. Last Session the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department expressed his deliberate and decided opinion that the local magistrates were the best judges who were eligible persons to receive licenses; and now the policy of the Government had been changed. He regarded the condition of obtaining the assent of the Secretary of State for the Home Department as not only unnecessary, but as tending to cast a slur on a body of men who had hitherto performed their duties honestly and well; in addition to which there was this further objection—that the Secretary of State could not possibly be acquainted with the wants of the locality, while to the magistrates they would be thoroughly known. That this point was not deemed of any great importance by the Government was evident from the fact that they proposed to confine it to the case of new licenses, and did not suggest the extension of it to transfers of renewals. It would be more simple to accept the proposal he had made that the present licensing body should remain as it was, with the right of appeal from the petty sessions to the committee appointed by the Quarter Sessions, to consist of not less than 3 members and not exceeding 12. There was no pretence for saying that the magistrates had exercised their power in granting licenses improperly; there was, therefore, no reason for depriving them of such power. Under such circumstances, he would propose the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

An Amendment moved, line 32, leave out from (“In”) to (“expedient”) in line 41 inclusive, and insert—

(“every county the justices in quarter sessions assembled shall annually appoint from among themselves a licensing committee, or they may appoint more than one such committee, and assign to any such committee such area of jurisdiction as they may think expedient.”—(The Duke of Richmond.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY objected to the Amendment, which he thought went to the whole root of the Bill, inasmuch that it practically left matters where they now stood. He could understand the proposition as being applicable to counties, but he could not see how it could work in boroughs. Independent of this objection, the plan suggested by the noble Duke provided none of the safeguards contained in the Government measure. He would not say that licenses had been granted by the county magistrates improperly or without due consideration, but it was generally admitted that the number of houses at present licensed was far too large, and Parliament, by the course it had adopted in reference to this subject, had shown a determination not to permit an evil already too great to assume still larger proportions. It was only last year that Parliament passed a Suspensory Act forbidding the granting of any fresh licenses without the sanction of the Secretary of State; and it was a mockery, and worse than a mockery, to attempt to legislate on this subject if they did not adopt some plan for the restriction of new licenses. The plan of the noble Duke opposite would be of no use whatever in this way, for licenses would be granted with just the same absence of discrimination, and deference to the public-house interest rather than the interest of the public, as they were now. The proposal of the Government was to make the concurrence of three bodies necessary to the granting of a new license. They therefore provided that in counties an application for a fresh license should receive the approval first of all of the authorities as at present constituted; secondly, of a committee of Quarter Sessions; and, finally, the assent of the Secretary of State. In boroughs where there was a numerous body of magistrates a similar process had to be gone through; but in smaller boroughs, where it would be impossible to form a committee out of the already small number of magistrates, the assent of the whole body, in the first instance would be submitted, without any intervention, to the Secretary of State. The result of that system, he believed, would be that no license would be refused where it could be shown that any real want existed. The case of renewals and transfers stood upon an entirely different footing. He should have been glad to introduce in the Bill further restrictions in that direction, if it could have been done consistently with the interest of those already engaged in the trade. It was inexpedient, however, to deal with renewals beyond what was absolutely necessary; the main point was to introduce a very strict revision of the granting of new licenses.

LORD CAIRNS said, the Suspensory Act was passed under special circumstances. Parliament had indicated its intention to restrict the granting of licenses, and it was feared there would be a great rush of application for such licenses. For this temporary purpose nothing could be more proper than to give the Home Secretary a veto on the granting of new licenses; but what it was wise to do for a time, it would be unwise to do as a permanent arrangement. From present appearances it was certainly inexpedient to add to the duties of the Home Secretary—indeed, it was obviously impossible for the Home Secretary, overwhelmed already by the weight of his other duties, to determine in his office in Downing Street the merits of every application for a new license, or whether more public-houses were wanted in a particular district or not. The legislation on this point should be positive, and there should be no possibility of one Secretary of State undoing the act of another Secretary of State. And if the duty were thrust upon him, upon what principle was he to act? Was he to lay down a rule for himself that he would allow no more licenses to be granted beyond a certain number, according to the population? That was a feasible rule, but different Secretaries of State might lay down different rules. If the Home Secretary were to decide the question upon the merits, how was he to gain evidence as to whether the premises of A. B. were properly constructed, or whether he was a trustworthy person? All the Secretary of State could do would be to resort to private inquiry, and the granting of licenses would degenerate into a party question, than which nothing could be more objectionable. If they wanted to bring the Secretary of State into ridicule and involve the matter in inextricable complexity, they could not do better than place this power in the hands of that high officer.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET thought as regarded counties a revision of the decision of the committee by the magistrates of the county would be a very good plan; but did not approve the proposal to give the Home Secretary the power of refusing a license. If he exercised the right, questions would be frequent in the House of Commons on the subject, and perhaps direct Motions would be made—a course which would detract from the character of the office of Secretary of State.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he would have no objection to striking out the words conferring the power of veto on the Home Secretary, provided the other part of the clause was allowed to stand, the object of which was to control the number of new licenses issued.

The words enacting “approval of Secretary of State” struck out.

On Question, That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 53, Not-Contents 50: Majority 3.

Resolved in the Affirmative.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 40 to 44, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 45 (Confirmation of licenses) struck out.

Clauses 46 to 49, inclusive, agreed to.

Legal Proceedings.

Clauses 50 to 52, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 53 (Liabilities of aiders and abettors) struck out.

Clauses 54 and 55 agreed to.

Clause 56 (Power of justices to direct prosecution of offences) struck out.

Clause 57 agreed to.

Miscellaneous.

Clauses 58 and 59 agreed to.

Clause 60 (Appearance of justices to defend appeal) struck out.

Clauses 61 to 65, inclusive, agreed to.

Saving Clauses.

Clause 66 (Saving of certain rights).

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET moved the rejection of sub-section 11, which provides for the sale of wine by retail, not to be consumed upon the premises, by a wine merchant in pursuance of a wine-dealer's license granted by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY objected to the omission, on the ground that the grocers' license, which would be affected by the rejection of the sub-section in question, would take away the existing security for the sale of pure wines and spirits by retail.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, the sub-section required at least amendment, and he would bring up an Amendment on the Report.

Clause agreed to.

Definitions.

Clause 67 (Interpretation) amended, and agreed to.

Repeal.

Clause 68 (Repeal of Acts mentioned in Schedule).

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY proposed to insert—

“And in particular there shall be repealed so much of the Wine and Beerhouses Acts as makes such Acts temporary in their duration, and the said Acts shall henceforth be perpetual.”

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

First Schedule (“Deleterious Ingredients”) agreed to.

Preamble considered and amended by inserting the words “and the better prevention of drunkenness,” as one of the objects of the Bill.

The Report of the Amendments to be received on Thursday the 6th of June next; and Bill to be printed as amended (No. 106).

CHURCH OF ENGLAND FIRE INSURANCE
BILL [H.L.]

INDIA—RECRUITING OF COOLIES.

QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES WINGFIELD asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the attention of the Secretary of State has been turned to the Report of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the treatment of Immigrants in British Guiana, presented to Parliament in June, 1871, wherein the following irregularities in the recruiting of Coolies in India are brought to notice:—1st, That the medical examination is hasty, and many infirm and aged persons are shipped; 2nd, That, though always entered as agriculturists in the certificates, many of the Coolies belong to other occupations, and are not fitted for field labour; 3rd, That they are deceived by the promise of far higher wages than the majority of Immigrants earn; and, if the Secretary of State has sent or will send instructions to the Indian Government to inquire into these irregularities, and provide the necessary remedy?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Yes, Sir, the attention of the Secretary of State has been drawn to the Report alluded to, and he is in communication with the Indian Government and with the Colonial Office on the subject.

INDIA—INCOME TAX, PRESIDENCY OF BOMBAY.—QUESTION.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is the case that the Bombay Government, through its Legislative Council, has for local purposes imposed a tax on incomes of £5 a-year and upwards, while the Government of India has raised the minimum of income assessable under the Income Tax, first from £20 a-year to £50, and subsequently to £75, and finally to £100?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Yes, Sir, it is true that a tax of the kind has been in operation for some months. It is a local or provincial impost for local and provincial purposes, levied under an Act for imposing duties on the rural non-agricultural classes, and intended to meet the criticism that taxation for provincial and local purposes was laid too exclusively upon the peasants and the land. Like all such imposts, it is merely tentative, and will of course be closely watched both on the spot and in this country.

BANK HOLIDAYS ACT—POST-OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS' CLERKS.—QUESTION.

MR. J. G. TALBOT asked the Postmaster General, Whether it may be understood from his answer, on the 23rd April, that the clerks in the Post Office Savings Banks throughout England will, as far as practicable, be relieved from their duties on December 26, Easter Monday, and Whit Monday; and, whether he will not consent to extend this privilege to them on the other Bank Holiday,—viz., the first Monday in August?

MR. MONSELL: Sir, from the terms of the hon. Member's Question, he seems to be under the impression that in country post offices the savings bank business is separated from other postal business, and devolves upon different persons. That is not so; and therefore, in the large majority of places it would not be possible to give a holiday to the persons engaged in savings bank business without closing the post offices altogether, and such is certainly not my intention. With respect to the second part of the Question, I explained the other day that the Bank Holidays Act did not apply to the Civil Service of the Crown; but I stated also that upon the three days I mentioned, as those holidays were generally observed throughout the City of London, it would be proper to extend them to the servants of the Post Office. I believe, however, that the first Monday in August is not so universally observed, and, therefore, it is not my intention at present to extend the holidays to that day.

BRITISH CONSULAR ESTABLISHMENTS. QUESTION.

MR. RYLANDS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he is able to assure the House that the Reports from Consuls relative to British Consulate Establishments recently laid upon the Table are given in full, and have not been abridged in any important particular?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: I believe, Sir, that nothing whatever has been omitted in printing the Consuls' Reports as far as answers to the queries in Lord Granville's Circular of August 26, 1871, are concerned. In a very few instances Consuls went into matters extraneous to those subjects, or made remarks of a personal character, touching Departments, Foreign Governments, and individuals, and these have been omitted.

MR. RYLANDS asked, Whether it is not a fact that some of the passages which have been omitted contain suggestions for economical reforms in the Consular Establishments which may with advantage be laid before Parliament?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, the Consuls were requested to answer as fully as they pleased the queries contained in Lord Granville's Circular of the 26th of August; but in some cases they went into other matters, some of which I will mention. In one case the Consul alluded to the re-organization of the Board of Trade; another referred to the constitution of the Foreign Office, and a third commented upon the strange discrepancy existing between the English Law and the Laws of Moses on the subject of bigamy. These, and one or two other matters referred to in the Reports were considered irrelevant, and it was decided to expunge them, in order that they should not appear upon the Table of the House.

INDIA—EDUCATIONAL SERVICE — RETIRING PENSIONS.—QUESTIONS.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Secretary of State has under his consideration the question of granting retiring pensions to officers in the Educational Service; and, if so, whether he has come to any conclusion upon it?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Yes, Sir, the Secretary of State has had under his consideration the matter alluded to by my right hon. Friend, and is awaiting a despatch from the Government of India on the subject, which he hoped to have received before this.

DOMINION OF CANADA—TREATY OF WASHINGTON—GUARANTEED, CANADIAN LOAN OF £2,500,000.—QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he will lay upon the Table all the Correspondence between the Home Government and the Dominion of Canada and Nova Scotia on the subject of the Washington Treaty, since the date of its signature; and whether, as this Correspondence is essential to enable the House to form a just opinion as to the proposed guaranteed Canadian Loan, these Papers will be laid upon the Table before the holidays? He also desired to put another Question bearing upon the same subject, and having special reference to the Papers which have been delivered. He found from the Papers laid on the Table that a Despatch from the Committee of the Privy Council of Canada was received by Lord Kimberley on the 30th August, which denounced in the strongest terms the Washington Treaty, and that the Despatch was not acknowledged by the Colonial Office until the 23rd of November, so that three months elapsed between the receipt of the Despatch and its acknowledgement. He wished to ask, Whether there was a mistake as to the date; and, if not, whether the hon. Gentleman will lay on the Table any Despatch received between the 30th of August and the 23rd of November?

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN: Sir, if my hon. Friend will refer to the Correspondence already presented, he will see that it is not confined to the question of the Loan, but goes into the whole subject of the Treaty. We have no further Correspondence with the Dominion Government to present as to the Treaty. Neither is there any Correspondence with Nova Scotia, as since the Confederation we have no direct communication with any of the Provinces which form that Confederation, but only with the Government of the Dominion. With regard to the second Question, it is not out of any personal disrespect to my hon. Friend, but out of regard to the established practice and usage of this House, that I must decline to answer a Question upon so important a point without the ordinary Notice.

ARMY—RETIREMENT OF INDIAN FIELD OFFICERS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL BARTELOT asked the Under Secretary of State for India, with reference to a statement made by him on the 21st of March, in answer to a Question which he put to him, Whether the scheme which is under consideration to induce Field Officers of the Indian Army to retire is intended to apply to Field Officers generally, or to those only who are unemployed?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, the scheme to which I alluded in my reply to my hon. and gallant Friend was one submitted by the Government of India, and which had for its object a reduction in the number of surplus and unemployed officers in that country, so as to save expense. There is no desire on the part of Her Majesty's Government to dispense with the services of any of the very efficient officers who are at present employed in that country.

ROYAL MINT—SILVER COINAGE. QUESTION.

MR. BARNETT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, in view of the continued inconvenience arising from a scarcity of Silver Coin and Half-sovereigns, he contemplates any plan to increase the power of coining at the Royal Mint, or to supplement it from any other source?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Probably, Sir, the hon. Gentleman is aware that we issue silver coin through the Bank of England. On the 2nd of this month we received an application from the Bank for a further issue of silver coin, but accompanying that intimation was a demand for a further supply of gold coin. There is, of course, a good deal of difficulty in carrying on two different coinages at once in the same establishment. This is, however, what we are now doing, and hope to be able to do till we have overtaken the demand. The pressure on the Mint has of late been something enormous. The Bank has issued £16,000,000 of gold during the last 12 months, in excess of the amount received from the public, which is about three times as much as is usually required, and in the same way the £860,000 of silver issued was three times more than the quantity usually required within the same period. No doubt there are ways by which we might put ourselves in a position to overtake any demand which may be made on us. One of these is by the erection of new machinery. The machinery we have at present is antiquated, and it would cost us about £40,000 to put us on a level with the best Mints. I did hope to be able to do what was required in this direction without any expense falling upon the public by disposing of the present site and purchasing one which is at the same time cheaper and more suitable. That proposal the House refused to accede to; but I am reluctant to incur this expense until I am certain that the House will not entertain the proposal. There is another matter which is also worth considering. We are at this moment sending large quantities of gold out of this country for the purpose of being melted down and being coined for other nations. The fact is that our gold is so well assayed that it saves a good deal of trouble to those who desire to use it for this purpose, because it can be melted down and used at once. The remedy for this would, of course, be to charge some mintage on gold, and so make it not worth people's while to export it. For the inconvenience complained of by the hon. Gentleman I have no remedy to suggest, but a little patience and to go on as we are.

SPAIN—SEIZURE AND DETENTION OF THE "LARK."—QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether any information has been received at the Colonial Office respecting the seizure and detention by the Spanish authorities at Manzanilla in Cuba of a vessel called the "Lark," belonging to Jamaica, which, under stress of weather, had been obliged to put into that port, or had been taken there by a Spanish gunboat in January last; whether, notwithstanding the production of her papers and her clearance, showing her port of destination, and the explanation of the circumstances which had obliged her to seek refuge at Manzanilla, and in spite of the assurances and remonstrances of the British Consul at that place, the vessel was detained for eight days under the alleged suspicion that she was conveying arms to the Cuban insurgents, although search had been made and no arms had been found on board; whether, under these circumstances, and without being taken before the Consul or any official person for examination, the owner, a merchant of Jamaica, a passenger, and the crew, consisting in all of seven British subjects, were taken on shore as prisoners and confined during the period mentioned in the common prison, among criminals of every description, many of whom were afflicted with loathsome and offensive diseases; and, under such circumstances of hardship and suffering, without even a bed or a seat to rest upon, except such as they were able after a time to procure at their own expense, that their health became more or less affected; whether before they could obtain their release they were required and obliged to sign a document professing to thank the Spanish authorities for the kindness with which they had been treated, and promising not to make any claim for compensation; and, whether Her Majesty's Government have taken, or intend to take, any and what steps to obtain redress and to procure compensation for these injured persons?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, before the hon. Gentleman replies, I desire to ask, Whether a Question of this unusual length, and containing a recital of so large a number of details, which may or may not be accurate, is in accordance with the Rules of the House?

MR. SPEAKER: In answer to the appeal of the right hon. Baronet, I am bound to say that the Question cannot be held to be out of Order. At the same time, I feel equally bound to say, that the Question is of such a character that, if the hon. Gentleman to whom it is addressed should object to answer all the facts alluded to on this occasion, the hon. and learned Member who puts it might—and, perhaps, more properly—find himself under the necessity of putting the Question on the Paper as a Notice of a Motion on the subject.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN: Sir, with all deference to your decision, I do not think that this Question is one which would have been better presented in the form of a Motion, and if the hon. and learned Gentleman had not stated the facts in his Question, I fear I must have detained the House by a longer statement than will now be necessary. Communications have been received upon this subject both from the Governor of Jamaica and from Her Majesty's Consul General in Cuba. Those communications convey to us intelligence very much in accordance with the statements made in the Question of my hon. and learned Friend. Immediately upon the receipt of that intelligence at the Colonial Office, we communicated with the Foreign Office, and without loss of time representations have been made to the Spanish Government through the British Minister at Madrid. Her Majesty's Government are at present awaiting the reply to those representations from the Spanish Government.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, he desired by way of justification to say that he had consulted his hon. Friend as to the form in which he should put the Question, and that in its present shape it had received the sanction of his hon. Friend before being placed on the Paper.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.
TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA).
THE INDIRECT CLAIMS.
CORRESPONDENCE. QUESTION.

MR. OTWAY: I wish, Sir, to ask my right hon. Friend, the Prime Minister a Question of which I have had no opportunity of giving previous Notice. I have understood that it is intended to make some communication to this House on Monday next with reference to the progress of the negotiations with the United States of America. The Question I wish to ask is, Whether the Papers which are expected to be laid upon the Table of the House, bearing upon the question, will be in the hands of Members before Monday, or on Monday, the day when it is expected the communication will be made?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, we do not purpose laying any Papers on the Table before Monday, nor can we say whether it will be expedient that Papers should be presented then or not. We will, however, endeavour, for all practical purposes, to place the House in exact possession of the actual state of the negotiations.

MR. BOUVERIE: I thought, Sir, I understood the other day, that the position of this House with regard to these negotiations would be exactly the same as the position of the House of Lords, and that it would be afforded an opportunity for discussion, in case it should desire to consider the matter.

MR. GLADSTONE: My right hon. Friend is perfectly correct in his assumption.

CRIMINAL LAW—REFORMATORY AND INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS.

RESOLUTIONS.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, in rising to call attention to the subject of Reformatory and Industrial Schools, and to move the following Resolutions:—

"That all Schools for poor children, aided by public money, should be under one general Education Department.

"That Industrial Schools should not be treated as penal institutions, but that children of tender age, whether merely vagrants or convicted of minor offences, should, after any due correction, be sent to such schools for the rest of their childhood, as to educational establishments where they may be trained to industry."

said, he thought that the Bill lately introduced by the hon. Member for West Kent (Mr. J. G. Talbot) evinced a growing complication of the subject, which deserved discussion. These schools might be now established under four distinct Acts of Parliament—two Acts of 1866, the Elementary Schools Act, 1870, and the Bill now nearly enacted just alluded to. They were supported from four sources—voluntary subscriptions, Treasury Grants, school rates, and county or borough rates. Public elementary schools of all sorts were scattered separately under separate departments—Elementary Schools being under one department, pauper schools under another, and reformatory and industrial schools partly under one Department, and partly under another. All schools supported by public money should be placed under the Education Department of the State, both as regarded inspection and finance.

Whatever varieties of circumstances might affect their inmates, the want of education was common to all, and so far as the object was the supply of that want at the public expense, the Department superintending such supply should be one and the same. It was neither wise nor just that any of these educationally-aided classes should have its education under the control of a department which had nothing to do with education. In the instance of industrial schools, which dealt with children who had not even fallen into crime, it would be admitted at least in their case that the State, in assuming locum parentis, though perhaps obliged to lodge and feed as well as educate, need not educate a child on the score of its desertion as a different animal from an ordinary child. Again, it was a growing conviction in the minds of all who had paid any attention to the subject that pauper schools should not be placed in workhouses, but that they should be separated from them, and great expense had been incurred in making large pauper schools, of which there were a group near London, which had given the nickname of "Pauperia" to the locality. The feeling, however, which had dictated that large outlay was to get the children out of workhouses; and the growing practice of this country was to go a step further still, and get such children to the national schools or the other schools of the country—at all events, to get them out of the workhouses, because the workhouses were not proper places for education, nor should the Poor Law Board be brought into the workhouses for educational purposes. The educational superintendence should be the same for all classes of children, from whatever cause thrown on public aid for education. It was a growing practice in Parliament to treat every detail of the same subject with isolated legislation and separate machinery. Every sort of factory had a distinct Factory Act and set of Inspectors. A central Education Department does not fulfil its post unless it embraces every kind of education to which the people contribute. Each kind of school may be distinct; but the superintendence and inspection of all belongs properly to the central Ministry established for that purpose. One incidental objection to the present system was that Parliament never had presented to it the total cost of public elementary education, for one item came in the charge for one department and one in another; the power of the House to check expenditure was taken away, although the division of control was in itself a cause of waste. He (Sir Charles Adderley) was in favour of what the right hon. Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) had often urged—a Minister for Education who should be directly responsible to Parliament for all educational expenditure, instead of the provisional arrangement still continued from the earliest tentative essays on the subject, leaving the subject in the hands of a subaltern officer of the Privy Council, without authority to guide the policy of the Department, and in a situation which prevented his feeling full responsibility.

To come now to an exclusive consideration of the two kinds of public elementary schools referred to in the Resolution—namely, reformatory and industrial schools, they were now both treated practically as identical, whether that House wished them to be so or not: his own idea, however, always had been that they were identical, not only in inevitable practice, but originally in idea. He drafted the first Bill on the subject of reformatory schools, which was taken up by Lord Palmerston and passed as a Government measure, with the chief alteration of substituting the title "juvenile" for "youthful" offenders, and he had for many years been engaged in the practical management of those institutions. The original idea of a reformatory was, that a number of children in all great towns being wholly without parental care ran about the streets and fell into crime; and that it was the interest of the State not only to punish them adequately for their offences, in order to deter them from crime, but after their punishment not to let them go back to their old neglected condition, but to step in, in loco parentis, and give them that education the want of which threw them into crime. The idea of industrial schools was that it was felt by a great many magistrates that the reformatories were made of too penal a character for the class of children who came into them; and more and more so, because the class of children who existed at first ceased to exist, by the mere fact of police interference having, however roughly, broken up the nurseries of youthful crime, and therefore they wanted a less penal class of schools to be adopted. The origin of the industrial schools was much the same as that which led to the establishment of houses of correction, under the mitigating notion of secondary gaols. As they relented from a Draconic code of hanging and imprisoning children, former habits lingered, and even now many still failed to embrace the full idea which substituted reformatories for prisons and death to criminal children. Although some attempts had been made to distinguish between the class of children sent to industrial schools and those sent to reformatories, yet, generally speaking, the inmates of both were in practice the same, for both were children utterly neglected and thrown upon the streets; and, so far from being children whom the Education Department should "shunt" to other agencies, they were the very class which that Department should take primarily under its supervision; because its business was not to give education to all, but to those who were unable to get it in any other way. In fact, they were the very class for whom the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon), much to his credit, tried to introduce the compulsory system, in order to force them into schools. They were, in fact, the only subjects of compulsory education they yet had, and the system developed, would probably supply all they wanted to have. There was great truth in the Jewish proverb that "the parent who brought up his child in idleness brought him up as a thief!" But convictions were not always a test of criminality. The convicted were often the most innocent. Besides, magistrates often committed children indifferently to reformatory or to industrial schools from reasons totally unconnected with their criminality, and sometimes even almost trumped up a conviction in order to get a neglected child into a good reformatory. He wished to assure the House that he was not at all trying to represent reformatories and industrial schools as having failed in their object. His purpose was to make them more perfect and more consistent with their true intention. It was the greatest satisfaction to him to think that it was to the Reformatories and to the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Societies that they were indebted for, what they might now hope to be, the permanent reduction of crime in the country. Reformatories had broken up the nurseries of crime, and there was now no longer the class of hardened juvenile criminals such as there was some 25 years ago. It was true that there were individual cases occurring every day of juvenile offenders quibus malitia supplet aetatem; but those offenders should be sent to prison and dealt with as adults. He was, therefore, the last man who would deny that reformatories and industrial schools had done great service; but he would be also the last man who would allow any old prejudices to stand still in the way of their complete and perfect success. That brought him to the main point of his Resolutions, and that was that these educational institutions were misused in being made penal in their character. The fact of their being treated as penal frustrated, in many important particulars, their intention. It was the greatest possible mistake to identify punishment with education. They were two separate ideas, and had only the relation to each other that medicine had to food; but they would never think of feeding a child during the whole period of childhood on medicine, and drugging all his food. They were trying to make their prisons schools and their schools prisons; whereas, it seemed to him that the special object of reformatories was, and ought to be, to raise the children in them out of the criminal class. As education was only incidental to the infliction of imprisonment, so punishment should be only incidental to the curriculum of school. They were giving long terms of imprisonment to try to reform character in places where punishment only was possible; and, on the other hand, a number of children, led into crime before their character was formed, were subjected to prolonged punishment during all their childhood, by way and under the parental pretence of education. That was a doubly false policy, both the treating of prisons as schools and of schools as prisons. There was folly as well as injustice in fixing for life the convict stamp both in a child's own consciousness and in the world's opinion of him. The chief object in making reformatories was to get neglected children out of the category of criminals as soon as possible, and not while whitewashing to continue staining them during the whole time they were in their charge.

Sir Charles Adderley

If they wanted to rescue from criminal character, why stereotype it? Why destroy the self-respect they wanted to set up? Why bar the entrance to honest ways of industry which they wished to open? At present the entrance to several kinds of industry was barred to youths who had been educated at reformatories. The principal services of the country were shut against them. The Navy was shut against them. No captain of a ship-of-war would take a boy from a reformatory, unless the boy were first further whitewashed by passing through some intermediate employment in the merchant service. The Army and Militia were closed against them. No colonel of a regiment would allow a recruiting sergeant to take a boy from these institutions; and if those who had been in reformatories were sent to the colonies, the colonies felt insulted, although they were the best trained class of emigrants for many purposes that could be sent. He would point out to the House another evil arising from the penal character of these institutions. He had information which showed that magistrates were often unwilling to impose a sentence of the full period of childhood to a reformatory or an industrial school, thinking it hard to give such penal treatment to a child; although, at the same time, they knew that the consequences of a shorter sentence would be turning out the child before the completion of his education. It was a stigma on a civilized country that it should by law treat penally for all their younger years children for whose previous neglect that country offered the remedy of education in loco parentis. Such treatment of a child of the upper class who might commit a crime, though not so excusably, would be considered monstrous. Magistrates, as he had before observed, were sometimes almost tempted to trump up a charge against children, merely for this absurd penal qualification for schooling, that they might be sent back again, after a too early discharge, in order that their education might be completed. In practice these institutions were educational, and their usefulness as such was impeded by their being nominally penal. He must remind the House that his Resolution did not apply to reformatories, and that it merely proposed that industrial schools, stripped of their penal character, should be transferred from the Police to the Education Department. Before he sat down he would anticipate one or two objections which might be made against his proposition, and which he had attempted to gather from circulars sent up and down the country with the view of getting up an opposition to this Motion. By-the-by, he was rather surprised that these circulars should have emanated from the Government Inspector of Reformatories, and must say that it was not that gentleman's duty to get up agitation on the subject one way or another. Most of the objections raised in these circulars amounted to an expression on the part of very excellent managers who had got institutions of the kind in question very comfortably in their own hands and did not like any change—"We are very comfortable as we are; why cannot you let well alone." He thought, however, that he had shown that the circumstances of these schools were not "well," and that they ought not to be let alone. In his view, these institutions, the value of which to the country had been established by their success, might be further carried out to their first intention, now that the old notions of child-imprisonment and hanging had subsided, and become of even still more value. It had been urged against his proposal that it would be positively immoral to treat bad children on the same footing as the good; but was it reasonable to declare that a child that had once been criminal must always remain criminal? Was the opportunity afforded to it for becoming an honest and industrious citizen, and yet was it immoral to treat it as anything but a criminal child all the while? But it was not proposed to put them to the same schools as the "good children." The proposal was that their schools should be in the school department. It had further been argued that disgraces should continue to attach to these children while they were in these schools in order to prevent parents from encouraging their children to commit crime, with the view of getting them into these institutions. Such parents were not tempted by such motives at all; but if they were, the proper check was to make the parent pay, at least, as much as the child's maintenance at home would have cost, and if the law on that point was not carried out, it was the fault of those who ought to enforce it. It was rather owing to the distinction now made, and which he wished to remove, that these schools enjoyed a tempting superiority to the ordinary elementary public schools of the Education Department. Another objection was a mere sentiment, that these schools were places of detention, and therefore must be under the Home Office. Now, all schools were in some sense places of detention, for if a boy ran away from Eton, he was caught and sent back. [Mr. BRUCE: By his parents.] Exactly; and unless the State stood in loco parentis to these children, whom it took from their neglectful parents, the entire justification of such institutions ceased. If compulsion was to be carried out under the Act of 1870, all public elementary schools would be connected with the police, and, according to this objection, should be under the Home Office. There was legal detention in apprenticeship; but must apprentices, therefore, be in the department of police? He, moreover, wished that the penal part of the treatment of criminal children should be in the hands of the police, but the educational part in those of the Education Department. A child thrown into lawless habits or acts by want of education should be punished, and after suffering punishment should be sent to school; while, if he ran away, the police should catch him. The less of prison for a child, even in his punishment, the better. Whipping had high authority and successful experience to support it for children. Flogging, however, seemed the sole remaining privilege of the higher classes; and it seemed to be considered the privilege of children of the lower class to be deemed criminals during the whole period of their schooling. As to the objection that the Education Department could not give the peculiar treatment required by criminal children, and would be too intellectual in its education of them, he would reply that the Department should be adapted to the discharge of all its duty, and not the duty allowed to be partly out of the reach of its Department. Dislike of that Department was at the bottom of the opposition to this Motion, for the benevolent persons who had for 30 years conducted the reformatory and industrial schools and spent large sums of their own money in a most useful manner, aided by grants and inspection, under the quiet shade of the Home Office, feared that the Education Department, being always exposed to criticism as the avowedly responsible office for such matters, and in perpetual turmoil, and subject to debate on all its actions or orders in Parliament, would be constantly involving them in trouble. That, however, was not a good reason why the Department should be allowed to hide part of its proper duty in another Department unsuited to it. The Education Act of 1870 allowed school boards to undertake such institutions, and the Bill of the hon. Member for West Kent (Mr. J. G. Talbot) would leave them in a doubtful position between the prison and the school authorities. There was, therefore, a transition state already introduced, and the law was becoming complicated. He hoped, therefore, that the House would give their serious consideration that year to the Resolutions which he thus offered to their notice; and if the Government did not next Session undertake to deal with the subject, he should attempt an amending and consolidating Act, placing the schools in question on the simple footing they were intended to occupy, under the public elementary school Department.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "all Schools for poor children, aided by public money, should be under one general Education Department; and that Industrial Schools should not be treated as penal institutions, but that children of tender age, whether merely vagrants or convicted of minor offences, should, after any due correction, be sent to such Schools for the rest of their childhood, as to educational establishments where they may be trained to industry."

—(Sir Charles Adderley),

MR. MELLY said, as representing the managers of several of those institutions, among whom he might instance the name of a lady well-known in that House, Miss Mary Carpenter, he must object to the Motion. He had paid great attention to the subject for many years, and his complaint was, that the schools were not penal enough; and that the first necessity in these schools to which children were sent should be strict penal restraint. If there were to be penal institutions—juvenile prisons, in which the first motive power was the policeman, the second the magistrate, and the third the conviction, they ought, of necessity, to come under the control of the Home Office, as they properly did at the present time. He had always thought there ought to be only three kinds of schools for the poorer classes—namely, national day, workhouse, and criminal schools; and were the last class transferred to the Education Department they must either be crippled by the principle of payment for educational results, or a different scale of payment must be devised for them. Moreover, the adoption of the course proposed by the right hon. Gentleman would seriously add to the burden of Poor Law relief in each district, and would deal a heavy blow to the whole question of education, for, even under the present system, parents had only to be drunken, dissolute, and neglectful enough, and the magistrates would send their children to the industrial schools, which were, in fact, boarding schools, at the rate of £18 a-year. Several stipendiary magistrates had written to him that the effect of that was, that admission to these schools was already sought as an object of honourable competition. The right hon. Gentleman further wished to diminish the penal character of these schools, which was already too slight; to make a still larger invasion on the public purse; and that still more encouragement should be given to the poor to neglect their children. He (Mr. Melly), however, contended that their legislation should have objects directly opposite to these; and upon that ground alone, he should be anxious that the Resolutions should be negatived. If the schools were to be penal institutions, then, of necessity, they should be in the hands of the representative of public justice; and upon that ground, he contended that the Home Office should have the control of them; but if those schools were placed under the Education Department they must be put into the hands of the school boards; and, if so, their education must be carried on in the manner pointed out by the Education Act of 1870. Now, no man had been more anxious than himself that the education imparted under that Act should be unsectarian; but as the State stood in loco parentis with reference to the children in question, and had the entire control of, and responsibility for, them for the five or six most important years of their lives, it would be absolutely necessary to give them religious as well as secular instruction, and in that case the religious difficulty would again crop up, because dogmatic religious teaching would be paid for out of local rates. In fact, that difficulty had already been experienced in Liverpool, and there was no doubt many of the large towns would follow her example, and, after an acrimonious contest, elect men pledged to refuse to support such schools. He, therefore, hoped that the children would be left in the hands of those Christian people who had established the schools; but he should be glad to see a stricter system of inspection established, and that the attention of the magistrates should be again called by the Home Secretary to the indiscriminate and extravagant way in which they had, in some instances, exercised their powers.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he must oppose the proposition of his right hon. Friend. It might have been supposed from the speech of his right hon. Friend that he was attacking institutions that had not done the duty assigned to them, yet he showed that where he himself was in charge of a school they had almost exhausted the bad materials with which they began, and were getting a better class; and that was because the school system had worked so well under the discipline established under the Home Office, that there was really nothing to be desired in that respect. His right hon. Friend had said that the schools had answered so admirably that they had got rid of the very bad material that had previously existed in Birmingham; and then he said that when you put a child into the institution it was ruined for life. The two things seemed to him (Mr. G. Hardy) to be inconsistent. It was not, however, only because the schools were under the Home Office instead of the Education Department that objection arose to the Resolutions. Conceive the injury which would be done by them with respect to the education of the poor. A great number of children were destitute in consequence of the destitution of their parents, or because they had been deserted by their parents; and, unfortunately, some of these children were educated in workhouses. Now, it would obviously be inconvenient for the Education Department to interfere in the management of workhouses, which at present were most admirably inspected, even with regard to education, by Inspectors connected with the Poor Law Board. For instance, everyone who had perused Mr. Tuffnell's Reports was aware that that gentleman had conducted such examinations in a most efficient manner. His right hon. Friend had said it was absurd to have different classes of Inspectors as under the Factory Acts; but it should be borne in mind that the whole system of inspection was under one Department. Children employed in factories were educated under the half-time system; but surely it would be absurd to impose on the Education Department the duty of inspecting the whole treatment of such children. Institutions like industrial and reformatory schools, in which a penal discipline was enforced, must necessarily be under the control of the Home Office, and the accessory must follow the principal, and so the intellectual and moral instruction, as well as the general discipline, came under the Rev. Sydney Turner, and in that way were achieved those results which had been alluded to in terms of approval by his right hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Melly). Children came into these institutions, because the religious bodies outside had failed to arrest them in their career. Therefore, they must be treated like criminals, lunatics, and others, and be placed under chaplains or religious teachers who would undertake to train them. Indeed, he believed that no attempts had been made to establish reformatories without such definite religious training. Some of them had been established by Roman Catholics, some by members of the Church of England, and some, he believed, by members of other religious bodies. In all cases, however, where children were shut up and kept away from the operation of the voluntary energies of the different religious bodies, they must be placed under the care of those who would undertake their whole religious instruction; but if these institutions were connected with the Education Department, which acted upon different principles, a conflict would ensue which it was most desirable to avoid. His right hon. Friend (Sir Charles Adderley) was aware that this was not a new subject to him, for when he was Under Secretary of State for the Home Department his right hon. Friend had addressed a Memorandum to the Home Office, and he (Mr. G. Hardy) had investigated the subject, and placed on record the convictions which he still entertained. Where the jurisdiction was criminal, beginning with, and continuing under penal discipline, the Home Office was the proper authority to deal with the liberty of the subject, which was involved in the question. The object, then, was so to educate and discipline the minds of the children, that when they left the reformatories they should be fit to enter the merchant service or to be bound to some trade, and so to pass through the intermediate discipline, after which they were readily admitted into the Army or Navy. The Home Office, as had been admitted by his right hon. Friend, had admirably done its duty in regard to these schools; but if that duty was neglected, the proper course would be to censure the Office, rather than to place the schools under another Department which had already quite enough to do; and however ambitious the Vice President of the Council might be to have the entire education of the country in his own hands, he did not suppose the right hon. Gentleman would wish to take these criminal classes from that discipline and authority which had been exercised with so much advantage to them and to the country.

MR. CANDLISH said, a great part of the life of the right hon. Gentleman who had brought forward the subject had been devoted to the great work intended to be accomplished by reformatory and industrial schools, and he, therefore, regretted that he was unable to accept the right hon. Gentleman's proposal. Not only was it the case that the conductors of industrial and reformatory schools were tolerably unanimous in their opposition to it, but the right hon. Gentleman himself even had given the strongest testimony as to the efficiency of these schools at the present time. If the children in such institutions rebelled against the law, for instance, what authority was so well fitted as the police to restore them to subjection? The right hon. Gentleman urged that the whole of the money devoted to educational purposes ought to appear under one head; but, surely, anyone interested in the subject could easily ascertain the sum total with perfect accuracy. It was further admitted on all hands that these schools were extremely well managed, not under the operation of the law, but by means of voluntary efforts in a spirit of earnest Christianity and love; and he thought, therefore, that any legislative interference with them might weaken the interest of those who maintained the schools, and so diminish the usefulness of the schools. While he admitted that the discussion which had taken place would have a very wholesome effect, he was glad, for the reasons he had stated, that the right hon. Gentleman did not intend to ask the opinion of the House upon his proposal.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he should support the Motion, believing that the view of his right hon. Friend was sound and just—namely, that the various schools throughout the country which were supported by public funds ought to be under different management. The hon. Member for Sunderland had alluded to the degree of Christianity and love in which these schools were conducted; but he did not suppose the hon. Gentleman proposed to draw an invidious comparison between the Christianity and love likely to be shown by his right hon. Friends the Home Secretary and the Vice President of the Council, either of whom might with equal safety and advantage be trusted with the management of the schools. As far as his personal opinion was concerned, he did not think the educational affairs of the country, which had grown immensely of late years, would ever be properly conducted until they were entrusted to a responsible Minister of Education.

MR. KINNAIRD said, that he was glad the subject had been introduced, because the country was beginning to forget the enormous amount of good that reformatory and industrial schools had done, and to look, he was inclined to add, in a rather less generous spirit than formerly upon these institutions. He was, however, opposed to the change proposed by the right hon. Gentleman; the mere suggestion of which, tending as it would to still more restricted grants, had already produced quite a panic in Scotland.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, that as he had long taken a great interest in the question, perhaps he might be allowed to say a few words, especially as he had the misfortune to disagree with the conclusions of his right hon. Friend (Sir Charles Adderley), which he did with great diffidence, there being few persons more entitled to speak with authority on such matters than he was. At the same time, he thought his right hon. Friend had done good service by raising the question; because, since the changes made by the Education Act, public opinion was looking for some guidance on the point, and it might be that the time had arrived for a fresh and closer definition, and even for a new and more complete classification of these schools. He should be sorry, however, to see any sweeping change in their management; for the simple reason that these institutions, especially reformatories, were doing excellent service, and, after many years of very uphill work, the managers and the country were beginning to reap the fruit of their labour and expenditure, as evidenced by the fact that, notwithstanding the increase of population, there had been a great diminution of juvenile crime. The commitment of boys had fallen from, in round numbers, 12,000 in 1856 to 8,000 in 1871; those of girls from 2,000 to 1,000; and yet there had been no increase in the number of reformatories for the last five or six years. On the contrary, there was some difficulty in filling existing institutions with the proper class of inmates, the supply having been cut off by industrial schools, owing to which reformatories had lately been taking in children who ought properly to be in industrial schools. Under these circumstances a statesman would, he thought, pause before disturbing arrangements which worked so satisfactorily. What was the origin of the reformatory and industrial schools? The former were intended to give a better classification than could be effected in prisons; the latter were instituted afterwards still further to extend the classification, for the language of his right hon. Friend's Resolution—"children of tender age convicted of minor offences"—could not apply to the hardened criminals committed sometimes to reformatory schools. Therefore, the original idea of both classes of institutions was quasi- penal, and it might perhaps be broadly said that children were sent to reformatory schools for their own faults, and to industrial schools for the faults of their parents—it being necessary for the protection of society to visit the sins of the parents on the children. But he quite admitted that that definition was not entirely accurate, because the qualifying clauses in the Industrial Schools Act were too wide; and, consequently, many children were sent to industrial schools, not for their own faults or for the faults of their parents, but on account of the poverty of the parents. Hence arose a confusion of ideas in the minds of those who discussed this subject. One person would be thinking of children committed for their own faults or the faults of their parents, and would regard consequently the school as a quasi-penal establishment; the other would have in his mind the victims of poverty only, and would resent the idea that this should be punished as a crime. But what did that point to? Not to altering the character of true reformatory institutions, but to a fresh classification, from which they could eliminate altogether the penal element; and to a new kind of industrial schools for the very poor with no taint of criminality either in children or parents. Such schools would be purely educational, and might be properly placed under the control of the Education Department; but he felt sure that for the present institutions the Home Office was more appropriate. The inmates, if properly selected, had committed crime, or they were on the road to crime; the magistrate committed them, they were under forcible detention. The training was religious, moral, and physical, rather than intellectual. The police captured them when they escaped, and looked after the parents, who were under order to contribute to their maintenance. Again, the managers of the institutions themselves were almost unanimous against the change. They did their work in a rough, homely way which would excite the horror of the Education Department with its overtrained masters and overdressed mistresses. The Home Office judged by general results, and did not trouble itself about the architecture of buildings, or shapes of desks and benches, which had imposed such an enormous, and in many cases such an unnecessary, expense upon the country since the passing of the Education Act. For instance, there was a wretched hulk in Cardiff doing excellent service among a depraved population, which would not be allowed to exist for an hour under the Privy Council. That strong feeling against a change could not be ignored in a case where the ways and means were so largely supplied by voluntary contributions; and this brought him to the point of the source, other than subscriptions, from which these institutions were supported, mentioned in his right hon. Friend's original Motion. Like many other systems in this country which worked very well, it was neither logical nor symmetrical, and at first sight it certainly seemed strange that any institution should receive money from three wholly independent sources. Yet on examination they would find that the arrangement was defensible—

“A mighty maze, yet not without a plan.”

The voluntary subscription presupposed local and individual interest in the management of these institutions. The contribution out of local rates insured local supervision, and the Treasury grant authorized central inspection, which they knew had been most efficient. The Education Act had merely substituted the school board for the town council in boroughs without altering the principle of the arrangement; but he would admit there was some omission with respect to counties. A very important question, however, especially to ratepayers, arose out of the present system. It was this—how far were they to carry the relief of parents from the obligation to support their children, and the transfer of that obligation to the rest of the community? Formerly, they confined such support to two classes only—criminals and paupers. They had recently extended it to the inmates of reformatory and industrial schools, whom he would call, for argument's sake, quasi-criminals. They now proposed to extend it to the poor other than paupers. The London School Board had been debating lately whether it should feed the children of improvident people; but if it was difficult to draw the line at which free education was to be afforded, how much more difficult to decide upon the point at which free subsistence was to be given? He quite admitted that they did this not so much for the good of the individual as for the protection of society, and that it might be lawful and advisable in such cases—

But, at the same time, they ought not to overlook the effect they might produce on the honest poor, who struggled to bring up their families without assistance, if they placed in so much better a position the children of the improvident, and that without any stigma, real or imaginary, such as that which might attach to institutions under the Poor Law or Home Office; for in this way they might be embarking on a very dangerous course. The boarding-out system recently introduced had already been the cause of much heart-burning among the poor in the country. He had heard of a man saying—“Here am I trying to keep myself and my family off the parish, and in the next cottage they have taken in a child at 5s. a-week, whose father drank himself to death after killing his wife by ill-treatment, and whose child has more than twice as much spent on him as I can spend on one of mine.” He did not say that this was conclusive against the system, and he knew that in the case of industrial and reformatory schools they had a certain safeguard in the power of obliging parents to pay, which ought, perhaps, to be more rigidly exercised, though it was full of difficulty; but he did say, that if they not only educated but supported the children of improvident parents at the expense of the community, without attaching the stigma of crime or pauperism to that support, they ran the risk of giving a premium to improvidence, and of very soon making the rates, which were paid, be it remembered, not only by the rich, but by the provident poor, wholly intolerable.

MR. HENLEY said, that the question before the House was, perhaps, one of the most difficult which could be brought under the consideration of Parliament. Children who, either through the neglect of their parents or their own fault, got into the hands of the authorities were from that moment placed in a position infinitely better in every respect, material or otherwise, than in all human probability they would have been if they had remained in the hands of their parents. If they simply looked to the welfare of the poor children, so far as they were concerned, they ought to be, and no doubt were, subjects of great interest and great care; but the House must be careful not to lead persons who were struggling under difficulties to get on to suppose that the children of the improvident were in a better position than their own, and from the wording of the Resolutions it was difficult to say to what extent they might go in that direction. The Resolutions were, in fact, much too general in their terms, and whether the children were under the management of one office or another was not of any great importance; but whichever it might be, the industrial training should be of the humblest kind; they should be taught to dig and cultivate land, and it was a serious question for consideration whether they should be taught trades, and thereby have an advantage over others. The authorities properly tried to recover the expenses from the parents; but in many cases it could not be done, and when it was obtained it was recovered at a great expense. The question, then, was surrounded with great difficulty and danger, and he was heartily glad the obligation to settle it rested upon his right hon. Friends the Home Secretary and the Vice President rather than upon himself.

MR. BRUCE said, the debate had been conducted so ably that but for his official position he would be content to leave the matter as it stood. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir Charles Adderley) had done good service in bringing forward the question; and no one was better entitled, both from his long official experience and from the great attention he had paid to the question of prison discipline, to state his conclusions in Parliament. His main proposition was that the control of industrial and reformatory schools should be transferred from the Home Office to the Education Department; but the opinion both of that House and of the country generally seemed to be that the Reformatory Department had been well administered, and he was surprised to hear from the Conservative lips of his right hon. Friend a denunciation of the dogma “Let well alone.” While he himself was content to be very much guided in the matter by the opinions of those excellent persons who for the last 20 or 30 years had attended to the subject, yet, at the same time, he was well aware that his right hon. Friend did not desire change for the sake of official symmetry any more than he would deprecate change which would be beneficial, and that his main object was to relieve these children from the stigma which he held would attach to them during the remainder of their life through their being educated in a criminal school. That, no doubt, was a laudable object; but if there were any grounds for the belief that that stigma did attach to them in after life, surely those who would first hear of it would be those benevolent and experienced persons who managed these institutions. But the desire of these persons was that these institutions should remain under the control of the Home Office. And in dealing with this point he desired to defend the action taken by the Rev. Sydney Turner, for whom his right hon. Friend, in common with all who had anything to do with these institutions, had sincere respect. Mr. Turner, desirous of ascertaining the opinion of those in authority over these schools upon the question raised by the Motion, had made application to them in terms of the utmost impartiality for their opinion, and without giving any indication of the opinion entertained by himself. By an ambiguous use of the term "schools," these institutions were made to appear to have a character different from that which really belonged to them; but the fact was that they were not schools in the ordinary sense of the term; and the ground of distinction between these and ordinary schools was that they were not places of intellectual training, but of correction and of special industrial training suitable to their class. The inmates of the reformatory schools had committed offences, and it might be fairly assumed that a child convicted of one felony had committed several; and, although children for whom great sympathy would be felt, they were still a criminal class, and should be subjected to a special corrective discipline, under a set of rules different altogether from the ordinary rules of the Education Department for the control of ordinary schools. The children in ordinary schools entered at four or five, and remained until they were 12 or 13; the inmates of reformatory schools, on the contrary, were nearly all above 10, for in 1871, out of 1,575, as many as 1,547 were above 10 and four-fifths above 12 years of age; and 760, or about one-half, were above 14 years of age. The case was not quite so strong in the industrial schools, where there was a different class of children, both with regard to age and ignorance. Out of 2,784 children admitted last year, 1,969, or two-thirds, were above 10 years of age; and 873, or nearly one-third, were above 12 years of age. It appeared, therefore, that in both classes of schools the children were rather advanced in life, and having been brought up in habits of total disregard for all the decencies of life, they required treatment very different from that which would suffice in the case of ordinary children; and powers of compulsion must be possessed by the superintendents far beyond those possessed by ordinary schoolmasters. The schools, indeed, were juvenile houses of correction, modified, by considerations of humanity and good policy, to meet the case of these unfortunate children, and so brought as nearly as possible to the condition of schools. The children were committed to them by warrant; the Home Secretary could remove them from one place to another by warrant; and he had power to remit any portion of their sentence, on being satisfied such remission would be for the good of the child; and, indeed, that power was often exercised in the case of children who had respectable parents. The Home Secretary, in fact, had the same power of control over these children as over ordinary prisoners. The system, however, was in many respects capable of improvement, and he should be very glad to see the Bill his right hon. Friend had promised; indeed, so strongly was he impressed with the necessity of some improvement, especially with regard to the desirability of distinguishing between the criminal and the merely outcast classes in industrial schools, that he had been desirous of introducing a Bill upon the subject that year. The right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) had not exaggerated the danger, inherent in all these cases, of giving a better training to the criminal classes than was offered to the children of the honest poor; but, in truth, every prisoner sent to gaol was better clothed, fed, and housed than many members of the industrial classes, and a discharged prisoner often had a better chance of finding employment than the honest artizan. That injustice, however, was inseparable from the system, and the question for consideration was, whether the injustice would be removed or diminished if these criminal children were placed under the Education Department. His right hon. Friend (Sir Charles Adderley), however, did not pretend the institutions would be better administered if they were under the Privy Council Office; and it was questionable whether the stigma the right hon. Gentleman desired to remove from them in after life really attached to them. On the contrary, from information received from all parts of the country, he (Mr. Bruce) gathered that there was a positive competition among employers for these children upon their discharge, and that as agricultural labourers, colliers, artizans, and sailors, they had no difficulty in getting employment. There were, however, so many attractions to those schools—and especially the industrial schools—in the fact that the children in them were not only educated and specially trained for the battle of life, but were fed and lodged at the public expense and afterwards started in their careers, that it was essential there should be some distinction drawn between those schools and other schools so as to make them less inviting; and there he thought the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire had hit the nail on the head, as he did in so many other matters. There ought to be some sort of stigma put on those schools, in order that the parent should feel the disgrace of having his child sent there, and that the well-disposed poor man might feel an honest pride in giving his child an education which, if not quite so good, was at least given at his own expense; and if that proper distinction could be maintained without injury to anyone, then he thought that the argument of his right hon. Friend (Sir Charles Adderley), on which he based his Motion, entirely fell to the ground. In conclusion, he could assure his right hon. Friend who had called forth that discussion, that he should be glad to welcome any measure that he might bring forward for improving institutions which had done so much to reduce crime.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, that as his Bill for giving prison authorities in England and Wales power to originate those schools had been pointedly referred to, he wished to say a few words. They had long desired in Kent to establish the industrial school system; the Home Office had kindly supported him in his attempt to enlarge the powers given to local authorities, and his Bill had passed through the House at those hours when private Members' Bills only could pass. He thought it was no discredit to himself to have sat up for that purpose as late as he had done, because the Bill was one of a beneficent character; and if it had been as bad a measure as his right hon. Friend (Sir Charles Adderley) said it was, it was the duty of his right hon. Friend to have sat up also and resisted it. The Memorial to the Home Secretary from the manager of the Redhill Reformatory—one of the best known and most successful of those institutions in the country—stated—

“Your Memorialists desire to urge very strongly that the inmates of reformatory schools are very dissimilar to the attendants at an ordinary elementary school—e.g., the boys in this institution are as a rule:—1. Older: in the last three years 260 boys have been admitted, and of this number 138 were over 14 years of age. 2. They are more ignorant: of the above 260 admissions, 99 were totally unable to read, write, or cipher, and of the 138 over 14 years old, 46 (or one-third) did not know the alphabet. 3. They are criminal in character: as a rule no boys are admitted on first conviction, while many have been previously convicted four, five, six times, &c. In the case of ‘children of tender age’ (under 12 years old), who are exceptionally admitted here, it is found that their criminal character is so developed that ordinary school instruction would be altogether insufficient. 4. They are detained by sentence of law, and therefore require strict and expensive discipline, as well as ordinary educational appliances.”

That showed that the inmates were of a class entirely dissimilar from the children with which the Education Department attempted to deal, and that they must be treated as incipient, if not indeed as advanced, criminals, which many of them were. So much for the reformatories. Then, as to the industrial schools, he had a letter from Miss Greenwood, the lady manager of the Industrial School for Girls at Halstead, in Essex, in which she said—

“This school has, through the police, recovered £10 during the last quarter (for ten children) from men who would not otherwise have made any contribution in relief of the Treasury charges. . . . A man came down here a short time since and demanded his children, and my power would have been vain without the Bench order of detention. They would have been taken back to a thoroughly criminal home. What compensation of power would a town without a school board have?”

Therefore, although he thought the right

hon. Baronet had done good service by bringing forward the subject, he was unable to come to the conclusion to which he wished to lead them. On the contrary, he (Mr. J. G. Talbot) thought that was one of the most satisfactory parts of their legislation; and, instead of being afraid that they were making those children too comfortable, they ought rather to encourage the police to bring up more children, that they might be placed in industrial schools. If the House desired to put a stop to juvenile crime they must go to the fountain head—that was, they should visit the worst parts of the large towns, where might be found thousands of children not simply without education, but with an actual training in crime as a profession; and what the Home Office had best do was to exert the power of the law in order to counteract that evil, and make good citizens of these juvenile criminals, whose after offences cost so much to the country.

Question put, and agreed to.

Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

BOROUGH REPRESENTATION (IRELAND).—RESOLUTION.

MR. DELAHUNTY, in rising, pursuant to Notice, to move—

"That, inasmuch as the manufacturing, commercial, and trading interests of Ireland are not sufficiently represented in Parliament, and it is not expedient that its borough representation should continue lessened by the disfranchisement of Cashel and Sligo, it is the opinion of this House that Her Majesty's Government should forthwith introduce and promote a Bill to authorize and empower the several towns of the county of Tipperary to elect and return one Member, and the several towns of the county of Sligo, in conjunction with the seaport towns of Ballina and Westport, to elect and return one other Member to the Imperial Parliament," said, that in England the principle pursued in giving representation was that large centres of population in the manufacturing districts should be fully represented; but Ireland laboured under great disadvantages, and it was necessary to take some steps to resuscitate the manufacturing industry of that country. It was on that ground that he wished to give some addition to the business representation of Tipperary by returning an additional Member, and giving Sligo, Ballinasloe, and Westport another—

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.
TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA).
THE INDIRECT CLAIMS.
MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, it will be in the recollection of your Lordships that this day week I made an appeal to my noble Friend the noble Earl

(Earl Russell) to postpone the Motion which then stood in his name on the Minutes of the House. I did not make that appeal for the third time, as has been generally supposed; I made it for the first time. I think it necessary to say that in justice to my noble Friend, whose previous postponements had been made at no request of mine. At the same time, I gave an assurance to the House that either to-day or before this day I should be prepared to lay Papers on your Lordships' Table, or that, at all events, I would make a statement to your Lordships on the present state and prospects of the negotiations. My Lords, in that statement I wish particularly to avoid all irrelevant matter. I do not mean to touch on the general question of the Washington Treaty, though I may, perhaps, be allowed, after the disparaging language which has been held by some persons with respect to an omission in it, to say that, though I deeply regret and always have regretted that omission, I think it was inevitable. I think the Treaty is a great work, healing with regard to the past, good for the present, and highly advantageous to the interests of both countries in the future. I shall confine myself to a statement of what has passed since the presentation of the Cases in December last; but there is a subject into which I should have been ashamed to go in detail, unless some of my noble Friends had told me it was one of the great causes of that apparent want of confidence in the steadfast course of the Government. That has been manifested to a certain degree in this House. Our Case was presented, and so was the Case of the American Government, in the middle of December. If there was any person guilty of delay in dealing with the American Case it was necessarily myself as connected with the Foreign Office; next, it was the gentlemen charged with drawing up our Case and the duty of answering that of America; and, finally, it was the Cabinet itself. My Lords, I was very ill at the time, and should not have felt it necessary to apologize to your Lordships if, considering that I did not know that this Case was otherwise than a business-like dry document like that presented by ourselves, considering that we had four months to deal with it, and considering I was not aware it was intended by the American Government to publish it—I say that, under all these circumstances, I should not have apologized for not having read the Case until it had been inquired into and reported upon by the very competent persons to whom I have alluded; which in due course would have had to be done before it was necessary for me to take the responsibility of any decision on the matter. As it happened, my Lords, as soon as I was able I read the Case, and I will not describe the feelings with which I read it. I will only say that they were not a specific for the gout. At the introduction of the Indirect Claims I was greatly surprised. I was also greatly annoyed at the chapter relating to the Motives. It appeared to me to be incongruous and out of harmony with those statesmanlike and conciliatory feelings which I believed actuated, and which now at this moment I firmly believe, actuate the Government and the Commissioners of America in the negotiations and the conclusion of the Treaty. My Lords, I had some private correspondence on the subject, and I cannot help expressing my sense of the obligation to a noble and learned Friend behind me for the letters he has written on the subject. About the same time—on the 9th of January—I thought it right, before troubling the Prime Minister with crude opinions in dealing with this case, to possess myself of the views of the eminent man who had consented to act as our own counsel in the case, and I think it will be more interesting if your Lordships will allow me to read the note which he wrote to me in answer to a query I had addressed to him. His note was in these terms—

“30, Portland Place, W., May 5, 1872.

“Dear Lord Granville—The facts as to time (so far as I have to do with them) are as follows:—

“I saw and read the United States ‘Case’ at the very earliest moment at which it was possible for me to do so, and my impression from the first was that it very materially transgressed the limits of the Reference, both by introducing the Indirect Claims and in other respects, and that, in preparing the Counter Case (which was the duty to which my own mind was naturally, in the first instance, directed), it would be necessary for us to separate what was within the province of the Arbitrators from what was beyond their authority.

“The preparation of the British Case had, as you may suppose, been a work of considerable labour and anxiety, especially to Mr. Bernard, on whom (both in this work and in the preparation of the Counter Case afterwards) the principal share of labour devolved, according to the arrangements made by the Government."

My Lords, I take the liberty to interrupt the reading of the note to bear my testimony also to Mr. Bernard, that, though other Members of the High Commission possessed legal attainments, he was eminently fitted to be one of the legal Commissioners whom we appointed. I cannot avoid reminding your Lordships how short a time ago it was since the Government were exposed to certain severe criticisms as to the presentation of a Counter Case, even sub modo. I believe that most of your Lordships are now of opinion that we did well to present the Counter Case in that conditional manner; and I believe that when you read the Counter Case all your Lordships will be of opinion that it is a document not unworthy of the country from which it proceeds. I cannot help saying that while that Counter Case was prepared by the legal Commissioners at Washington, its preparation was aided by the Secretary to the Commissioners, Lord Tenterden, whom I remember the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) recommended to me as one of the three best international lawyers in the country. It was minutely revised by Sir Roundell Palmer and corrected by the Cabinet, comprising most of the persons who have been described as inexperienced, ignorant, and inapt in the drafting of the original Treaty. My Lords, I now resume the reading of Sir Roundell Palmer's letter—

"All concerned, however, had taken their share, and, with four months before us for the next step, and the Christmas holidays approaching, we wanted (and we thought ourselves entitled to take) a little breathing-time. We first met to consider the American 'Case' on the 5th or 6th of January (Mr. Bernard had then just lost a very near relative—in fact, his mother), and it was agreed at that meeting that he should prepare the draft Counter Case, and should distinguish, in doing so, between those matters which were within the Reference and those which were not.

"Down to that time I had not communicated with you on the subject, my original impression being that, although it was clear that the American 'Case' contained important deviations from what I understood as the limits of the Treaty, yet it might possibly be sufficient for us to define our own position when we presented the 'Counter Case.'

"A little further consideration made me very doubtful on this point, and very desirous that the Government should be advised by their Law Officers as to the two questions (1), whether the American 'Case' did (as I considered it to do)

exceed the limits of the Reference agreed upon; and (2), if so, what would be the proper course for the Government to take in order to keep the Reference within its proper limits. It was, I think, natural that you, having intrusted us with the conduct of what I may call the 'defence,' should have looked for some assistance or suggestions from us upon any question of importance arising in the 'Case' upon which Her Majesty's Government might have to form a practical judgment; and you did, in fact, do me the honour, on the 9th or 10th of January, to ask for my opinion on this very subject, to which your own attention had been then already directed; and I, on the 10th of January (at the same time that I requested you to use your influence in favour of such arrangements being made as to the time of my attending at Geneva for the oral arguments as might be most consistent with my other duties), entered into a pretty full explanation in writing of my views of the whole matter; and I have reason to know that you afterwards lost no time in obtaining the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown upon it in the ordinary way.

"I may add that I felt the matter to be one of extreme gravity and importance, and requiring great and careful deliberation as to the proper course of proceeding; but that my own judgment (from the time that it became fully matured on the point) was altogether in favour of the course which the Government actually took.—Believe me ever, my dear Lord Granville, yours faithfully,
"ROUNDSELL PALMER."

My Lords, I may state that when I was in possession of these views, and not until then, I wrote to my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack and to Mr. Gladstone on the subject. A very few days after—namely, on the 18th of January—at the first meeting of the Cabinet, I brought the subject before them for their deliberation. At that meeting we were of opinion that it was impossible for this country to submit those Indirect Claims to arbitration. We have never swerved from that opinion. We have never done or said anything which could weaken our position with regard to that matter. I am really ashamed to go into this matter; but it was settled at that Cabinet meeting that the Lord Chancellor should be requested to again communicate with the Law Officers. On the 25th my noble and learned Friend, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, and myself met Sir Roundell Palmer to consider the best way of preventing illegitimate matter from being brought before the Tribunal at Geneva. On the 30th the matter was virtually settled; and on the 2nd of February a decision was taken, and the terms of the Note which I was to address to General Schenck were settled and approved. My Lords, I can only repeat what I said on the first day of the Session—although you may think it presumptuous in me to do so—namely, that if the thing was to be done over again, notwithstanding all the adverse criticism which has been passed upon it, I should deeply regret if we had taken action in the Case earlier than we did. I believe that, both in substance and appearance, nothing was so much to be deprecated as appearing to act under the impulse of temper or pique, instead of after full and very careful deliberation. My Lords, the letter I wrote to General Schenck was very short. It was courteous in terms—courteous towards the American Government—and it also expressed a strong desire to maintain the Treaty. In short, I think it deserved the description which has been somewhat commented on, but from which I do not shrink—that of a “friendly communication.” In it we went back and used almost exactly the same words which we advised Her Majesty to use in Her Speech from the Throne, with regard to our understanding of the scope of the Treaty with reference to these Indirect Claims. As far as I remember, the only difference between them was, that instead of the word “understanding” we used the word “hold.” That Note was courteously acknowledged by General Schenck, and in due course he communicated to me a despatch from Mr. Fish in reply. That despatch objected to the position held by us, and, adhering to the position which the Government of the United States had taken up, it maintained that the Indirect Claims were matter to go before the Arbitrators. In short, the Government of the United States adhered to the position it had at first taken, and gave reasons at no inordinate length for the views they had put forward. My Lords, to that letter Her Majesty’s Government thought it necessary to make a full and comprehensive reply—we thought it only fair that the Government of the United States should be put in possession of the reasons which had induced us to come to the determination at which we had arrived. Accordingly, my despatch was a long one—an excessively long one. I hope it will not tax your Lordships’ patience to read it; but it would be impossible in the compass of a statement like this for me to give you an accurate and detailed account of the arguments we brought forward. I think it will be sufficient for me to say that in that despatch your Lordships will find a fulfilment of the assurance given to Parliament on the first night of the Session. None of your Lordships can doubt that it had always been our intention that the Indirect Claims should be excluded by the terms of the Treaty. We stated in the despatch that not only had such been our intention, but we had some grounds for supposing that the same had been the intention of the United States; and we stated further—that which has been very much doubted—our opinion that when the case came to be argued it would be found that the Treaty absolutely excludes these Claims. My Lords, I think the next step in the proceedings was the presentation of the Counter Case, without prejudice, in the manner to which I have alluded. That Case is included in the Papers already laid before the House. Next came the despatch of Mr. Fish to General Schenck. I have already apprised the House of its character. In it the Government of the United States still adhered to the position they had taken. It gave an answer to a portion—but a portion only—of the arguments we had advanced, but it left the Case exactly where it was. I am not sorry for this correspondence, because, when you read the case on both sides your Lordships will be the better able to come to an accurate conclusion; but it left the Case exactly where it was, and showed an irreconcilable difference of opinion between the two sides, and did not in any degree further the negotiations. My Lords, I will go a little back. I am sure your Lordships do not think it likely that during these two or three anxious months General Schenck and I held aloof from each other, and were not in frequent communication. We were in constant communication, endeavouring to find a solution honourable and satisfactory to both countries. And here I feel bound to bear testimony to the American Minister that, although he always strenuously supported the views of his Government, as he was bound to do, he has throughout these negotiations evinced an earnest and sincere desire to maintain the Treaty, and prevent any disturbance of the most friendly relations between the two countries. My Lords, as regards these communications, they came to nothing. I made some suggestions to the American Minister; but he seemed to think they were too much of one character, and were not likely to be acceptable to the American Government. He made me a large number of suggestions as to the mode of settling the difficulty. Some of these were obviously of a character perfectly unacceptable to Her Majesty's Government. There were others which, at all events, deserved the careful consideration of the Government: although all on examination failed to meet the exigencies of the case. I am bound to say as to General Schenck, with regard to some of those which were most obviously unacceptable, they generally followed some suggestions which had been made in this country as to the mode of settling these difficulties. For instance, no sooner had it been suggested that we might settle the matter by a trifling payment of £5,000,000 or £6,000,000, or something of that kind, than the very next day General Schenck came to sound me as to whether some arrangement for a small sum might not solve the difficulty. I will now come to the time when, without giving an assurance, I informed your Lordships that Her Majesty's Government had ground for hopes as to a satisfactory settlement of the misunderstanding. The statement to your Lordships arose from a communication made to me I think on the 28th of April—in the first place confidentially, and afterwards officially—by the American Minister. It was a proposal which in several points could not have been accepted by the Government; but it was a proposal which did appear to afford a basis of some satisfactory settlement. The United States proposed that the arrangement could be carried out by an interchange of Notes. Acting on that, we prepared a Note stating our views as to the possible limits within which a settlement could be carried out. That was revised and altered, we wishing nothing but to keep our meaning perfectly clear, while at the same time desiring to propose nothing which the United States might find it difficult to adopt. When we had finally settled that Note—I think it was on the 8th of May—I got a communication from General Schenck in which he informed me that he had received a telegram from Mr. Fish stating that, although the President thought it possibly within his constitutional powers to agree to the Note we had sketched out, yet he thought our Note went beyond what, in his individual capacity, he could accept: he thought it preferable to frame an additional Article to the Treaty, which might effect the object we had in view, and which he might submit to the Senate for their sanction. We found some difficulty in acceding to the proposition to frame a Note on the suggestion of others; but we thought that any question of punctilio would have been perfectly ridiculous, and that if we were able to accomplish our object we ought to do so. The difficulty was great, and it took considerable time. We thought it better that we should clearly and at once show that to which we were willing to consent, and the limits of that consent. That draft Article was sent by me to General Schenck, and was by him transmitted to Mr. Fish, with the declaration that if the United States Government were prepared to adopt such an Article, we on our parts were ready to accept it. I was informed yesterday by General Schenck that he had received a telegram from Mr. Fish, stating that he had submitted that Article to the President, and that it was the intention of the President to submit it to the Senate. I understand that at this moment the Senate are in secret executive Session to consider that Article. My Lords, your Lordships will perceive that it is impossible for me to give your Lordships any assurance of the settlement of this affair, because it is impossible for me to speak of what the action of the Senate may be; but what I understand is that, according to all the rules and practices of the American Constitution, the fact of the President having submitted this proposal to the Senate indicates that he is willing, if the Senate will agree, to carry out the Article. Your Lordships will feel that it would be improper for me to give your Lordships further details at a time when this Article is under the consideration—not of a legislative body like the House of Lords or the House of Commons—but of the Senate, which in its peculiar position becomes a part of the Executive Government for this purpose. My Lords, I cannot but think that our hopes are greatly increased of arriving at a settlement which, I believe, in my heart, will be satisfactory to your Lordships and the country, and which, moreover, I am of opinion will be honourable to the Government of the United States. If we do succeed, Her Majesty's Government will take no credit for the fact of that success. We have been considerably helped by circumstances in the course of these negotiations. I may mention in the first instance the forbearance of this House and also the forbearance of the other House of Parliament. I may further mention that while public opinion has been singularly firm and united, there has been great moderation both in speeches and in the Press with respect to this case; whereas, had another course been pursued great irritation might have been infused into our relations with the United States. I believe that, with some exceptions, the tone has been admirable in this respect. We owe also much to the manner in which the matter has been discussed in the United States. There was, perhaps, not the same temptation to discuss it in open Session of the two Houses there; but they also have shown great forbearance; and it is impossible to have read the newspapers, to have read the declarations, to have read the remarkable letters which we have all read and know of, without feeling that the United States, if they make concessions on this subject, do it from a feeling of fairness and justice, and are actuated by a strong desire to maintain the most cordial and friendly relations, such as ought to exist between two great kindred nations. If I take no credit to the Government or myself, I must, nevertheless, say that this is the first fruits of the Treaty of Washington. I believe from the time of the close of the Rebellion up to the beginning of these negotiations, if any difference had arisen between the two countries, of which one thought there was a question of great injustice to itself, and the other thought it was a question, even if only as a matter of form, of making any concession—I believe the irritation in this country and more especially in America was such that it would have been impossible to make the progress we have now done towards a settlement, which I think will be satisfactory to this country, honourable to the United States, and of great advantage to the best interests of both countries. I have now only to offer my personal thanks to your Lordships on both sides of the House for the indulgence you have extended to me, and I am sure you will allow me to make an appeal to you—that so critical a moment as the present is not the one when we should go into a discussion of this case.

No noble Lord rising to address the House—

EARL GRANVILLE again rose and said: I am sure the House would like to know the course my noble Friend (Earl Russell) proposes to adopt if my noble Friend would be kind enough to state it.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: Before the noble Earl (Earl Russell) rises, perhaps my noble Friend the Foreign Secretary will state how long it is likely to be before he can lay on the Table or state the exact contents of the Supplemental Article which is now the subject of negotiation?

EARL GRANVILLE: I hope the House will not think there is any reluctance on my part to afford information when I say it is impossible for me to answer the Question of my noble Friend. I have put the House in possession of all the facts; but it is impossible for me to state when an answer to our terms will be received from the United States. The Senate will very likely take two or three days to consider the Supplemental Article, but I am unable to give anything like certain information on the point.

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has sat down without giving the House any information as to the course which he will pursue if those Indirect Claims are not withdrawn, and it is under these circumstances that he has appealed to your Lordships against any discussion of this question. Now, in the first place, let me state that I have no doubt whatever my noble Friend has been perfectly sincere in all his endeavours to make a Treaty with the United States which would be honourable to both countries, and that he never intended that such Claims as those that have been put forward by the American Government should have been included in the Treaty signed at Washington. Now, my Lords, I shall not refer to dates anterior to the Treaty of Washington; but I must refer for a few moments to circumstances which occurred in this House on the 12th of June last year, and to what was then stated by a noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Cairns), who, whether as an advocate or a Judge, has had perhaps as much experience, or greater experience, than any other Member of this House, and who, likewise, is second to none in his capacity for judging of the value of the terms of a treaty. The noble and learned Lord, referring to the allegation that these preposterous Claims could have been made under the Treaty negotiated by the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) who succeeded me in the Foreign Office, went on to say he had examined the Protocols and had examined the new Treaty, and he perceived that those same Claims might be set up under the Treaty of Washington. That was an important statement coming from such an authority, and I should have thought that it would have produced a great impression. Treaties have been signed by Plenipotentiaries which have often afterwards been rejected by the Governments in whose name they have been made, and I should have supposed that in the case of such a Treaty as this, taking warning from the statement of the noble and learned Lord, my noble Friend (Earl Granville) would have taken further advice after the debate in this House had concluded, and when he still had it in his power to advise Her Majesty to ratify this Treaty or to refuse to ratify it. He might have asked the United States Minister whether he was right in understanding that the Indirect Claims had disappeared, and would not be brought forward under the Treaty? My noble Friend might have waited to have a distinct declaration on that point; and then possibly he might have been told by the Government of the United States—"You are mistaken in your comprehension of the Treaty; these Indirect Claims are by no means surrendered, and we think we are at liberty to set them up whenever, in pursuance of the Treaty, our Case is presented." My noble Friend did not ask any such question, or express any such doubt. On the other hand, the American Government did not set us at ease by declaring either that the Indirect Claims had disappeared or that they had not. Her Majesty's Government did not enter into negotiations for any Supplemental Articles to be inserted in the Treaty. Nothing of that kind was done on either side; and months elapsed before we heard anything more on the subject. The American Minister having left the House before the speech of my noble Friend was spoken on the 12th of June last, may not have thought it necessary to make any statement in reply to it; but that speech having appeared in print with the correctness which usually characterizes the report of the debates in this House, it is wonderful that the statement of my noble Friend should have received no rectification from the American Government, and that the ratification of the Treaty should have taken place, the whole of the people of England being allowed to continue in the belief that the Indirect Claims had altogether disappeared. It may, indeed, be said with truth, that these Indirect Claims are of a most fantastic character. One of the demands made under this head is that we should be made answerable, and should pay damages to the United States, for the prolongation of the war. There have been many instances of the payment of damages for injury to the commercial marine of a country. General Washington was in correspondence with Lord Grenville under somewhat similar circumstances. General Washington had a notion that a Treaty of Commerce between France and the United States justified the fitting out by those countries of ships to act against the commerce of either belligerents; but Lord Grenville remonstrated, and General Washington, with that fairness and sense of justice for which he was so distinguished, saw he was wrong. Finding that he had misunderstood the meaning of the Treaty of Commerce, and that privateers and armed ships had been fitted out in New York and Boston to act against English commerce, he gave compensation for the injury done. But if it had been said by the Representative of England to the United States—"Under this Treaty you are answerable for the capture of British ships, for the prolongation of the war, and all the expenses of the war from that time must be paid by you"—what would have been the reply? Yet that is the extravagance of the nature of the Claims now put forward by the United States. Another case was that of the injury inflicted on Spanish and Portuguese commerce during another war. In that case it was said—just as I said afterwards—"Produce your evidence, and we will give you compensation for the injury done." Never, I believe, in the history of nations has there been so preposterous a claim put forward, as was put forward by the American Government in their Case presented at the end of December or the beginning of January. Let it now be added—for I do not think it ought to be disguised any longer—that the first demands of the American Government were couched in the most offensive terms personally towards the Ministry of this country. Lord Palmerston was at the head of that Government; I was its Foreign Secretary; and I say that no swindler or pick-pocket ever had worse terms applied to him than those which were applied to us by the American Government. Could anything be more offensive than the conduct of the American Government in making such charges as they did with respect to a matter in which such men as Lord Palmerston, Sir Roundell Palmer, and Sir Thomas Fremantle were concerned? Now, it appears to me that immediately the Government of the United States put forward these Indirect Claims, my noble Friend ought to have made a direct representation to that Government. I think he should have said plainly and directly that the British Government could not go into arbitration on these Claims, and that it would not send any person to appear before the Arbitrators till the Indirect Claims were withdrawn. It appears to me that position ought to have been taken at the time. After the Government had received the American Case, and had perused it and made up their minds on it—after they found that it was in direct contradiction of all my noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs had said in this House, and in direct contradiction of all that had been declared in Her Majesty's Speech to the two Houses of Parliament, they should have said at once—"Unless these Indirect Claims are withdrawn we cannot go into arbitration." But, my Lords, are we sure that such language has been held, even up to this day? We do not know. Up to this day the Government have never condescended to inform Parliament as to what has been going on. This business has all been conducted by what is known as "secret diplomacy." My own opinion is that if the ordinary mode of diplomacy had been adopted in this case, it would not have failed. I believe that if Sir Edward Thornton, who is a most able man, and one who understands perfectly the art of arranging difficulties—I believe that if he had been united with my noble Friend (the Marquess of Ripon), we should have had a Treaty under which these Indirect Claims could not have been made. There is a vast mass of obscure language in this Treaty, and in the Protocols which preceded it. It is said of the Alabama that she "escaped;" and no doubt she did "escape," from Liverpool, but she did not receive her armament until after she had escaped. Afterwards there is a reference to another ship which is said to have "escaped" from the Thames. Now, she was a regular merchant ship, and left the Thames with a regular clearance to go to Bombay, and therefore it cannot be properly said that she "escaped." With respect to this vessel, an extraordinary document has been put forth by the American Government, which has much the character of a work of fiction. I find it stated in the American documents that she ought to have been seized and not having been seized, the British Government is responsible, because her owner, Mr. Wright, was father-in-law to a leading partner in a firm engaged in trade with the Southern Confederacy. What is called the "escape" of this ship is alleged as a charge against the Government of this country. Now, ought we to instruct Sir Roundell Palmer to go before a court of justice and institute proceedings for the seizure of a vessel on such a ground as that? We should have to pay damages if we had adopted such a course. That is a specimen of the alleged misconduct of the English Government in allowing these vessels to "escape." I do not, however, wish to go more fully into this question on the present occasion; but I hope my noble Friend will not allow any unreasonable time to elapse before he informs the House whether this Additional Convention or this Additional Article will be added to the Treaty of Washington. And this I can say, my Lords, that unless those Indirect Claims are positively withdrawn—unless they are withdrawn by a formal act and not by a hint or an evasion, in which the American Government seems to delight—unless by a formal act these Claims are entirely set aside, and "disappear altogether"—to use the phrase employed by my noble Friend last year—unless we are assured that no Representative of Her Majesty shall appear in a room on the table of which those mendacious Claims are lying—I shall certainly renew again and again before the 15th of June the Motion which stands on the Minutes in my name. I believe if my noble Friend had said—"Unless this arrangement is come to, and these Claims are withdrawn, we shall not allow a representative of Her Majesty to appear before the Arbitrators," these Claims would have been withdrawn. The case appears to me to be one between the honour of the Crown of this country and the election of General Grant as President of the United States. For my part, I prefer the honour of Her Majesty—I prefer the honour and reputation of this country—to any prospects of the re-election of General Grant.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I do not rise for the purpose of protracting this debate, partly because I understand there is no Motion before the House, and partly because this does not appear a convenient time to discuss either the merits of the Treaty of Washington or the conduct of the negotiations which preceded that Treaty, and which have followed the misunderstanding that has arisen with reference to its provisions. What I gather, and what I think the House has gathered, from the statement of the noble Earl (Earl Granville) to-night is, that the Cabinet have made a proposal which has the concurrence of the American Executive for a modification of the Treaty, and that that proposal is now under the consideration of the Senate. We are, therefore, in this position—we do not know what reception will be given to the proposition. I apprehend that is a matter on which we are altogether unable to speculate. Interference by either House of Parliament pending negotiations is a very delicate and extreme measure to adopt; but even if we desired to interfere we should be too late for any practical purpose that could be answered by taking such a course. Moreover, we have received from the noble Earl—speaking on behalf of the Government—the strongest possible assurance that the New or Indirect or Consequential Claims, from which all these difficulties have arisen, will not in any form be submitted to Arbitration. We have also the assurance from Her Majesty's Government that they have never swerved from their opinion on this point. Indeed, the statement of the noble Earl is as clear and explicit as could be fairly asked for. In the absence—the necessary absence—of the Papers on which a judgment can be formed, and considering the very limited knowledge we possess of the nature and character of the proposition itself, I do not think it would serve any public purpose to carry this discussion further at present. Everybody in this country, and, I hope, in America also, wishes this matter to be brought to an amicable settlement; but we have a right to utter one word of warning, and to say—"Let us have no more 'understandings.'" We have a right to ask that this new engagement, which is about or likely to be entered into, and which, as I understand, is to supersede and control the former provisions of the Treaty, should be couched in perfectly clear, precise, and unmistakable terms; because if this is not done we shall be exposed to have over again all the trouble and misunderstanding which have caused us so much anxiety.

THE WHITSUNTIDE RECESS.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he had communicated with the noble Earl near him (Earl Russell) and with the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) in reference to the Adjournment of the House, and they agreed with him that it was not desirable to vary the Notice he had already given; and therefore, in accordance with that Notice, he moved the Adjournment of the House to Friday, the 31st instant.

EARL RUSSELL expressed his concurrence in the statement made by the noble Earl, and said, that in giving Notice of his Amendment for the Adjournment of the House to the 24th instant, he did not mean to press it if it should appear that there was no necessity for doing so.

POOR LAW (SCOTLAND)—INSPECTORS.

QUESTION.

MR. M'LAREN inquired, Whether the Lord Advocate's attention has been called to the fact that, the local Poor Law authorities in Stromness having unanimously appointed a woman to be Inspector of the Poor for that parish, the Board of Supervision in Edinburgh cancelled the appointment, although the woman had performed all the duties to the entire satisfaction of the parish for several years previously, in place of her father, who nominally held the office, but from the state of his health could not perform the duties; and, to inquire whether there is any Law disqualifying a woman from being appointed to the office of Poor Law Inspector in such a parish as Stromness?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that he was not in possession of the requisite information, but had sent for it; and, if his hon. Friend would repeat the Question on a future day, he hoped he would be able to answer it.

IMPORTATION OF SHEEP AND CATTLE —ORDER IN COUNCIL, 1871.

QUESTION.

MR. J. B. SMITH (for Mr. JACOB BRIGHT) asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether in consequence of the agricultural Returns, which show a great decrease in sheep and cattle, and the high price of meat resulting therefrom, he will reconsider the Order in Council, of December 20th, 1871, with the view of allowing imported sheep to pass to the inland towns when free from disease; and, whether Prussia might not, in regard to horned cattle, be put in the same position as Spain, Holland, Norway, and Sweden?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that the instructions issued under the Order in question provided for the slaughter at the port of landing of all sheep in case any of the cargo had the foot and mouth disease; and the Government did not feel that they could depart from that Order. A very important deputation, however, which had waited upon him from the Northern towns, had complained of the effect of that Order, stating that it caused a large number of sheep to be slaughtered. He might, in answer to that, observe that the total number of sheep imported had not been diminished by the regulation, for the total import of sheep into great Britain for the first quarter of the year from the Continent was about 123,000, as against 64,000 for the first quarter of last year. It was certainly true that there had been a smaller import into the Northern towns in proportion, than there had been into London; but the reason of that was, that there had been much more disease amongst the sheep which came into the North, for only 6 per cent of the ships which came into London had diseased animals on board, whereas in the case of Hull and several other of the Northern towns, the per-centage was not far from 50. That was owing, he believed, to greater care being taken in London with regard to having ships free from infection, and also with regard to the selection of the animals. It was also stated by the deputation, that the inspection was more severe and stringent in the North than in London, but that, he believed, was not the case, for he had ascertained that the regulations were precisely the same in London and the North. It had further been stated that several sheep had been slaughtered which had not the foot and mouth disease, but were merely footsore. From inquiries that had been made, however, he was satisfied that that statement was without foundation. The Government had been strongly urged to allow sheep to go under proper regulations from the port of landing to inland towns. He thought the regulations for that purpose would be exceedingly difficult; but the Government were prepared to try the experiment whether that import could or could not be permitted. In doing so, however, it would not be surprising if the restrictions placed upon it were onerous; to be safe, they could not be otherwise. But the local authorities of large inland towns would be informed that if they liked to make application for a license for sheep to be taken under those conditions to inland towns, it would be granted. With regard to the second Question put to him, it was impossible for the Government safely to do what was suggested, having the present facts regarding the cattle plague before them.

BROADMOOR ASYLUM—MAINTENANCE OF CRIMINAL LUNATICS.

QUESTION.

MR. WHITE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Why, or on what grounds, he has consented to relieve the Wells Union from the cost of maintenance, at Broadmoor Asylum, of William Bisgrove, sentenced to death for murder, and after such sentence certified to be insane, when he has refused to relieve the ratepayers of Brighton from the burthen of the maintenance at the Broadmoor Asylum of Christiana Edmunds, alike sentenced to death for murder, and who also as in the case of Bisgrove, was subsequently certified to be insane?

MR. BRUCE said, in reply, that the practice was for the Treasury to bear the costs of the maintenance of lunatics under sentence of penal servitude, but not of other persons becoming lunatics. William Bisgrove was, and Christiana Edmunds had never been, under such sentence. Moreover, Christiana Edmunds had relations who were able to pay for her support. The Home Office was not able to compel them to do so—the parochial authorities were able, and he thought they ought to see to it.

INLAND REVENUE—INCOME TAX ON SHOOTINGS.—QUESTION.

MR. MUNTZ asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If any one paying an annual sum for the shooting over another person's property would have a right to deduct Income Tax from such payment?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the rule is, that a person who lets an annual shooting should return the profits he makes on it under Schedule D, and the person who hires the shooting from him has no right to deduct income tax from the payment he made for it.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON—DOMINION OF CANADA.—QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he can explain why the Despatch from Lord Lisgar, which enclosed the Report of the Committee of the Privy Council of the Dominion, expressing the general dissatisfaction which the publication of the Treaty of Washington had produced in Canada, which was received at the Colonial Office on the 30th August, was not answered until the 23rd of November; and, whether between those dates, a period of nearly three months, no communications passed between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the Dominion?

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN: Sir, the Despatch in question was one in answer to Lord Kimberley's Despatch of the 17th June enclosing copies of the Treaty. As nothing could be done until the meeting of the Dominion Parliament in April, it was thought advisable to give time for further consideration of the subject in Canada, and therefore no immediate rejoinder was sent. With regard to the second Question, I would state that as we were anxious not to delay producing the Correspondence, we ascertained by telegraph what Papers the Canadian Government had presented to their Parliament, and we then presented the same Papers, which contain all the essential documents. There are three or four Despatches of minor importance, two of which passed between the dates mentioned by my hon. Friend, and which we have no objection to produce, and also some Correspondence with Prince Edward's Island and Newfoundland.

METROPOLITAN POLICE—STRIKE OF SEAMEN AT SOUTHAMPTON.
QUESTION.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it was proposed to charge the pay and expenses of the one hundred men of the Metropolitan Police Force recently sent to Southampton to preserve order during a strike of Seamen at that Port, to the metropolitan rate-payers; and, if not, out of what fund are such pay and expenses to be discharged?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, that no part of the expenses of sending the metropolitan police to Southampton would be borne by the metropolitan rate-payers. Before they were sent, it was ascertained that they might be spared without inconvenience from the metropolis for a short time, and an assurance was obtained that the whole of the expense would be defrayed by the borough of Southampton.

EAST AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE.
QUESTION.

MR. GILPIN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If the Government have taken any, and what steps, towards carrying out the recommendations of the Committee of last Session on the East African Slave Trade?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, in pursuance of the recommendations of the Committee of last Session on the East African Slave Trade, the Governments of Germany, France, America, and Portugal have been invited to co-operate with Her Majesty's Government in the suppression of the slave traffic; and both the United States and France have expressed their willingness to assist in the work. The German Government expresses sympathy with this object, and has referred the matter to the Hamburg Senate for a Report, as the merchants of that place are chiefly interested in the Zanzibar trade. From Portugal no answer has yet been received.

TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA).
THE INDIRECT CLAIMS.
MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I have foreborne to place upon the Notice Paper for this evening any Notice of my intention to make at half-past 4 o'clock the usual Motion with regard to the Adjournment of the House over the Whitsuntide holidays from fear that, had I done so, it might have been thought the Government were disposed to exercise pressure upon the House with regard to the course which it may think fit to take after it has heard the explanation I am about to make with reference to the Treaty of Washington. For the same reason I shall forbear to make any Motion for the Adjournment in offering that statement to the House, because it is a matter which we shall leave entirely in the hands of the House itself and of individual Members. I shall, therefore, simply appeal to the indulgence of hon. Members to allow me to make a statement in respect of a subject of great and general interest. I may also say that Her Majesty's Government have arrived at a conclusion—the reasons for which I am about to lay before the House—that the time has not yet come for laying Papers in reference to this subject upon the Tables of the two Houses of Parliament. In what I have to say I shall not enter into any controversial or defensive matters. The House has with remarkable and, as we think, most wise—but, certainly, with very signal—forbearance, refrained from discussing a variety of matters with regard to the Treaty of Washington which are admitted to be of general interest, which are collateral to the issue under discussion with the United States, and which may form, either now or at some future time, the subject of detail, and, possibly, of hostile comment. But that forbearance which has been practised on both sides of the House—by the right hon. Gentleman opposite and his Friends, and likewise by those who sit behind me—has relieved the Government from any difficulty which they might have felt had they appeared on the present occasion as parties accused; and, therefore, I hold it to be no part of my duty under these circumstances to perplex the House or load the brief statement which I have to make with reference to matters of that class. I therefore will give a very brief narrative to the House, commencing from the time when Her Majesty's Government, assembled in Cabinet on the 18th of January, took this question into their consideration. I will not refer to the preliminary communications which had passed between my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and the Legal Advisers of the Crown, and afterwards between him and myself, as well as my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor; but I will begin, as I before observed, from the 18th of January, on which day the whole subject raised by the American Case, and by those parts of it which referred to the Indirect Claims in particular, came under the consideration of the Cabinet. On that day we arrived at the conclusion that those Indirect Claims were not within the scope of the Arbitration to which we had agreed, and therefore we felt that it would not be possible for us to be parties to their submission to the Arbitrators at Geneva. On the 3rd of February, as is known to the House, we addressed a friendly communication to the Government of the United States, in which it was stated that according to the holding of Her Majesty's Government those Claims were not included within the limits of the reference, and the purport of that communication—the essential part of it—was made known to Parliament in the Speech from the Throne at the commencement of the Session. These declarations and these opinions formed within the Cabinet have been the basis of the whole of our subsequent proceedings. We have not found it necessary, in a formal manner, to go beyond them, and at no time up to the moment at which I speak have we in the slightest degree receded or departed from them. Now, subsequently to the despatch of the 3rd of February, the House is aware that several communications relating to the general argument had passed between the two Governments, and I will not scruple to state, for the information of the House, the general purport of those communications, and especially as I can undertake to do this in a very few words. The despatch of the 3rd of February did little more than communicate the opinions and the convictions entertained by the British Government, and the despatch of the American Government in reply, which I think was addressed to us on a late day in February, and which was received by us about the 12th or the 14th of March, in like manner did not enter into the argument at large, but it signified the dissent of the President of the United States from the conclusions of the British Government as to the legitimacy of the topic of the Indirect Claims as a portion of the American Claims to be submitted to the Arbitrators at Geneva. In that despatch the President observed that he was in ignorance of the grounds and reasons upon which the opinion of the British Government had been founded, and we, interpreting that expression on the part of the President as a friendly invitation to us to give an explanation of those reasons, considered the despatch which was addressed by Lord Granville on the 20th of March to General Schenck, in which we went into them at length. The heads of our argument were these—We contended that the reference of the Indirect Claims to the Arbitrators at Geneva was not within the Treaty of Washington as it stood; we contended that, separately from the terms of that Treaty, as it was not within its terms so neither had it been within the intention of the parties that those claims should be referred; and, apart from these two contentions, we endeavoured to show that as it was not within the terms of the Treaty nor within the intention of the parties that they should be so referred, so likewise there were considerations, drawn from the reason of the Case considered more at large, which fortified the same conclusion and supported us in the general doctrine that these Indirect Claims formed no part of the subject-matter which we had agreed to refer. Besides these branches of the argument, of which I have given a very rude and small outline, there was a portion of the despatch, or rather a memorandum annexed to it, in which we thought it wise to indicate that these Claims, if they could be entertained at all in principle—and it was the question of principle on which we had really joined issue—were likewise of an amount warranting, and more than warranting, the largest statement that had been made with respect to them, although some of those statements appear to have caused astonishment on the other side of the water. Of course, we did not allow it to be supposed that our objection was based upon a question of amount, although we referred to that point, and gave some evidence from American sources of authority which supported the opinions which we gave utterance to in regard to it. That was on the 20th of March. On the 16th of April Mr. Fish sent an answer in the nature of an argumentative reply to the despatch. With some portions of the argument advanced by us he dealt in detail; with respect to others he was content to state only that, according to the view of the Government of the United States, the whole subject was a fit and proper one to be argued before the Arbitrators at Geneva. The tone of this answer, I am bound to say, was friendly throughout; but on the receipt of it we felt it to be our duty to communicate to Parliament—and we did communicate to Parliament—that, as far as its terms were concerned, it had not afforded to us any opening which would advance a friendly and honourable settlement of this great question. But before the answer was in the hands of the British Government, a new opening had been found. A communication had been made by the Minister of the United States to Lord Granville, which was to the effect that, in the opinion of his Government, there was a method of settlement which, if it were proposed by the Government of Her Majesty, it might be open to the Government of the United States to consider and to accept, and which, in the view of the United States' Government, would be perfectly honourable and satisfactory to both countries. This suggestion of the Minister of the United States contemplated a proceeding not by any new international engagement in the nature of a Treaty, but by correspondence between the two Governments, or by what is commonly called an exchange of Notes. Upon this information we immediately entered on a consideration of the detailed proceedings which might be adopted, and, as was to be expected in the development of those details, various points emerged and came more fully into view as the matter matured which, although there never was a departure on the part of either party from the general basis sketched out by the Minister of the United States, yet, on the whole, tended to give to the contemplated proceeding more of a substantive character than had been in the view of the American Government when it was originally projected and suggested on their part. That being so, upon the 8th of May—that is to say, upon Wednesday last, we learnt, on the direct authority of the American Government, that, in order to meet the views which had been stated on our part, it would be necessary, as they exceeded the powers of the President, that a reference should be made to the Senate, and that that power also should be called in aid, with a view to a satisfactory and complete settlement of the case. This was upon the 8th instant, and the House will recollect that I am now upon a series of communications which have been conducted entirely by telegraph; and that valuable and all important as that instrument is for certain purposes, all who have been concerned in difficult matters of business are very well aware that the conveyance of explanations, of motives, of those shadings of thought and impression which are very often vital to the true comprehension of the matter at issue becomes extremely difficult when that mode of communication is adopted. We were not made precisely aware on the 8th of May of the grounds on which this reference to the Senate would be requisite. The explanations, however, of which we were in possession by the evening of the 9th made it perfectly clear to us; and, as I have stated, it was a project as it had been sketched by the British Government on the basis suggested by General Schenck which rendered the reference necessary. It was at a late hour on Thursday evening—indeed, I believe the withdrawal of Members of the Cabinet from this bench after midnight was noticed by hon. Members of the House—that we proceeded to contemplate the question on that precise point. On the next day—that is to say, on Friday last, acting on the suggestion of the Government of the United States, that they were perfectly willing to deal with the question in this aspect, as a matter requiring the assistance of the Senate, we placed our views in the shape of that which might become an Article, and might be the subject of an International contract between the two countries. This draft, together with a covering letter, was forwarded on Friday evening by my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to the American Minister, and though it was a document, with the covering letter, of some length, it was immediately telegraphed by him to the Government of the United States. It was taken into consideration by that Government on Saturday, and yesterday morning the Minister of the United States was in a condition to inform my noble Friend that that proposition of the British Government, framed as I have stated, was entertained by the President of the United States, and would be submitted by him to the Senate for its approval. Now, let it be understood that, while I have stated the exact and literal truth upon this matter, I am anxious not to overstate anything. The communication between the President and Senate of the United States is a strictly confidential communication. It is entertained by the Senate not in its legislative, but in its executive, capacity, and it is entertained by it not as a public body, but almost, if I may so say, as a portion of the Cabinet of the President pro hac vice, and in what is termed in America a secret Session. Consequently, although in possession of the Senate, the proposition in its terms is at this time a strictly confidential communication. This much, however, we are justified in stating—that the course taken by the President in making known this draft to the Senate distinctly implies his approval, conditional only on the concurrence and approval of the Senate. I may also state that we have no reason to complain of the slightest disposition to delay on the part of the Government of the United States, for this proposal, which was received through the telegraph in America on Saturday, is at this moment that I am now speaking under the consideration of the Senate. Of course, it is not for us to say at what time that consideration will terminate; but we are told that probably in two or three days a decision will be arrived at by the Senate on its general character and import. The Senate, I need hardly remind the House, is the perfectly free deliberative organ of a perfectly free as well as great country. I cannot forestall its judgment. It must be for the House, taking into view the action of the President and the whole facts of the case as furnished by the description I have given, to consider what are the present circumstances and aspects of the negotiation. I hope the House will not think me unreasonable in observing that we have not the same opportunity of communicating confidentially with the Houses of Parliament as the President has with the Senate; and I hope also that I shall not go beyond the bounds of due respect when I express the opinion, not on my own part merely, but on the part of the Government as a whole, that we trust nothing will be said or done to interfere with the perfectly free and dispassionate consideration by the Senate of this great matter, now advanced, as we trust, so near to its maturity. I have said we shall not move the Adjournment of the House for the Recess in any manner which might appear to show a disposition to press our opinion unduly upon the House; but we wish, notwithstanding, to make an appeal to the perfectly free judgment of the House. We feel, and feel deeply, that in these matters it is not only the Executive Governments on both sides of the water that are concerned, but that it is only by concurrent prudence and circumspection on the part of all the great Powers that act for and influence the destinies of free peoples that delicate and difficult negotiations of this kind can be conducted to a happy issue. I will say nothing for ourselves, for I could say nothing beyond that which all men know of every British Government—that under all circumstances they will do their best; but I will venture to say this—that the House of Commons, by its remarkable prudence and self-restraint, has powerfully contributed to a favourable result; and that if that favourable result shall happily be attained, it will in no small degree be due to the wisdom, circumspection, and self-restraint of the body which I have the honour to address. Let me say, also, that we shall not do justice to the case if we do not express the strong sense we entertain of the friendly feeling which has prompted the conduct of the Government of the United States, and which in a degree certainly not less remarkable has actuated that great and free-speaking people. Had this House thought fit, by the exhibition of menaces and threats, by premature declarations of what we would do and would not do in contingencies which had not arrived, to arouse the patriotism and public spirit of that great country beyond the Atlantic into a temper of exasperation, I certainly do not think we should have reached the point at which we now happily stand; and I feel confident that the House which has so long, under circumstances so difficult, and now for a period of very nearly four months, exercised that self-command, will at the moment when already it appears to reap its reward persist in that line of conduct even to the end. I trust, therefore, there will be an opinion that while the free judgment of the House upon the whole proceedings of the Government from first to last must be reserved, and may at any fit time be freely expressed, the position of the question at the present moment, when it is no longer in the hands of those who are responsible to you—when their definite proposal, by which in spirit and in letter they are bound, has passed across the ocean, and is now before the tribunal on which, as far as America is concerned, it depends authoritatively to decide—the position of the question is such that it would not be by the debates of Parliament, if I may presume to say so, that Members of Parliament should desire to exercise an opinion upon their deliberations. I think that, feeling towards the United States the respect which we should desire them to feel towards us, we should be ambitious of signaling in every way our anxiety that not even a semblance of interference by those expressions should pass from among us to appear in any or the slightest degree to derogate from the positive, absolute, and perfect political and moral liberty with which the authorities of America will now arrive, I trust, at a very early conclusion. I take leave again to tender on the part of the Government the expression of our thanks to Parliament for this remarkable forbearance, together with the assurance that we do not misunderstand it—that we do not take it as a compliment, or as implying in the slightest degree anything more than an enlightened regard to the great public interests which are involved in the present issue. For this is, after all, a very great issue, for it is an issue upon a matter which in itself is of very great importance between two of the most powerful and free and energetic nations upon the face of the earth; and great in itself as between them, it is greater yet, because it involves the interests of every other country, and therefore that extraordinary liveliness and movement of mind which we cannot but have witnessed in the Press of the Continent with respect to this diplomatic controversy is easily accounted for when we bear in mind that they know as well as we do that, mutatis mutandis, any other two Powers in the world may at any time stand in the position which England and America now occupy with respect to the principles at issue. But this importance is greatest of all with respect to its bearing on the subject of arbitration, and upon the future interests of the world, for England and America undertook a great responsibility in the face of all other nations, when they attempted to apply, after some recent discouragements, this principle of amicable settlement to a great controversy between two high-spirited nations; and if these two nations succeed in giving effect to what undoubtedly is the desire sincerely entertained, and cordially entertained alike on the one side and on the other, something, I think, will be achieved for the benefit of the cause of peace. If, on the other hand, they should fail, however the case may stand as between the parties, they conjointly will suffer great discredit in the face of all civilized nations; and their failure in this great case of peaceful settlement will be nothing less in our judgment than a misfortune to mankind. It is, therefore, that we earnestly hope that that admirable control of feeling and temper, by which such free scope and such ample advantage have thus far been left to the Government as the trustees of the public interest in their endeavours to bring about a satisfactory settlement of this matter, may still be continued. I have stated in brief terms, but in terms which I hope were not devoid of meaning, the basis on which the proceedings were commenced in the months of January and February last. From that basis we have not departed; from that basis—practicable, as we trust, for the views of the two Governments to be placed in substantial harmony and conciliation—and with that prospect before them, we trust we may make the suggestion to the House—which, undoubtedly for our own sakes, we should have no title whatever to prefer—that they will be contented to wait, for the short time that yet remains, the result, which can hardly be otherwise than decisive; and which I hope it is not too sanguine a temper on my part if I venture to say that there is every probability that we may be enabled to recognize as honourable and satisfactory.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, in the critical state of affairs as regards our relations with the United States of America, and which now has subsisted for five months, I think there have been two duties for Parliament to fulfil. The first was to give fair play to the Government, constituted of whatever party or materials, placed in such a situation—and I may say, without at all binding ourselves to any approbation of the course they have pursued, or as to our ultimate decision, that we have given them that constitutional support which they had a right, I think, in their difficult position to look forward to. Our second part has been at the same time, consistently with that line, to assert the policy with respect to the matters in question on which I believe the great majority of the people of this country are decided. I have, Sir, myself been influenced by these two feelings, and I believe I may say that I represent accurately the feelings of hon. Gentlemen generally on this side of the House. Whatever may be our opinions as to the general policy of the Government in this matter, when once the great embarrassment had occurred we resolved to give them the utmost indulgence so far as the forms of the House and the general conduct of party proceedings are concerned; and at the same time we wished to assert the policy which we think, generally speaking, they ought to have followed. I collect to-night, from the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that he and his Colleagues have prepared a distinct proposition, which has been made to the Government of the United States—that that proposition has been accepted by the President of the United States; and that in order that it may be ultimately adopted as the solution of these difficulties, it is at this moment submitted to the Senate of the United States. That is what I collect generally from the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. That being the case, I cannot for a moment hesitate to express my own opinion—and so far as my opinion can influence others I wish to express it most distinctly—that we are in duty bound to continue that forbearance which we have already shown. It is quite clear from the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that it is utterly impossible for us to give any opinion, under the circumstances in which we now find ourselves, as to the course which Her Majesty's Government have pursued. It is quite clear from the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that there have been perhaps even voluminous despatches, and everyone must feel that our opinion as to the policy of the Government must depend upon the precise language contained in the propositions which they have made to the Government of the United States. Everyone, therefore, must feel that it is totally out of our power, without we were in possession of the precise contents of those authentic documents, to offer an opinion at this moment. At the same time, I must express my hope that these Papers will be placed upon the Table of the House without any unnecessary delay, for when we are in possession of these documents, we shall be able to form an opinion as to the course of Her Majesty's Government. I trust, however, that, whatever difference of opinion as to that course may prevail, only one result will accrue from these labours of Her Majesty's Government and from this forbearance of Parliament—I trust we shall find a settlement of the question which will be satisfactory, not only to the interests of both countries, but which will in every respect satisfy the honour of England. I must again hope there will be no unnecessary delay in the production of these Papers, for until we are in possession of them, we can form no opinion as to the course of Her Majesty's Government; but until then I am clear, under the circumstances detailed by the right hon. Gentleman, that the conduct of Parliament should be—as it has been for a considerable period, one of complete forbearance.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the desire of the Government will be to lay the Papers on the Table at the earliest possible moment. ["The Adjournment!"] I think it would be irregular to propose the Motion for the Adjournment now; but I will propose it, when it comes on in its turn.

ELECTIONS BILL—[BILL 139.]

(*Mr. William Edward Forster, Mr. Secretary
Bruce, The Marquess of Hartington.*)

CONSIDERATION.

Further Proceeding on Consideration of Bill, as amended, resumed.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in proposing to amend the Amendment to the First Schedule, proposed by the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill, by leaving out the words "and certificate," said, his object was to relieve magistrates of the duty sought to be imposed upon them—namely, that of giving to a voter who declared himself unable to read a certificate to that effect. He therefore begged to move to leave out in page 23, line 14, Rule 26 of the First Schedule, the words "and certificate."

Amendment proposed to the Amendment, which was proposed to be made in page 23, line 14, by inserting after the word "Act," the words "or of any voter who produces such a declaration and certificate as hereinafter mentioned that he is unable to read,"—(Mr. William Edward Forster,)—namely, to leave out the words "and certificate." — (Mr. Cross.)

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, that he could not see the necessity of requiring the voter to go before the magistrate at all, for quite sufficient security would, in his opinion, be provided by a declaration before the presiding officer, the same penalties being attached to a false declaration as if it were made before a magistrate. They could determine whether a man could read by making him read, but they could not make a man read who said he was unable; and from what he had heard of Irish witnesses, he did not see that it would be very easy to make an Irishman acknowledge that he could read, if he was determined to declare that he could not. Why was it necessary, moreover, to oblige a man to make two declarations, one before a magistrate and the other at the poll? At present it was hard enough to get electors to go before the revising barrister. Many would lose their votes sooner than do so, and the House might be sure that men would not be readily got to go before a magistrate to make this declaration, because there was an atmosphere of summary conviction about him. They would never get a man to go before a magistrate unless the agent took him there. But in addition to those objections, the voter whom they wanted to protect from influence would first of all have to go with the agent to a magistrate, and then to declare to the Returning Officer, in the hearing of the agent, how he was going to vote, and that was not a good machinery either for getting rid of influence or securing secrecy.

MR. WHARTON said, he could give a very good idea of the considerable additional duty that would be imposed upon magistrates by means of the question at issue, for he was a few years ago Secretary to the Great Yarmouth Commission, and he had to take receipts from every one examined before it. There were 700 witnesses examined, of whom 300 had to make their marks. Now, if between the nomination day and the day of polling the magistrates were to be engaged in giving certificates in such a borough as Great Yarmouth, it would be utterly impossible that the work could be got through.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, the course proposed by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster) would be a very dangerous one in Ireland, because there every agent of a large proprietor was a magistrate. He did not mean to state that anything improper would be done by a magistrate; but where party feeling ran so high, all the voters on the proprietors estate might be taken to a justice of the peace, and for one that could read 40 would declare they could not. That declaration would be made before the agent, the men would then be taken to the presiding officer, and how they would vote could be easily ascertained. He hoped, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman would not persist in his proposal. The right hon. Gentleman's proposal, moreover, would not touch the question of those voters who wished for a little assistance in order to record their votes.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he would remind the House that when last year he brought forward a proposal for the introduction of a system of voting papers, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster) said that they would not have magistrates enough to execute the duties that would be thrown on them. That argument was conclusive against the right hon. Gentleman's own scheme now. The machinery of the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman was so cumbrous that he believed voters would grope about in the dark rather than avail themselves of it. It was, in point of fact, a proposal which would take away with the left hand what was given with the right. The voter would be taken to the polling-booth, and having committed some trumpery inaccuracy in voting, in consequence of the involved nature of the process through which he had to go, would be met at the door of the booth by the right hon. Gentleman's favourite conveyance—the prison van, and taken away to undergo a term of imprisonment. The right hon. Gentleman generally treated his suggestions with suspicion, but still he would offer him another, which if adopted would help him out of his difficulty. It was that in boroughs the polling-places should be the gaol, and that, on the receipt of the writ, every registered elector should be committed to solitary confinement until the return of the writ to the Crown Office.

MR. RYLANDS said, he wished to point out to the hon. and learned Member for Durham (Mr. Wharton) that the presiding officer and the Returning Officer would not, as he seemed to suppose, be one and the same person. Under the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster) it was proposed to make voting as easy in future as it was now, when a man in a state of drunkenness was taken to the poll as a free and independent elector. He (Mr. Rylands), however, looked upon the Ballot as a preventive against such voters recording their votes; and if they wanted by the Bill to be able to coach such men up to the poll, he would be no party to it.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Rylands') argument appeared to be based on the assumption that if an English voter was not able to read, he was ignorant and vicious, but he (Lord John Manners) objected to that assumption. The objection to the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman was not with the view of disfranchisement, but that the machinery would be found in practice to be so difficult and so complicated that in reality the voter would not be able to record his vote. He hoped, therefore, the House would assent to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for South-west Lancashire.

MR. SYNAN said, he must object to the word "certificate" being left out of the Amendment. The magistrates could not obtain information as to the inability of the voter to read, except by means of a declaration; and therefore he ought to have full power to receive and act upon such declarations. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not accept the Amendment.

LORD HENLEY said, there was a grave objection to taking these voters before magistrates. During the cattle plague the same sort of provision existed, and it was found impossible in many districts for two justices to sign the certificates within a given time. He knew a parish that contained a large number of illiterate inhabitants, and he felt convinced that it would be impossible to take the voters first before a magistrate and then to the poll in time for them to record their votes. Not only that, but a magistrate would probably be ignorant of the voters residing out of his own parish, and the certificate, therefore, to be of any value, should be signed by some one residing in the parish where the voter lived—either the clergyman or the churchwarden, and not by a magistrate who would probably reside at a distance.

MR. COLLINS said, the Government proposition would be found to be impracticable without adopting a double conveyance—one to the magistrate and the other to the poll, and on different days, for they would have to make special arrangements for "ticketing the dunces." They would be also obliged to have a separate canvass to ascertain the number likely to require certificates. The hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands) evidently desired to disfranchise what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham once called "the residuum," but the experience of Yarmouth showed that it was not always the most ignorant who were the most corrupt. He would suggest that the most competent persons to give the required certificate would be the certificated schoolmasters. It would not be open to such objection as going before a magistrate, and a man did not like to have thrown in his teeth the statement that he had been before a magistrate, so as to imply a slur that he had been in trouble.

MR. HUNT said, he should like to know from the right hon. Gentleman, what reason he had for supposing that a man who could read would say that he could not?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he hoped hon. Members would excuse his not answering all the observations that had been addressed to the House in the course of the debate that afternoon, and must decline further to treat of them, except to say there was no desire to disfranchise in any part of the House. The Government, in their original proposition, had provided for the case of the illiterate voter; but there was a difference of opinion on that matter; and as it was not a vital point, they had conceded to the wish of many hon. Gentlemen. The question of examination by the magistrate into ability to read was not one on which it was worth while to take a division, though he still thought the proposal of the Government the better plan.

MR. R. TORRENS said, he hoped the Government would adhere to their Amendment, for there had been already too much yielding on important points of the Bill. In South Australia, where universal suffrage existed, a great number of illiterate persons came to the poll to vote; but in that country there was no such provision as that to be provided by this Bill for voters to record their votes, and in practice it had been found to be totally unnecessary. Almost every man who could not read letters was able to read figures up to "nine," and by that means in Australia a man was able to mark the name of the candidate for whom he wished to vote. If necessary colours might be used; and if a man who could not read perfectly was so stupid as not to be able to distinguish colours, it would be no great detriment to him or to the community if he were disfranchised. The presiding officer too, in many instances, was not the man to be entrusted with the power of marking voting papers, for it would give him an opportunity, in many instances, of turning the election. With regard to the proposed Amendments of the Government, he thought it would be impossible to take the number of declarations that would have to be made in the progress of an election.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, that in each of the four colonies of Australia, according to the Reports of the Governors, provision was made for illiterate voters. The hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands), and those who acted with him, evidently wanted to disfranchise as many voters as they could. Why was it the Christians were to be obliged to make all those declarations, and the Jews were relieved from the obligation? How was the Jewish voter to be identified? Surely the order of things had been changed, and the Christian must now say that "Sufferance is the badge of all our tribe." He hoped his hon. and learned Friend would persevere with his Amendment.

MR. GREGORY said, he would suggest that the word "certificate" be left out altogether.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he was willing to accept the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman, if it was clearly understood that it would not preclude their raising the question at a future stage.

DR. BALL said, a certificate would be of use only for the information of the Returning Officer, in case the declaration were made before a magistrate, for if the declaration were made before the Returning Officer the certificate would be useless. But if the Returning Officer's time were to be taken up by receiving these declarations, how was he to discharge his ordinary duties?

MR. EASTWICK said, he thought a very short way might perhaps be found, by which to avoid all the loss of time and inconvenience likely to arise from these certificates and declarations. Why not have a distinct polling-booth, which might be called the "illiterate booth?"

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, he did not think he could persist in putting upon the magistrate the duty of satisfying himself by examination that the voter was unable to read. It seemed however, to be necessary that the magistrate, or whoever it was before whom the declaration might be taken, should give a certificate that the declaration had been made. But to retain the words of the Amendment "and certificate" would in effect imply that the magistrate had satisfied himself that the voter was unable to read, and he was therefore prepared to allow the exclusion of the words on the understanding that when he came to his next Amendment he should move the insertion of the words to show that a certified declaration had been made by the voter, in the presence of the person to whom it was given.

Mr. DENISON said, he was unable to accept the decision of the right hon. Gentleman, for he maintained that no certificate was necessary, since the declaration before the presiding officer would be sufficient.

Question, "That the words 'and certificate' stand part of the said proposed Amendment," put, and negatived.

Mr. J. LOWTHER said, he had given Notice of words which he believed would meet a wish very generally expressed by the House—namely, that all voters, Jew or Gentile, should be placed on an equal footing. If the opinion, however, should be in favour of the proposal of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt), he would not press his Amendment. He only wished it to be distinctly understood that the words he proposed were a protest against any other authority than that of the presiding officer being brought into requisition. He moved that the words "or who states to the presiding officer" be inserted.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, in page 23, line 14, after the word "mentioned," to insert the words "or who states to the presiding officer."—(Mr. James Lowther.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Mr. VERNON HARCOURT said, he hoped the words would not be pressed. If they were, he should vote against them. He thought there ought to be a recorded statement which might be marked, and that would take no more time than the verification of a declaration made before a magistrate.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, he thought it was the opinion of the House that there ought to be an actual declaration. If so, it was also of very great importance that the whole of these declarations should be filed. The presiding officer, therefore, would in every case enclose them to the Returning Officer, who would forward them to the Clerk of the Crown.

Mr. HUNT observed that the Amendment would not only place Jew and Gentile on a par, but it would place the Jew on a par with himself; for if a Jew who could not read voted on Saturday, he might vote without a declaration, whereas, if he voted on the Monday he must make a declaration.

Mr. HENLEY said, he was of opinion there should be no declaration except before the presiding officer. There was nothing more uncertain in description than a person's being able to read; but the presiding officer could at once test the fact by asking the voter whether he could read the paper he held in his hand.

Amendment to the said proposed Amendment withdrawn.

Original Question, "That the words 'or of any voter who produces such a declaration as hereinafter mentioned that he is unable to read' be inserted after the word 'Act,' in page 23, line 14," put, and agreed to.

Mr. ASSHETON said, he thought the clause in its present shape would put in jeopardy two of the main conditions of a satisfactory election—that every elector when he voted should be certain that his vote was given to the proper candidate, and that the conduct of the Returning Officer should be above suspicion. As long as votes were given by blind and illiterate people, great distrust would be felt of the conduct of the presiding officer, especially when the majority at an election was not large; and he proposed to cure this defect in the Bill by proposing that the declaration of the voter should be made in the presence of the agents of the candidates, and not in a hole-and-corner way to the presiding officer. He therefore moved to insert in page 23, line 14, after "shall," the words "in the presence of the agents of the candidates."

Amendment proposed, in page 23, line 14, after the word "shall," to insert the words "in the presence of the agents of the candidates."—(Mr. Assheton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. JAMES said, he felt compelled to support the Amendment. He had protested—in a manner, he had been told, not wanting in earnestness—against the provision permitting the presiding officer to assist illiterate voters; but, now that the provision had been introduced, he desired to see the best arrangements made for carrying it out. Practically, he submitted, it was absolutely necessary to adopt the Amendment. It would, in fact, be unavoidable that the voter should receive the required assistance in the presence of the agents of the candidates, for there would be no separate place where he could get it, and he could not be compelled to speak in a whisper. If the agents were to become aware in that way what candidate the voter favoured, they might also, very properly, be allowed to see that the presiding officer carried out the voter's wishes. Moreover, if there was no check, a serious amount of power would be placed in the hands of the presiding officer. He looked upon the proposed Amendment as an antidote in some measure to the provision against which he had protested.

MR. J. S. HARDY said, that if the House divided he would vote in favour of the Amendment.

MR. SYNAN said, he thought it would be a check upon a dishonest presiding officer if the declaration were made in the presence of the agents and the presiding officer.

MR. DENISON said, that at present they did not trust the presiding officer to record votes without the presence of the agents, and therefore the Amendment would make no change in that respect.

MR. LEATHAM said, he hoped his right hon. Friend would not accept the Amendment, because he believed it would be fatal to the Bill.

MR. HUNT said, he thought that a very important part of the Bill. He did not think that the Returning Officer could retire with the voter; for who was to look after the ballot box and the security of the ballot papers, for which the Returning Officer was responsible? In order to enable illiterate men to vote, he had suggested a resort to colour, and in that way what was felt to be a difficulty could, he thought, be got rid of. But that was rejected; and he, therefore, agreed that it was necessary, if the Government proposal was persisted in, that it should be amended in the form suggested by his hon. Friend the Member for Clitheroe.

MR. WYKEHAM - MARTIN said, that when the Returning Officers and the voters retired together bribery would be as easy as now. And so would coercion. What so easy as to say to a man—"You can't read. Go and vote in the presence of the agents." The whole affair of the voting would then become known. All difficulty in this direction would have been obviated by the adoption of a mechanical contrivance which he had without success recommended to the Committee last year.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, the Bill was one to promote secret voting. The House, however, had been told by the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) that 20 per cent of the voters in Ireland would vote under the declaration that they could not read, and in the presence of the agents; but, if so, the Bill might as well be given up. He should not vote for the Amendment, as he believed it would be far better to employ colours as aids in this matter, and would reserve his vote for that question, which he saw was to come on later.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, there could be no doubt whatever as to the difficulty embraced in the question under discussion. He, however, believed that the proportion of illiterate voters had been greatly exaggerated, and was quickly diminishing. He might remind the House that in every colony but one where the Ballot was in use provision was made for the case of the illiterate voter. He was not much afraid that the presiding officer would misuse his power; but, on the other hand, he could see that it was advisable not to leave him without any check. It was a choice of evils; but the balance was probably in favour of placing a check upon the presiding officer. After a great deal of thought, therefore, he believed it would be better to accept the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Clitheroe.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 160; Noes 59: Majority 101.

Amendment made.

MR. ASSHETON proposed, in line 15, to leave out the word "secretly," for a vote given in the presence of the presiding officer and two other persons could not be said to be given "secretly."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. W. E. FORSTER moved the insertion of words, the object of which was first to secure a list of all voters whose votes were marked in pursuance of this rule, and the reason why they were so marked. Then came the question of the declaration; and his amended Amendment would provide that the declaration of inability to read should be made by the voter before a justice of the peace, who should attest it in a form hereinafter mentioned, which would include a statement by the magistrate that the declaration was made in his presence.

Amendment proposed,

In page 23, line 16, to leave out from the words "Provided further," to the words "returning officer," in line 23, both inclusive, in order to insert the words "and the name and number on the register of voters of every voter whose vote is marked in pursuance of this rule, and the reason why it is so marked, shall be entered on a list, in this Act called 'the list of votes marked by the presiding officer.'"

The said declaration, in this Act referred to as 'the declaration of inability to read,' shall be made by the voter after the expiration of the time during which candidates can be nominated, before a justice of the peace, who shall attest it in the form hereinafter mentioned, and no fee or other payment shall be charged in respect of such declaration or certificate, and the said declaration shall be given to the presiding officer at the time of voting."—(Mr. William Edward Forster.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Schedule."

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, the Amendment raised the question whether the declaration should be made before the magistrate or presiding officer? It had been already agreed that the presiding officer should mark the vote; and if he was to be trusted to do that, was he not a fit man to receive the declaration? The Amendment of which he had given Notice, and which he now moved, would enable the presiding officer to take the declaration of the illiterate voter at the polling station.

Question put, and negatived.

Question proposed, "That the words

'And the name and number on the register of voters of every voter whose vote is marked in pursuance of this rule, and the reason why it is so marked, shall be entered on a list, in this Act called 'the list of votes marked by the presiding officer.'

The said declaration, in this Act referred to as 'the declaration of inability to read,' shall be made by the voter after the expiration of the time during which candidates can be nominated, before a justice of the peace, who shall attest it in the form hereinafter mentioned, and no fee or other payment shall be charged in respect of such declaration or certificate, and the said declaration shall be given to the presiding officer at the time of voting,'

be there inserted."

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment,

After the word "voter," in line 6 of the said proposed Amendment, to insert the words "shall be made at the polling station before the presiding officer in the manner hereinafter provided."—(Mr. Vernon Harcourt.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. R. TORRENS said, he hoped that the Government would not accept the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt), as the intervention of a magistrate in taking the declaration of the illiterate voter would be a safeguard against corrupt practices on the part of the presiding officer.

MR. SYNAN said, he objected to the Amendment, on the ground that the illiterate voter would rather make the declaration of his ignorance before a magistrate than before the presiding officer; and also because the magistrate would be less likely than the presiding officer to receive such a declaration on insufficient grounds. He also thought the illiterate voter was much more likely to be known to the magistrate of his locality than to the presiding officer; and, moreover, it would greatly delay the polling if the latter had not only to take the votes, but also to receive those declarations.

MR. MONK said, he thought that it was of very little importance what became of the Amendment, or what became of the Bill; whether it passed that House, or whether it ever returned from the other one. He had always been a warm supporter of the Ballot, but the Government had now given up the whole principle of secret voting, and nothing that remained in the Bill was worth contesting about.

MR. RYLANDS trusted that the Government would not accede to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Harcourt).

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he thought the balance of argument was decidedly in favour of the proposition as he had first made it. They ought to guard against the danger, which he thought was exaggerated, but which without doubt existed—that the voter who was most likely to be bribed and intimidated would be brought up under cover of being unable to read, and made to vote under pressure. The declaration before a magistrate was likely to be a more effectual check upon that than a mere statement made in the polling-booth. Therefore, if the hon. Member (Mr. Harcourt) pushed his Amendment to a division, he should be compelled to vote against it. With regard to the fears of the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk), he believed they were exaggerated; and if the evils which he dreaded were found really to arise, something would probably soon be done to correct them.

MR. CHARLEY said, he was afraid the result of the clause, whether they adopted one kind of cumbrous machinery or another, would be that the illiterate voter would be disfranchised.

DR. BALL said, he thought the House was under a delusion—and more especially with regard to Ireland—as to the amount of exertion the illiterate voter would make, if they thought he would search for a magistrate before the day of election to enable himself to vote. It would also be very difficult in Ireland to get a magistrate to remain in the booth all day during the polling. Then, again, the penalty on making a false declaration would be the same, whether it was made before the magistrate or before the presiding officer. The illiterate voters would not only complain of the additional labour that would be imposed upon them by requiring them to make a declaration before a magistrate, but they would also expect that the candidates would pay their travelling expenses, an item of election expenditure which in the case of some Irish constituencies had amounted to upwards of £1,000. He thought that the presiding officer might well be trusted to receive the declaration himself.

MR. LEATHAM said, he was glad that a point had been found beyond which the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill would not go. It was important that the mode of making this declaration should be as little onerous as possible. Had his proposal to have coloured voting papers been adopted, all the difficulties that were now started would have been swept away.

MR. HERMON said, he must also urge upon the Government the necessity of permitting the presiding officer to take these declarations, on the ground of the difficulty that would be experienced in finding a magistrate before whom they could be made.

MR. M'LAREN said, he had supported the Government until they had betrayed themselves, and now he thought that the Bill had been so greatly impaired during its passage through that House that many friends of the Ballot were scarcely anxious that it should receive the Royal Assent. The various duties which the measure would impose upon the Returning Officer were very heavy, he having to make out lists of the blind, of those who could not read, and of the Jews, whose consciences would not permit them to vote on Saturdays, besides having to stamp every ballot paper with a secret stamp, and to keep everything generally in order. He was satisfied that the only remedy for the difficulties that had been suggested was that the Government should retrace their steps, and adopt the proposition for having coloured printing on the voting papers.

MR. GORDON said, the Government would find it difficult to retrace their steps on this question; and that being so, the next thing was, how best to carry into effect what had been passed? His own experience had shown him how difficult it was to settle such a question. The Government seemed to have accepted a conclusion, and they must abide by that conclusion. He, however, thought that the presiding officer, who would be a respectable person, might well be trusted to deal with the illiterate voter, without the intervention of a magistrate.

MR. M'MAHON trusted that the Government would resist the Amendment.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 43; Noes 112: Majority 69.

Amendments made to the said proposed Amendment.

Question, "That the words

'And the name and number on the register of voters of every voter whose vote is marked in pursuance of this rule, and the reason why it is so marked, shall be entered on a list, in this Act called 'the list of votes marked by the presiding officer.'

'The said declaration, in this Act referred to as 'the declaration of inability to read,' shall be made by the voter after the expiration of the time during which candidates can be nominated, before a justice of the peace, who shall attest it in the form hereinafter mentioned, and no fee, stamp, or other payment shall be charged in respect of such declaration, and the said declaration shall be given to the presiding officer at the time of voting,'

be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he wished to ask, whether it was now competent for him to move the rejection of the Rule just adopted? If it was not, he should endeavour at a future stage to get rid of it, for it was one of the most mischievous parts of the Bill. Every hon. Member must be convinced that the House had got into inextricable confusion in this matter. Secrecy had been done away with. ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER said, he must remind the hon. Gentleman that he could not on a point of Order enter into a general discussion of the Bill.

MR. MAGUIRE wished to know whether he could move the rejection of the Rule?

MR. SPEAKER in reply, said, that the House was now considering the First Schedule of the Bill, of which this Rule formed part. Had the hon. Gentleman wished to propose the omission of the Schedule, he should have given Notice thereof before the Schedule was entered into; and so, also, had he wished the Rule omitted, he should have intimated his desire before it was entered upon. It was now too late for him to move the omission of the Rule; but he could, if he thought proper, propose the re-committal of the Bill at the third reading for that purpose.

MR. MAGUIRE said, in that case, he intended to move the re-committal of the Bill for the purpose of having this Rule struck out.

MR. HUNT moved, in Rule 43, page 26, line 40, to insert after "law," the words—

"And the returning officer shall deliver the writ with such certificate endorsed to the postmaster of the principal post office of the place of election, or his deputy, and shall take a receipt from the postmaster or his deputy for the same; and such postmaster or his deputy shall forward the same by the first post, under cover, to the Clerk of the Crown, with the words 'Election Writ and Return' endorsed thereon."

He said the Amendment was proposed to enable the writ to go back, if it should be thought desirable, in the same way as it had come, and was desirable for purposes of economy.

Amendment agreed to.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN moved, in page 29, after Rule 61, to insert the following Rule:—

"A presiding officer at a polling station in a county in Ireland need not be a freeholder of the county."

He said, that by the law as it stood at present with regard to county elections in Ireland, every presiding officer must have a freehold of £50 a-year in the county. It was impossible, however, to get a sufficient number of persons so qualified to act, as the remuneration was only two guineas, and the result was that persons not duly qualified were frequently appointed as deputy Returning Officers. It was better to get rid of the qualification.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in moving, in page 36, line 1, to omit the words "as to," and insert "guidance of the voter," said, that by inserting these words at the head of the Schedule it would be shown that the words which followed were intended as directions to the voter, and not as positive enactments. When it was proposed that the voter should make a cross simply, an objection was taken to it; and he stated that if there was any danger that the vote would be lost on that account he would introduce on the Report the words "or other mark." He had been informed, however, that there would be some danger if those words were introduced, and he thought that if the words which he now moved were inserted it would be clear that this was a directing and not an enacting Schedule.

MR. GOLDNEY said, as he understood, the intention of the right hon. Gentleman in making this proposal was that any mark made by the voter—and not a cross simply—should be taken as sufficient indication how he wished to vote, and should be accepted by the Returning Officer. But if such were the case, why not say so in plain words? Since the Amendment was put on the Paper he had taken the trouble to inquire how persons voted at charitable institutions, and he found that while in some cases it was by a tick, in others by a line, it was never by a cross.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, that a man might denote his initials in a flourish, and that it would be unfair to make that a punishable offence.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 35, line 24, after the word "characters," to insert the words "in different colours, to be determined by the returning officer."—(Mr. Charley.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

House resumed.

Bill to be read the third time upon Thursday 30th May, and to be printed. [Bill 160.]

COURT OF CHANCERY (FUNDS) (re-committed) BILL—[BILL 43.]—COMMITTEE. (Mr. Baxter, Mr. Solicitor General, Mr. William Henry Gladstone.)

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Baxter.)

SIR RICHARD BAGGALLAY, in moving that the Order for going into Committee upon the Bill be discharged, and that it be referred to a Select Committee, said, his right hon. Friend the Member for North Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt) had moved for Copies of Correspondence which had passed between Sir William Dunbar and the Lords of the Treasury in reference to this subject. That Correspondence pointed out the numerous difficulties in the way of carrying out the Bill in its present form, and required the most careful consideration. He hoped, therefore, the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill would not press it forward before hon.

Members had had an opportunity of considering that important Correspondence. In moving, as he was about to do, that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee, his object was not to throw any obstacles in its way so as to prevent its passing, but simply to secure the introduction of provisions which would give full protection to the suitors in the Court of Chancery. The Bill dealt with funds amounting to between £60,000,000 and £70,000,000, which had heretofore been taken charge of by an officer of the Court of Chancery, who only owed allegiance to that Court; but it was now proposed to hand over the management of these enormous funds to an officer of the Treasury, and it would be idle to ignore the fact that the design of the Bill was to allow the Treasury to deal with and make a profit out of them. On the 1st of October last year the funds of the Court of Chancery amounted to upwards of £62,000,000, all being invested in Three per Cent Consols and other securities with the exception of £3,000,000, which was in the form of cash, although of the latter sum about £2,500,000 was invested in securities as far as the Court of Chancery was concerned; and in the year ending October 30, 1871, the amount of the funds paid into the Court was close upon £20,000,000, and the amount transferred from the Court was about £18,000,000. These figures would show the magnitude of the interests which it was proposed to deal with. Again, on referring to the Schedule of the Bill he found it was proposed to repeal six or seven Acts of Parliament wholly, and 10 partially. One of the latter was a statute passed in the 36th year of the reign of George III., which contained a very valuable clause, providing that executors or persons having legacies to pay might, when the recipients were persons under age or beyond seas, pay the amount of such legacies into the Court of Chancery, to the credit of the Accountant General, whereupon the money was invested in Three per Cent Consols, and accumulated for the benefit of the legatees. The Bill would repeal so much of that clause as related to the investment of the money. It was true that a clause in the Bill provided for the making of rules for regulating the investment of the funds, and there was a provision under which the Court of Chancery could make an Order for their investment; but under the Act which was to be repealed the Order of the Court was not necessary, and the investment was made immediately on the certificate of the Accountant General, that the money had been paid to his credit. This change in the mode of dealing with the funds might prove very detrimental to the legatees. He gave that as illustrative of the Acts which it had been thought desirable to repeal, and of the necessity for careful consideration of those Acts, and of the consequences of their repeal. It was also proposed that the provisions of the Bill should come into operation soon, and simultaneously, but that would be found impracticable; and it was necessary to consider what clauses should come into operation early, and what should take effect at a later period. Sir William Dunbar, in reply to a letter from the Lords of the Treasury, had mentioned many points in which the scheme of the Bill would fail to work efficiently. The matter was one to which it could not be expected that hon. Members generally had given that amount of attention which would enable them to discuss it in Committee of the Whole House, and he should therefore move that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "The Bill be committed to a Select Committee," — (Sir Richard Baggallay,) — instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL earnestly hoped the hon. and learned Member would not press his Amendment to have the Bill referred to a Select Committee, a course only adopted in special cases, whereas there was nothing special, difficult, or intricate about this Bill to render it necessary to send it upstairs. Originally there were on the Paper two pages of Notices of Amendments to be moved in Committee; but those who gave them had been conferred with, and the result was that the number of Amendments had been reduced to two, the others having been either accepted by the Government and embodied in the Bill as amended, or withdrawn on the receipt of satisfactory explanations from the Government. The two Amendments that were left might very well be disposed of in Committee. Committees appointed by the Law Societies sent in a long list of objections to the original Bill, but the objections of the committees had been met or removed; and the partial repeal of Acts had received careful consideration, both on the part of the Government and of the Law Societies. With regard to the time proposed for inaugurating the change, it was decided that the Long Vacation was the proper time for doing so, and the only question was, whether it should operate from October in this year or October next year. Attention had also been given to the framing of rules, and, although they were not finally settled, they were in a forward state. The supposed difficulty about the Controller General and the audit was provided for by an Amendment, and the other difficulties brought forward would, he believed, disappear if the House were allowed to go into Committee.

MR. SINCLAIR AYTOUN said, he never heard such unsatisfactory reasons for a Bill as those that were adduced by the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury when he moved the second reading of this Bill. He said, indeed, that the reasons for introducing it had been stated last year in the Budget by the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and on reference to Hansard it would be found that the Chancellor of the Exchequer's arguments were, that considerable inconvenience was occasioned to suitors having money in this fund, by reason of the holidays lasting two months, and that the proposed measure might be made a means of reducing the National Debt. It appeared to him (Mr. Aytoun), however, that the alleged inconvenience could have been remedied without altering the mode in which the fund was managed; and it was absurd to suppose that the Bill was promoted with any intention to confer a benefit on the suitor, the real object being to place a large fund at the disposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to carry out the system of Terminable Annuities, to which he confessed he in common with some other hon. Members was entirely opposed. The Secretary to the Treasury had stated on a former occasion, that although this measure might be made a powerful lever for the reduction of the National Debt, the conversion of Stock into Terminable Annuities could not be carried out till another Act was passed; but he (Mr. Aytoun) believed, that was not the case, for by the operation of 29 Vict., c. 5, s. 4, it would be in the power of the Government at once to create Terminable Annuities. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General had stated that under that Act not more than £5,000,000 of Stock could be converted into Terminable Annuities. But on reference to the finance accounts of the year 1870-71, at page 55, he found under date the 31st of March, that a sum of £7,000,000 had been converted. How the Solicitor General could have arrived at the conclusion that only £5,000,000 of Stock could be converted, when £7,000,000 had been converted, he was at a loss to understand. The Solicitor General had informed the House that he had given up two-thirds of his private practice in order to enable him the better to perform the duties of his office; but if they were to judge by the statement he had made upon this subject, the public had not gained much by the generous abandonment of the hon. and learned Gentleman's private practice. He repeated he (Mr. Aytoun) was strongly opposed to the system of reducing the Debt by creating Terminable Annuities, for it only introduced confusion and mystification into the public accounts. He thought the control of that part of finance should be retained in the hands of Parliament, who should determine how much out of the surplus of each year should be disposed of in the reduction of Debt; and in order to show the mystification which prevailed on this subject he might remind the House that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had spoken of the large amount of the National Debt he had reduced; but when asked whether that amount of Debt had been really paid off, the right hon. Gentleman admitted that it was merely turned into Terminable Annuities. The public, therefore, were under a complete misapprehension on the matter when informed that so much Debt had been paid off. Being opposed to that system of mystification, he should support the Motion that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. HUNT said, he would state a further, and he thought a sufficient, reason to those that had been already adduced why the Government should consent to refer the Bill to a Select Committee. It was this—it was proposed to abolish the office of Accountant General of the Court of Chancery, and the gentleman now holding that office was to retire on his full pay. It might, however, be necessary to appoint another officer to discharge partly the same duties as were now discharged by the Accountant General, for he held in his hand a letter of the Controller General, that had not yet been delivered to hon. Members; in which he found that Sir William Dunbar distinctly stated that the appointment of a Second Assistant Controller of Audit would be required. The answer of the Treasury was not yet in type—it was only in manuscript. The Treasury stated that they could not assent to that view. Which was right or which was wrong on that point, he (Mr. Hunt) was unable to say; but it was not a matter which could be settled in that House, and might well be inquired into by a Select Committee. On that ground he was in favour of the Motion for referring the Bill to a Select Committee; and the Bill would be in no worse position if that course were adopted, as its principle had already been agreed to.

MR. BAXTER said, he thought the reason just given for referring the Bill to a Select Committee eminently unsatisfactory. He was not of opinion that a Select Committee would be in a better position than that House to determine whether or not any officer occupying a high position such as the Accountant General would be required. His own impression was that no officer of the kind would be needed, and the Treasury authorities were unanimously of that opinion. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hunt) said that the Bill would be in no worse position by being referred to a Select Committee; but it must be borne in mind that they were now in the middle of May, and that most important Business would have to be discussed on the re-assembling of the House after the holidays; and, therefore, it was desirable that the present measure, which was one of the most valuable Bills ever presented to the House, should now be considered. In reply to the observations of the hon. Member for the Kirkcaldy Burghs, he had to state that the Government could not deal with these funds in the way mentioned without the sanction of an Act of Parliament.

MR. GREGORY said, it was incumbent on the House to discharge its responsibility in that important matter, and not to shift it on the shoulders of a Department of the State. It was a question essentially for the House to settle; and they could not do that until they had had a fair opportunity of discussing the Treasury Minute on the subject.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he should be sorry to delay a measure of that nature, after its principle had been approved by a large majority; but he conceived that sufficient reasons had been stated for referring the Bill to a Select Committee. Very large liabilities were imposed by the Bill on the Consolidated Fund, which was made liable, under certain contingencies, for any deficiencies which might arise in working out the Bill; and he did not like seeing the whole of those large liabilities cast on the Consolidated Fund without a more full examination given to the matter than could possibly be instituted in that House, for there were various matters of great intricacy and detail which a Committee composed of Gentlemen thoroughly experienced, could alone satisfactorily work out. The Bill proposed that the Accountant General should be allowed to retire with a pension. Mr. Russell had been Accountant General for 33 or 34 years, and was well entitled, he understood, to the retiring pension provided by the Bill; but no provision was made for the broker on account of the loss of his office. Previous to 1854 the broker of the Court of Chancery charged 2s. 6d. per cent upon all purchases and sales, out of which 1s. 6d. went to the Accountant General; but when the office of Accountant General was regulated in that year the broker retained 1s. out of the 2s. 6d., and paid the remaining 1s. 6d. to the Suitors' Fee Fund. In 1863 that gentleman died, and his nephew, Mr. Mortimer, was appointed his successor, an arrangement being then made that he should pay over the whole amount of brokerage to the Fund, and should receive a salary of £2,000 a-year. A sum not far short of half that salary went to clerks whom it was necessary to engage to carry out the special duties connected with the purchase and sale of Stock. Since 1868, when the charges of the Court of Chancery were placed on the Votes of Parliament, he had paid the brokerage to the Paymaster General, the average amount during the last few years having been about £10,000 a-year. Last year it was £11,000, leaving a profit to the State of £9,000, which he presumed went to the miscellaneous Revenue of the country. Therefore, as a salaried officer of the Court, Mr. Mortimer by all precedent was entitled to compensation on the abolition of his office. His claim was certainly as strong as that of the Proctors practising in the Ecclesiastical Courts, who were awarded compensation; and he hoped it would be considered by the Government. There were other objections to which he wished to refer; but he would deal with them when the Bill got into Committee. For instance, he observed in the Bill no provision for securing the "effects" of the suitors, which included some valuable property now in the custody of the Bank of England; but he presumed it was intended to provide for their security. If the hon. Gentleman who had moved that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee pressed his Motion to a division he would vote with him.

Mr. Baxter

MR. HINDE PALMER said, he knew of instances in which suitors, on making inquiries, had been astonished to find that their property in Chancery had not been invested at interest. The Bill would provide a remedy for that state of things, and in other respects would act beneficially. He hoped and trusted, therefore, that the Amendment would not be pressed, for it would involve delay, and the Bill appeared carefully drawn, the 18th clause giving the Lord Chancellor power, with the concurrence of the Treasury, to draw up the most complete rules, which would be laid before Parliament for sanction or modification. The measure would give suitors 2 per cent for the money deposited, whereas they had hitherto had no interest, and it would facilitate their obtaining payments, a process which was at present troublesome.

MR. HENLEY said, he was sorry that the Government had not accepted the proposal to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, for by its means, with a strong hand, they intended to constitute themselves trustees of a sum of £60,000,000 of money without the consent of the suitors interested in the money. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General had told the House that this was a large sum of money, and that was true. He had also told the House that the proposition of the Government had satisfied a great many of the suitors, and that was also true; but that was not a reason for objecting to the Motion for referring the whole subject to a Select Committee. In a case of this kind the Government should have only one object in view, and that was to give every security and every satisfaction in their power. But what was the feeling entertained by suitors on the subject? He had spoken to many of them, and the result was this—no one doubted that the ultimate security for the money was sufficient, but very grave doubts were entertained as to whether they could get their money when the Courts which had the making of the orders for the payment said they should receive it. When the Courts ordered the payment of the money hitherto, it was like giving a cheque on bankers. But people did not get their money out of Chancery quickly; and if a delay of a month or two months occurred, that did not make the matter more pleasant. The mode, however, in which the Bill proposed to deal with the property in Chancery was somewhat roundabout, for if a suitor did not get his money, he would have to apply to the Lord Chancellor, and the latter in his turn to the Treasury, which when satisfied, would order the Paymaster General to pay it out of the growing produce of the Consolidated Fund; but these great men could not be moved very quickly, and whether the Court of Chancery and the Accountant General's office, though like another place they were said to be always open, were really so, he was not sure. Moreover, the growing produce of the Consolidated Fund was sometimes anticipated, Deficiency Bills being now and then heard of. There did not, then, appear such a certainty of prompt payment as at present; but if this view was a mistaken one, it would be easy for the Solicitor General to satisfy the Select Committee on the point. If the Bill had been at first sent to a Select Committee, it would by this time have been considered there. As it was, a great deal of soreness had been caused among the suitors by the course of the Government, and that was as bad as cheating them.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that two pages of Amendments had been set down on this Bill, and the Government had satisfied all but two of the Movers of those Amendments. He did not know whether a Select Committee would be more successful in dealing with the details of the Bill. The fact was, that upon this Motion to refer the Bill to a Select Committee the principle of the measure had been again discussed; but hon. Gentlemen ought to show that the objections they made would be more likely to be removed in a Select Committee than in a Committee of that House; and they had really shown nothing of the kind. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henley) said that the Accountant General's office and the Court of Chancery, like another place, were always open; but the very complaint made was, that for three months in the year those places were not open, and that, whatever the emergencies of the suitors, they could not during that time get a shilling of their money, while just before the Long Vacation there was a run upon the office and £300,000 or £400,000 were drawn out. That was the way the present system worked. Then the right hon. Gentleman said something as to the security. What was the security at present? The Accountant General had the absolute disposal of the money of the suitors, and the effect of the Bill was to substitute the whole amount of Stock and the Consolidated Fund for the security of the Accountant General. As to the audit, no doubt when you took a new Department under the Government that was an important question. But was it possible to settle that point in either a Select Committee or a Committee of that House? They had had an Exchequer and Audit Act. Did the House of Commons itself attempt to regulate the audit? No, it delegated the duty to the Treasury, which introduced a system of audit now extended with great advantage to all the Departments except the Army and Navy, into which they were about to be introduced. The Controller and Auditor General were of opinion that a new officer must be appointed. Even if that were so, such an officer, at, say, £1,500 a-year, replacing one whose salary and emoluments amounted to £4,600 a-year, would effect a saving; but he demurred entirely to the statement that such an officer at a high salary was necessary, although it probably might be necessary to increase the staff of inferior officers. The proper course would be to find out in practice what was wanted, and then, no doubt, at the instance of the Treasury, the House would supply what was wanted. Again, it was not to be taken for granted that there should be no audit at all, but merely an examination before payment. Such a system was not equivalent to an examination after payment. With regard to what had been said by the hon. Member for the City of London, as to the gentleman who acted as broker, it would not be advisable to deal with his case in the Bill, but it would be carefully considered and liberally dealt with.

DR. BALL said, he had made no objection to the proposed transfer, and to the proposal that the Government should have the use of this money; but he thought it desirable that the accounts of the Court of Chancery should be kept by officers of the Court, while the Government kept their own account of the money paid over to them. That was the system adopted in the Landed Estates Court in Ireland, and it had worked well, ensuring the greatest certainty and accuracy. The proposal in the Bill, however, would make the Government masters not only of the money, but of the accounts, without any corresponding check upon them; for you could not reach Government officials as officers of the Court of Chancery could be reached by the orders of the Court. In a Select Committee, these points might be fully considered.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, he was not much enamoured of the principle of the Bill, which applied for the public benefit in money as much private property as the hat he held in his hand. But the principle having been adopted, a reference of the Bill to a Select Committee would secure no good which could not equally be gained by discussing the Bill in a Committee of the Whole House.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

Clause 18 (Rules for regulating proceedings).

MR. GREGORY, in moving that the rules under this Bill should be framed, not by the Treasury, but by—

"The Lord Chancellor, with the concurrence of the Master of the Rolls, the Lords Justices of the Court of Appeal in Chancery, and the Vice Chancellors of the Court of Chancery, or any three of them," said, the Amendment he proposed was consistent with all recent analogous legislation—and it was desirable to make it so, because of the extent to which the interests of suitors might be affected, and because the natural guardians of the suitors' rights were the Judges of the Courts of Chancery.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, he trusted the Government would see their way to accept the Amendment. The Court of Chancery in its administrative capacity was the best guardian that could be found, having lost less than £1,000 by fraud and negligence in 150 years. The great objection to the Government scheme was, that it gave to the debtor—the Government, the power of dictating the terms on which their own securities might be enforced; and, further, there was no reason why, in this instance, there should be a departure from the usual practice of allowing rules to be drawn up by the permanent Judges.

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE said, he could not agree with the Amendment as it was drawn, because it would exclude the Treasury from the superintendence and control of the funds; at the same time, however, the object of the Amendment—the greater protection of the suitors by the authority of the Judges, ought to be attained. The Lord Chancellor and the Treasury sometimes had conflicting interests; and that would appear to be the case with reference to deposits. Therefore, he wished "shall" to be substituted for "may" in the deposit clause, so as to make it imperative that in all cases 2 per cent interest should be paid to suitors.

MR. HINDE PALMER said, there was great force in the remarks just made, which the Government ought to consider. The Amendment before the Committee might be inserted in another part of the clause after the words "Lord Chancellor," and it might be provided that the rules should be made by the Lord Chancellor, the Judges, or any three of them with the concurrence of the Treasury.

SIR RICHARD BAGGALLAY said, the suggestion just offered would meet the case.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, it was impossible to accept the Amendment. The Bill simply proposed that certain financial arrangements which ever since the Court of Chancery existed had been left to the Lord Chancellor should remain with him. What was said on the other side was, that in some modern Acts of Parliament relating to legal procedure, the making of rules had been left to the Lord Chancellor and the other Judges. Now, however, they were dealing not with matters of law at all, but simply with the best mode of carrying out a new financial arrangement. It had nothing to do with the office of Judge of the Court of Chancery, and therefore the Judges ought not to be called upon to make regulations on a subject with which they were not familiar. The persons charged with these duties were Ministers of the Crown, who were responsible to the House of Commons; and he might remark that the Judges named in the Amendment could not possibly be as familiarly acquainted as the Treasury and the Lord Chancellor with the working of the Accountant General's Department. There was no ground, moreover, for distrusting the Lord Chancellor, who had had similar duties imposed upon him since the reign of George I. In conclusion, he trusted the Committee would allow the rules to be made by persons who were responsible to that House.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, he thought there was no weight in the Solicitor General's argument against the Amendment, which would give the Lord Chancellor additional strength in protecting the interests of the suitors.

DR. BALL said, he was of opinion that the Lord Chancellor would be glad to have the assistance of one or two Judges, who were brought daily into contact with the minutiae and detail of Chancery practice. He would, moreover, remind the Solicitor General that the Lord Chancellor possessed a jurisdiction more of an appellate than of an originating character, and therefore he approved of the Amendment.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was highly desirable that the rules which were intended to protect the suitors on the one hand and the public on the other, should be framed by persons who were responsible to the House of Commons, and not by Judges who could not be compelled to attend to the expressed wishes of the House.

MR. GREGORY said, he would withdraw his Amendment, and would move another—namely, at page 8, line 9, after the word "Chancellor," to insert—

"With the advice and assistance of the Master of the Rolls, the Lords Justices of the Court of Appeal in Chancery, and the Vice Chancellors of the Court of Chancery, or any two of them."

The Amendment was quite in harmony with the whole tendency of modern legislation, for in matters affecting the interests of the suitors the Judges of the Court of Chancery should have a voice.

Amendment proposed,

In page 8, line 9, after the word "Chancellor," to insert the words "with the advice and assistance of the Master of the Rolls, the Lords Justices of the Court of Appeal in Chancery, and the Vice Chancellors of the Court of Chancery, or any two of them, and."—(Mr. Gregory.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. HENLEY said, he thought it would be most unfortunate if those orders should be so made that they would become the subject of any discussion in that House. They could not forget that the Lord Chancellor was a political as well as a judicial officer; and leaving the rules to be made by two political officers would not be so likely to give satisfaction to the suitors as if an independent judicial authority was joined with them. He could not see what objection the Government could possibly have to the reasonable proposal of his hon. and learned Friend.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman was wholly unsound in principle, and took a false view of the position of Judges to that House. As to the argument just adduced by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Henley), the Lord Chancellor had always possessed the power, and the Government thought it right that he should continue to possess it. How could the Judges give security to suitors? The Judges were not to be made liable; it was the public that were to be liable; and therefore the House of Commons should exercise all control in the public interest. Besides, it must be remembered the proper business of the Judges was to decide causes, and not to take care of funds. In fact, the House had burnt its fingers in former days, having been asked to vote money for the supply of defalcations arising out of Orders imposed by Judges—and quite right too, as it was the business of the House to give security for moneys deposited in public custody pending litigation. On those grounds, the Government could not give way on the question.

SIR RICHARD BAGGALLAY reminded the Committee that the Judges were constantly called upon to exercise a discretion in regard to the investment of those moneys, and that that would continue to be the case after the passing of the Bill.

Question put.

The Committee divided: — Ayes 48; Noes 105: Majority 57.

MR. CRAWFORD wished to know, what was the meaning of that part of the clause which declared that the Lord Chancellor and the Treasury should determine the mode of computing the interest? Were any unusual elements to enter into the calculation?

MR. BAXTER said, he did not understand it, and could not give an answer.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 19 and 20 agreed to.

Clause 21 (Pension to present Accountant General).

MR. DICKINSON moved that the clause, which provided that on the abolition of his office Mr. William Russell, the Accountant General, should retire on his full salary, should be amended by substituting the words "two-thirds" in place of "full."

MR. HUNT said, the Amendment was in accordance with the practice of former years, which was, when an officer retired and was relieved from the whole of his duties, to give him two-thirds of his salary. It was only in cases where sinecure offices were abolished that the full salary was given as a pension. If the clause were passed as it stood, it would be setting a very bad precedent, and it would be utterly impossible to avoid following it in all future cases of a similar character.

MR. CRAWFORD hoped the Government would adhere to the proposition contained in the clause. The office of

Mr. Russell, the Accountant General, had been by no means a sinecure office.

MR. MAGNIAC said, that in making this change for the public benefit, Mr. Russell's claim ought not to be overlooked. The question must depend upon the character of the appointment.

MR. WHITWELL said, he considered that Mr. Russell ought to be satisfied with a pension of two-thirds of his salary.

MR. RYLANDS asked why, in granting this pension, the usual course had been departed from? No cause had been shown for making that change.

MR. MONK said, from what had been stated by the hon. Gentleman the Member for London (Mr. Crawford), this gentleman did not stand on any different footing with regard to pensions from the holders of other offices, and who retired on two-thirds of their salaries.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that 20 years ago, when the Masters in Chancery were abolished, they retired on full salaries. Mr. Russell was at that time a Master in Chancery, and it was considered only fair that that principle should now be applied to him. That was the best answer he could give to the question. Whenever the Government attempted to make reductions, they had to yield their opinions to those expressed by the House.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, it was high time for the House to set its face against paying men the same for doing nothing as they did when they were occupied. They had got a long way from the precedent of 1852. He should support the Amendment.

MR. GREGORY said, he could give a precedent that dated back beyond that referred to by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Twenty years before the period alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman the clerks in Chancery retired on their full salaries.

MR. CHILDERS said, he thought it important that in such cases the House should follow recent precedents. There had been a vast number of abolitions of offices and consequent compensations during the last 10 years, and the Committee ought to be cautious as to the establishment of any new rules which might give rise to new claims. He should like to know, therefore, whether the gentleman who held the office under discussion was absolutely entitled to hold it during the remainder of his life; whether he was able to discharge its duties or not, because in that event he would be entitled to his full salary, while if it were otherwise, he would have no such claim?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the office not being a sinecure, of course, the person holding it could only do so as long as he was able to perform its duties.

MR. DELAHUNTY said, he wished to point out, that whatever decision the Committee arrived at in the present instance would form a precedent for the case of the Irish Accountant General. He, for one, was of opinion that two-thirds of the salary was a sufficient amount to give.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

On Clause 22 (Existing officers of Accountant General).

MR. SALT said, he hoped some change would be made whereby the inconvenience of the Long Vacation would be got rid of. He also hoped some assurance would be given that economy would be practised in the administration of the Office. The individual and aggregate salaries were very large.

MR. BAXTER said, he had great pleasure in being able to inform the hon. Gentleman that eventually there would be a considerable saving in the number and salaries of the clerks. At present, it was not proposed to make any change.

MR. GREGORY reminded the Committee that the clerks had great responsibilities thrown on them, and it was essential that they should be well paid.

IRISH CHURCH ACT AMENDMENT

BILL—[Lords]—[BILL 87.]

(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

MR. NEWDEGATE: Sir, in the absence of my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Greene), I rise to move the Amendment of which he has given Notice, that this Bill be re-committed. I believe some notice was taken on a former occasion of the point to which I wish to call the attention of the House; but from all I can gather of what then took place, I do not think that point was so fairly submitted to the House as it ought to have been. This Bill proposes to alter the substance of the 3rd clause of the Irish Church Act. In that 3rd clause the Commissioners are appointed, who are to administer all the affairs of the Irish Church as disestablished—that is, disestablished in so far as regards its connection with the State—and also disendowed; some portions of its property being thrown into a common fund, which was to be administered by the Commissioners under this section of the Irish Church Act. The powers of those Commissioners are most extensive. They have power to deal with the whole of the property remaining to the Irish Church, and their proceedings are not subject to be checked by any Court whatever. It is expressly stated that their proceedings shall not be removed by certiorari into any other Court; that their decisions shall have the power of acts of the Court of Chancery; and that those decisions shall be absolutely final. These are far more extensive powers than Parliament is wont to confer. The Commissioners were Viscount Monck, Mr. Justice Lawson, one of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland, and my lamented Friend the late Mr. George Alexander Hamilton. Many of us remember him. He was one of the Representatives of the University of Dublin, and a better man than he was I do not know. He was afterwards appointed Secretary to the Treasury, and successive Prime Ministers have testified to his excellence and efficiency as a public officer. When the right hon. Gentleman the present Prime Minister proposed Mr. Hamilton as one of the Commissioners, it was quite evident that he nominated him in addition to Mr. Justice Lawson and Lord Monck, as a person in whom the members of the Irish Church might place implicit confidence. He distinctly stated in this House, that Mr. Hamilton had written to him, to the effect that his consenting to serve on the Commission was not to be taken to imply his acquiescence in the policy of Her Majesty's Government in disestablishing the Irish Church; and in those words, the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister conveyed to this side of the House, who were opposed to it, an assurance that in Mr. Hamilton, there would be one Commissioner, who, if feeling was to have anything to do with the proceedings of the Commission, would be absolutely with the Irish Church. I come now to the Bill before the House. That Bill, instead of allowing the vacancy created in the Commission by the lamented death of Mr. Hamilton to be filled up according to the course prescribed in the Irish Church Act of 1870, proposes to vary the proceedings in relation to the constitution of the Commission; and here I would add, that, although we were aware in 1870 that each of the Commissioners was a member of the Irish Church, as it is still termed in the Act, when the Bill reached the House of Lords, the Archbishop of Canterbury moved the insertion of words, specifying that the persons, who were to be, or who should succeed the Commissioners, appointed under the 3rd clause of the Act, should each be thus qualified—as being a member either of the said Church or of the said United Church—that is, either of the Irish Church or of the United Church of England and Ireland as it existed at that time. That Amendment was accepted without opposition by the House of Lords, and also without question in this House. Well, I do not understand the reasons for it, but it happens that in the present measure that principle is to be departed from. The words proposed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and accepted by Parliament, are to be set aside by this Bill. The Bill proposes that the third Commissionership—that vacated by the death of Mr. Hamilton, should be filled by one of the Irish Judges in certain events—that is, in cases in which there is an appeal from the decision of one of the Commissioners—for the Commissioners are empowered to act singly, but with an appeal from a single Commissioner to the full Bench of Commissioners in contested cases. Therefore, the person who is to be successor to the late Mr. George Alexander Hamilton is to come in and take part as a Commissioner, and share in all the powers of the Commission, the decisions of which are to be final in such contested cases. Now, a single Commissioner may transact the business, which is not contested, in which no serious objection is raised; but by this Bill it is not necessary that the third person, who is to be one of the Judges, and who is to be called on to assist in deciding contested business as the third Commissioner—it is not rendered necessary by this Bill, as it was in the original Act, that he should be a member of the Irish Church. So a Roman Catholic, if the Bill remain unaltered, could dispose of the property of the Protestant Church. I can scarcely think it is the intention of the House to allow this qualification to be dispensed with. I have shown that it will be in the most critical business of this Commission, in cases in which it will be dealing absolutely with the various interests created under the Irish Church Act of 1870, that this third Commissioner will be called in; and I hold that for that very reason, the third Commissioner should have the same qualification as is required of the other two Commissioners, and as was required of all three by the unanimous consent of Parliament in 1870. I have no means of carrying out that intention, except by moving that the Bill be re-committed; and I trust the House will accept the statement I have made as evincing the strong feeling which was entertained of the great importance of the late Mr. Hamilton's qualifications and services when he was appointed to the Commission, a feeling entertained by many others as well as myself. I have now to move that the Bill be re-committed.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the words "Bill be" to the end of the Question, in order to add the word "re-committed,"—(Mr. Newdegate,)—instead thereof.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he trusted the House would not consider it necessary to re-commit the Bill, for the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) was under a misconception when he stated that it was the duty of the Commissioners to administer the affairs of the Disestablished Irish Church. But that was not so. Their duty was to superintend the operation of the transfer of the property of the Irish Church to the State, and to deal with all questions arising out of that transfer, such as the commutation of life interests, and other matters affecting existing incumbents. A further duty of the Commissioners was to take charge of the property of the Disestablished Church until it could be converted into ready money and be disposed of by Parliament. As had been stated the other day in Committee on the Bill, almost all the questions affecting the interests of the incumbents of the Irish Church had been disposed of; and even were that not the case, the introduction of a third Member for a particular purpose would not in the least prejudice their interests. A judicial Member of the Privy Council, as this Judge might be, who might be called upon to act, might, no doubt, be a Roman Catholic, or not a member either of the Disestablished Church or the Church of England; but he would be called upon to take no part whatever in the administrative business of the Commission, but only to act judicially.

JURIES BILL—[BILL 111.]

(Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said he proposed that it should be referred to a Select Committee. He proposed that course because the matters contained in it were of a complicated character, and better to be dealt with in a Select Committee than in a Committee of the Whole House. He might, however, say that his main object in framing the Bill had been to bring in as many men as possible to serve on juries, and thereby to diminish the pressure of the service on each individual. It had, however, been found necessary to deal separately with the City of London, the object in view being to get the same class of persons to serve on common and special juries there as elsewhere. In some cases, disqualifications would be extended. For instance, persons who had been convicted of felony would be no longer qualified to serve on juries; but, on the other hand, many classes now exempted would in future be liable to serve. Clergymen of the various religious denominations would no longer be exempt, and the Bill also proposed that the absolute exemption in favour of Members of the House of Commons should not extend beyond the Sitting of Parliament. ["No, no!"] Of course, it was quite possible that the House of Commons might entertain a different opinion on that point. Then the Bill would reduce the number of jurors, except in cases of murder, from 12 to seven, and in civil cases two out of the seven would be special jurors; but while doing so, it would in no way interfere with coroners' or grand juries. As he should propose to refer the Bill to the consideration of a Select Committee, he would not now enter into its details, but would merely move the second reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

MR. HENLEY said, he must protest against a Bill which proposed such important changes of the law, and which had not been circulated among hon. Members many days, being discussed at so late an hour (12.45 A.M.). The alteration in the number of jurors assigning different numbers to different classes of crimes was quite novel, and in his opinion the House ought not to sanction the principle of the Bill without further consideration.

MR. A. YOUNG said, he must admit that the Bill would introduce important alterations in the jury system, but thought its provisions could be better dealt with by a Select Committee than by the House at large. He could say that in the Australian colony with which he was formerly connected the number of jurors for the trial of civil issues had been reduced from 12 to 4, and that the change had proved beneficial. He was sorry the hon. and learned Gentleman had not thought fit to introduce into the Bill the principle of not requiring complete unanimity in the case of the decisions of juries in civil cases, because the present system was sometimes productive of results which were perfectly absurd.

MR. LOPES hoped the Bill would be read a second time that evening, for otherwise it was doubtful whether it would become law that Session. The question had been frequently discussed by Committees of that House; and the only new proposal was the reduction of jurymen, which, he believed, would give relief to the general body of jurymen without depreciating the tribunal.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN trusted that, in assenting to the second reading, the House would not be considered as pledging itself to the affirmation of the principle of reducing the number of a jury. That principle ought not to be accepted without full discussion.

MR. HOLT said, he would move the adjournment of the debate. The subject was one of great importance, and more time should, in his opinion, be given to consider it.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he could testify to the interest felt by the public in the question, and would entreat the House to read the Bill a second time, in order that it might go before a Select Committee. There would afterwards be ample time to discuss its main provisions.

MR. R. N. FOWLER hoped the Motion for the adjournment of the debate would not be pressed. He wished also to point out that great inconvenience was sometimes experienced in the City of London from the fact that jurymen were summoned to attend at two or even three Courts on the same day. As to the exemption of Members of that House from serving on juries, it would not, he trusted, be taken away.

MR. D. DALRYMPLE said, the qualification for jurors in this Bill was so high that it would throw the work upon a very limited number of persons. He had no objection to see the details of the Bill referred to a Select Committee provided certain constitutional questions which it involved were reserved for the decision of the House.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he thought there would be some difficulty in withholding the constitutional points of the Bill from the consideration of a Committee. He must, moreover, remind hon. Members that they were dealing with one of the fundamental institutions of the country, and would contend that it was not right to shuffle off a measure of such importance to a Select Committee at 1 o'clock in the morning.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Holt,)—put, and negatived.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee.

MR. EYRE, LATE GOVERNOR OF JAMAICA —PAYMENT OF LEGAL EXPENSES.

QUESTIONS.

MR. BOWRING asked the First Lord of the Treasury, with reference to the proposed grant of £4,133 to Ex-Governor Eyre for the payment of his legal expenses, Whether he can inform the House what was the total actual or approximate amount raised by public subscription for the "Eyre Defence and Aid Fund" of 1866-8, and the "Eyre Testimonial Fund" of 1868 respectively, to which allusion is made by the Treasury Solicitor in page 61 of the Papers recently laid before Parliament?

MR. GLADSTONE said, in reply, that he wished it had been in his power to give assistance to his hon. Friend in the investigation of facts of which he very naturally felt an interest; but on reading the Papers to which reference was made in the Question, his hon. Friend would have perceived that the Treasury Solicitor, while he did make reference to the existence of a certain fund, did not imply any knowledge with respect to the amount or particulars of that fund, or the means of ascertaining them. The truth was, that the Government had no such knowledge, and had no means of ascertaining the particulars, COLONEL NORTH asked the right hon. Gentleman, whether the Estimates containing this grant would be brought forward in sufficient time to allow of its being considered?

MR. GLADSTONE replied that care would be taken to bring forward the Miscellaneous Estimates at such a time that the grant might be discussed with advantage.

POST OFFICE—TELEGRAPHS—SUNDAY LABOUR.—QUESTION.

DR. BREWER asked the Postmaster General, If it has been brought to his knowledge that, during the hours of divine service on Sunday the 12th of May, the men employed in putting down the new Telegraph along the old turnpike road from London to the Essex coast were found by the inhabitants to be busily employed in carrying forward their work in the streets of Colchester, attracting a crowd of inquirers, and causing what was deemed a needless desecration of that day?

MR. MONSELL replied that the men were not engaged putting down the new telegraph; but the fact was, that it was necessary on all days and at all times to subject the telegraph lines to certain tests, and the men were engaged in testing the telegraph lines on the day referred to. That work was generally done in the post office; but the post office arrangements at Colchester did not allow of the operations being carried on indoors.

NAVY—GREENWICH PENSIONS— MERCHANT SEAMEN. QUESTION.

LORD CLAUD JOHN HAMILTON asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, How soon, and in what manner, he intends giving practical effect to the hopes held out by him to a recent deputation, that the Admiralty would increase the number of Greenwich Pensions for aged Seamen of the Merchant Service?

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply, said, he hoped soon to introduce a short Bill to compass the object to which the noble Lord's Question alluded, and when the Bill was in the hands of hon. Members it would afford them the best means of seeing how that object was proposed to be carried out.

POST OFFICE — THE POSTMASTER AT THIS HOUSE.—QUESTION.

MR. G. BENTINCK asked the Postmaster General, Whether there is any objection to appointing the Postmaster at the House of Commons to be a distributor of stamps?

MR. MONSELL said, in reply, that after communicating with the Board of Inland Revenue, he had already given directions that that officer should distribute stamps.

THE FENIAN CONVICTS — REPORTED AMNESTY.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, Whether a Telegram that appeared in "The Times" of that day, to the effect that it was the intention of the Government to grant an amnesty to the remaining Fenian convicts, on the occasion of the approaching visit of the Duke of Edinburgh, is correct?

MR. GLADSTONE: No.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON. TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA). THE INDIRECT CLAIMS. STATEMENT OF SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE AT EXETER.—QUESTION.

MR. BOUVERIE: Sir, seeing that he is in his place, I wish to ask the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) a Question of which I have given him Notice. It is stated that the right hon. Baronet the week before last made a speech at Exeter, which was reported in the public journals; and in that speech he is reported to have used the following expressions. Speaking of the Commission at Washington, he said—

"Why their position personally had been one of great delicacy and embarrassment was this—that two questions had been raised: one, the personal question, as to what was the understanding between the Commissioners at all events, and, perhaps, between the two Governments, at the time the Treaty was negotiated; the other, as to the general merits of the question which had been raised in respect to what are called Consequential Damages, or the Indirect Claims. Now, with regard to the personal question, the Commissioners were distinctly responsible for having represented to the Government that they understood a promise to be given that these Claims were not to be put forward and were not to be submitted to arbitration."

The Question which I wish to ask the right hon. Baronet is — first, Whether that is an authentic statement of what fell from him on that occasion; and, secondly, if that be so, what was the understanding with respect to this affair which he mentioned in that speech; what were the circumstances under which it was come to; and with whom was it come to?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, in reply to the Question put to me by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and also to one of similar import of which private Notice has been given me by the hon. Member for North Wilts, I have to say, in the first place, that the quotation referred to is an accurate report of what I said in my speech at Exeter. I thought it right to say what I did upon that occasion, because I had seen an announcement that a despatch of Mr. Fish, dated the 16th of April, had just been published in America, and which was therefore sure to be published in this country, from which those reading it must infer that the Claims for Consequential Damages had been formally presented to the Commissioners at Washington, who had made no objection to them. I thought it right, as one of the Commissioners, instantly to contradict such an assumption, in order to prevent an incorrect impression on the subject getting abroad. I made use of the expressions which have been referred to without any previous consultation with either of my Colleagues or any Member of the Government, in order to state on my own authority that that was not at all the view which I, at least, took of the matter. With regard to the other Question of the right hon. Gentleman, I hope that the right hon. Gentleman, and also the House, will see that I stand in a very delicate position. I was at Washington as an agent of the Government, I was one of the five Commissioners, and I do not think I am entitled to speak on behalf of the other four—I do not think also that I should be justified in going into what occurred at Washington without communication with the Government, and more especially without communicating with my brother Commissioners, and especially with Lord Ripon, who is at present away from town in attendance on Her Majesty, and with whom I have always acted upon the most confidential terms, and between whom and myself there has never been the slightest difference or disagreement. Under those circumstances, I do not think that it would be right on my part to answer the last Question of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. BOUVERIE: Sir, I think I may fairly ask the right hon. Gentleman this further Question—whether the understanding referred to in his speech was immediately communicated to Her Majesty's Government?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I would rather the right hon. Gentleman would give Notice of that Question before I answer it.

MR. BOUVERIE: Then I beg to give Notice that I shall ask it to-morrow.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.
TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA).
THE INDIRECT CLAIMS.
THE SUPPLEMENTAL ARTICLE.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I had hoped that before this the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government would have felt it his duty to make some communication to the House respecting the negotiations relating to the Treaty of Washington; but, as he has not done so, I will make some inquiry of the Government with regard to the state of those negotiations. The House will, I am sure, recollect that on the eve of our adjournment the right hon. Gentleman made a very important and interesting statement to us upon the subject of our negotiations with the United States. I collected myself at that time from the observations of the right hon. Gentleman—at least my own impression was that Her Majesty's Government had made to the Government of the United States a proposition, the object of which was to terminate the difficulties respecting what are called the Indirect Claims that had been preferred by the Government of the United States, and, indeed, virtually to withdraw those Claims from the consideration of the Tribunal at Geneva. I collected also from the right hon. Gentleman's statement—at least, that was my own impression—that the Government of the United States had received in a sympathetic spirit the proposition of Her Majesty's Government, and that the President had agreed to place that proposition in the form of a draft Supplementary Article before the Senate for their consideration and approval. It would, I am sure, have been most interesting to the House and to Parliament generally, if we could have been acquainted before the adjournment with the terms of the Supplementary Article. But it appeared to me that the plea for withholding those terms from us urged by the right hon. Gentleman, was quite irresistible when he told us that the Supplementary Article was to be discussed in the Senate of Washington in Secret Congress, and that it would be looked upon as a violation of confidence if it were made public at that moment in England. I felt myself—and I think my sentiments on the subject must have been generally entertained on both sides of the House—that it was impossible after that statement of the right hon. Gentleman to press for any particulars whatever at the moment. But I must say it was with the greatest mortification that immediately after the adjournment of this House I found that the contents—I may almost say the verbal contents—of that Article were made known in America, and of course by the rapid means of communication that now prevail, they immediately became familiar to every one in this country. The consequence was, that from a delicate feeling of honour—which I trust may never be found wanting in this House—we were prevented from expressing any opinion upon that important document, and we made that great sacrifice for an object of State interest, which was no doubt of great moment, but of the advantage of which we were thus entirely deprived. I make no charge whatever against Her Majesty's Government on this head. I am quite sure that the right hon. Gentleman, opposite, and the Advisers of Her Majesty in general—that any Gentlemen under any circumstances, and from any party who might become Ministers of the Crown—would never trifle with the House of Commons in such a matter. I have no doubt that the statement of the right hon. Gentleman was bond fide in every sense; but, at the same time, I regret that Her Majesty's Government did not take the necessary pains to be better informed upon the matter; and I should like very much to know upon what representations the right hon. Gentleman felt that he was justified in calling upon the House to make so great a sacrifice, and which prevented us from giving our opinion, if we had deemed it necessary to do so, upon this important proposition. We have heard to-day—I know not upon what authority, for I have only just arrived in town—but we have heard from the public prints that the Senate has accepted this Supplemental Article, but with modifications. What I wish to know, in the first place, from the right hon. Gentleman is, whether this is authentic information which we have received—namely, that the Supplemental Article has been approved by the Senate; and, secondly, whether modifications have been introduced into it; and as we are now in possession of the authentic terms of the Supplemental Article, I should further wish to know whether the Ministry will state what are the modifications which have been introduced into that Article; and, whether an opportunity will be given to Parliament before Her Majesty is advised to ratify and sanction this Supplemental Article, in whatever form and with whatever modifications, to express their opinion upon it? That is the principal object that I have in rising, and I had hoped that by some communication to the House by the right hon. Gentleman, it would have been made unnecessary for me to put these questions. But there is one other topic connected with these negotiations upon which the House has a right to obtain some information. The House is aware that by the 5th Article of the Treaty of Washington, within two months of the period when the Counter Case was sent into the Tribunal at Geneva, which was the 15th of April, we were called upon to offer, either in a printed or in a written form, our arguments in favour of our views. Now, that Statement—which is, of course, the most important document that can be placed before the Tribunal at Geneva—cannot be sent in after the 15th of June. I wish to know from the right hon. Gentleman, whether he clearly sees his way in the present state of the negotiations at Washington, so that we may be certain that we shall be able to comply with the Treaty, and in a manner which will not at all injure our rights or the present position we have taken up in reference to some of its stipulations? The House will see at once that if the Supplemental Article is not agreed to by both Governments by the 15th of June and we do not send in our arguments by that time the Treaty will lapse; and if we do send them in before the Supplemental Treaty is agreed to, we send them in to a state of final adjudication, waiving our objections to the Claims for Indirect Damages that have been preferred. The House will, therefore, see the great importance of our being quite correct upon this question. It has been proposed by a rather eminent authority on the other side of the Atlantic that a Joint Note should be presented by both Governments to the Tribunal at Geneva, asking for time and requesting delay; but it appears to me—and I think it may appear to others of greater authority—that it is doubtful whether the Tribunal at Geneva could grant such delay under the terms of the Treaty; and, as far as we can be guided by the conduct of previous Courts of Arbitration, I think that even if they had the power they might decline to exercise it. The House will see, therefore, that it is of great importance that we should have the clearest information from the Government, and I therefore would request the right hon. Gentleman to inform us on this occasion, whether it is in his power to make the House acquainted, in the first place, with the reported modifications proposed by the Government of the United States in the Supplemental Article, and whether, when that Article is in an ultimate and authentic form, we shall have an opportunity of giving an opinion upon it? I would also ask him whether, remembering that after the Supplemental Article has been approved by the Senate—which I will assume for the moment is the fact—it must still be negotiated in the form of a Treaty, and therefore that considerable time must elapse, he can inform us what precautions he has taken that we shall not under the 5th Article of the Treaty of Washington lose the advantages, if there be advantages, in the main Treaty, or be committed, by prematurely sending in our arguments, to those Claims which we have now for so long a time and in so decided a manner objected to?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I will follow the topics to which the right hon. Gentleman has adverted in the order in which he has touched upon them. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the appeal which was made by me to the House of Commons, and by my noble Friend the Foreign Secretary to the other House of Parliament, for a prolongation of the forbearance they have shown in a remarkable degree during the last few months. That appeal was founded upon many considerations of general prudence. I stated that the President of the United States had actually submitted for the consideration of the Senate the Supplemental Article which had been drafted by Her Majesty's Government on a suggestion from the other side, and had been transmitted to America for the consideration of the President. In making that appeal to the House of Commons, undoubtedly the principal motive which was operating upon my mind was not so much the apprehension of what might result from its publication in this country, in the shape of comments either from Parliament or the public—though there are general rules which make it right to reserve the publication of the terms of an Article—as the belief that its premature publication in America might lead to mischief, and might possibly fetter the future proceedings of the authorities there, or at any rate, that it was only due to them to leave the consideration of that matter in their hands. That was the nature of the appeal which I desired to make, and I am not surprised that the right hon. Gentleman should feel some mortification at the fact that, within a very short time after that appeal, an Article very nearly corresponding in terms with the draft which we had transmitted should have been divulged in a manner which, as might have been expected, caused it to find its way immediately to this country. The right hon. Gentleman puts to me a Question on this point of which perhaps I do not fully gather the importance—namely, upon what representations it was that we thought ourselves justified in making our appeal to the House of Commons. Now, as far as general prudence and general policy are concerned, the appeal was not based on representations made to us, but on our own judgment, with which I think Parliament was pleased to concur. The representations of fact which were made to us were the representations which we stated at the time, and which

I believe were perfectly correct—namely, that the submission of this Article for the counsel and advice of the Senate had been made by the President, and that a submission of that kind, as we understood the Constitution of America, was strictly in the nature of a confidential submission. That, I believe, to be entirely accurate. If the right hon. Gentleman asks me how it was, under those circumstances, that this Article, or something nearly resembling it, shortly afterwards became public in America, I am afraid it is a Question which should rather be put in another place, on another side of the water than on this side. It is not for me to blame anyone, or even to venture on a surmise whether that publication was premature, or whether it was owing to individual carelessness or accident, or whatever cause. Such things do happen, I think, from time to time in America, and perhaps in other countries as well; but the House will perceive that it is not a matter for which Her Majesty's Government can be in any degree responsible. The right hon. Gentleman then inquired with respect to the present state of the negotiations, and what I have to say is that we were informed yesterday that the Senate had agreed by a very large majority to the draft Article proposed by Her Majesty's Government, but with certain verbal amendments. I used the word verbal casually—with certain amendments in its terms. Those amendments were not made known to us in a formal, accurate manner, so that we could take any step with regard to them, until to-day. The Cabinet met to consider them this afternoon; but the House will bear in mind that all these questions require very careful consideration. Indeed, they require advice as well as consideration from the Counsel of the Government, and under these circumstances the House will not be surprised when I tell them that what we met to take into consideration an hour and a-half ago we have not yet been able to dispose of, so as to be in a condition to transmit the final expression of our judgment to the American Minister. Under these circumstances, the right hon. Gentleman, therefore, will at once understand that I am not in a position to make any communication to Parliament. Had I been so, I should have been only too happy to do it without waiting for any invitation, even from him.

Mr. Gladstone

The modifications proposed by the Senate have not yet been published in America; they are strictly confidential as between the two Governments, and it would not be for the public interest that we should do anything to remove that seal of confidence until the time comes when it can be done without disadvantage to the interests involved. Then the right hon. Gentleman asks whether time will be given for the consideration of the arrangement by Parliament before the ratification of the Treaty. Now, that is a stage which we have not yet reached, inasmuch as the terms of the Article are under discussion between the two Governments; and I would rather that the right hon. Gentleman should be good enough to put his Question on that subject on Paper, so that I might give him an answer with perfect precision. I have my own ideas upon the matter, and I know that this proposition must be transmitted across the water. Communications are now going on by telegraph; but I would rather not enter into particulars without having the opportunity of obtaining the most precise information from the Foreign Office. The right hon. Gentleman also referred to the argument which may have to be laid by or in behalf of the two Governments before the Arbitration at Geneva by the 15th or 13th of June. Now, I think it would be manifestly premature on our part to make any announcement whatever to Parliament with respect to the steps that are to be taken at Geneva until we are able to conclude the business which we have at present in hand with respect to the Supplemental engagement, for the whole consideration of the question regarding the proceedings at Geneva must evidently depend in a very material degree upon the nature of the determination at which the present negotiations on the Supplemental Article may arrive. It would, I think, be so far from giving information to the House, that it would rather tend to confuse both the House and the mind of the public were we to allow those two matters to be in our own view mixed up together. What I am willing, however, to state to the right hon. Gentleman is, that we are perfectly aware of and have carefully considered the element of time in this matter, and that we shall endeavour to bear in mind our duty to Parliament, as well as our own position, in the steps which we may have to take with respect to it. The right hon. Gentleman has referred to the idea which has been entertained—I may not, perhaps, call it a proposal—that application should be made to the Arbitrators to enlarge the time allowed for consideration in this matter, and he has expressed a doubt as to the powers of the Arbitrators in that respect. Now, it is not necessary for me to enter into the sufficiency or insufficiency of the powers of the Arbitrators to deal with that question, because it is evident that if an enlargement of time were desirable, the necessary powers for procuring it could be effected by agreement between the two Governments. As far as Her Majesty's Government is concerned, it is a matter that might be considered with great promptitude. I am not able to say to what degree that is also the case in America; but the question of time would undoubtedly be treated, as far as we are concerned, with a view to the attainment of the main object which we all desire—that is to say, that no mere question of time ought to be allowed to prevent the attainment of a good which by an enlargement might be made attainable. Until, however, we know—which we do not at present—that we may not be able to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion without an enlargement of time, it would obviously be needless and premature to raise any question upon that subject. I have now answered all the Questions of the right hon. Gentleman as well as I can; but there is this one addition which I wish to make. I have said that we recollected the importance of the element of time with respect to the approach of the date for the proceedings at Geneva. We are still more sensible of its importance with respect to the communications that are now going on, and I think I may very safely venture to say on behalf of my Colleagues and myself, that not a moment will be lost, nor a moment spent, beyond what necessity and prudence absolutely require, in returning our reply to the proposal which has been made on the part of the American Government, so as to make every contribution in our power towards an early arrival at that consummation which both nations, as we are convinced, so earnestly desire.

MR. HORSMAN: In the answer just given by the right hon. Gentleman there was one point which I did not clearly understand—namely, whether the modifications referred to will be submitted to Parliament, and whether Parliament will be allowed to express an opinion upon them before, by the action of the Government, they are finally accepted. The right hon. Gentleman has more than acknowledged, and gracefully acknowledged, that the Government had been treated with great forbearance in this matter. That forbearance, I think, binds the Government to treat the House with some trust and confidence, and considering that neither side has in the slightest degree embarrassed the Government, and that we have shown them every confidence, we may ask them to show us equal confidence, and allow us to see these modifications before they take final action upon them.

MR. GLADSTONE: My right hon. Friend, who I may say has not been one of the least forbearing Members of Parliament with reference to this subject, did not gather with perfect accuracy the answer which I gave to the right hon. Gentleman opposite. The modifications referred to are modifications in an Article which has been proposed by one Government to the other, and which, if adopted, will eventually form the substance and corpus of a Treaty between the two countries. After that Treaty has been signed it will be ratified. With regard to the ratification the right hon. Gentleman opposite put to me a question just now, in answer to which I said that, although I had a view in my own mind upon the subject, I would rather not answer until I had an opportunity of ascertaining with perfect precision and exactness what would be the necessary course in the matter, so that when I did reply I should give an answer which the right hon. Gentleman would be perfectly safe in accepting. My right hon. Friend has put to me the same question in different terms—namely, whether Parliament will have an opportunity of considering these modifications before they are finally settled? The question of my right hon. Friend and that of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) are substantially the same, and I must decline to give an answer until I have an opportunity of seeing the question of the right hon. Gentleman printed in the Paper, which will probably be to-morrow.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) £174,500, Coastguard, Royal Naval Coast Volunteers and Reserves.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK desired to be informed as to the truth of a report that the Naval Reserve was not in that state of efficiency that was supposed, and that there was not a sufficient number of modern guns and gun-carriages provided for their training. He also wished to know, why so large a Coastguard Force was maintained when there were so few seizures?

MR. GOSCHEN said, he could assure his hon. Friend that there were few subjects which had attracted the attention of the Admiralty more seriously than that of the Royal Naval Reserves. Those who had given his hon. Friend information might not have seen the reports made from time to time on that force; but he could assure him that they were inspected rigorously by naval officers, and that the last Report especially gave a most satisfactory account both as to their quality and their general aptitude for duty. Their number was about 13,200. Some of them were in distant parts of the world; but they were all under most stringent obligations to serve. When he first went to the Admiralty, he doubted about the possibility of making this a thoroughly efficient force; but he was now convinced that in the Royal Naval Reserves we had a very valuable auxiliary force. There was an excellent spirit among them. They were sent to drill every year for 28 days. As to the few seizures made by the Coastguard, he thought the fewness of those seizures might be deemed a proof of the efficiency of the Coastguard. The revenue was greatly indebted to them for their vigilance. In time of war they would be a most valuable body.

In reply to Mr. DICKINSON,

MR. GOSCHEN said, the allowance to the men of the Royal Naval Reserves amounted to £10 per man, and was given to them partly in respect of the 28 days' drill, and partly in the shape of a retainer, and to indemnify them against the inconveniences they suffered through not being able to take long voyages without getting leave. If they failed to present themselves at the 28 days' drill they forfeited the retainer.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he thought the Naval Reserve was one of the most valuable forces which they could have. They were the flower of our seamen, and the great majority of them had shown at drill their extreme aptitude for gunnery. It was, therefore, a great mistake to suppose that we did not get the full value of the allowance which was made to those men. He regretted that his hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool (Mr. Graves) was not in his place; but there was one point to which his hon. Friend called attention last year, as to which he wished to ask a question. It was, whether the right hon. Gentleman had taken off the restriction as to height in the Coastguard Service. It did not at all follow because a man was not 5 feet 3 inches or 5 feet 4 inches that he was not a good sailor. Some of the best men on board ship that he had known were only 5 feet 2 inches.

MR. GOSCHEN said, the height had been reduced from 5 feet 5 inches to 5 feet 3 inches, with this additional regulation—that anyone who had been in the Navy might be admitted, provided he was certified to be strong.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK having again expressed some doubts as to the efficiency of the men,

MR. GOSCHEN hoped that the evidence of the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir James Elphinstone), who so seldom agreed with Her Majesty's Government on these matters, would be sufficient for his hon. Friend. Most of the men would be found to be thoroughly efficient. Naval officers, who were exceedingly jealous for the honour of the Service, said that the men were very efficient in drill, and that they were a very valuable body. If a man who was on a long voyage did not attend, it would be pretty certain that he had obtained leave of absence.

LORD HENRY SCOTT asked, whether it was in the contemplation of the Admiralty that some steps should be taken for the proper officering of the Royal Naval Reserve? If any plan was now under consideration he did not wish that an immediate answer should be given; but he thought it well that the right hon. Gentleman's attention should be called to the matter.

MR. GOSCHEN said, the question of officering the Royal Naval Reserve had been, and still was, under the consideration of the Admiralty. It had been pointed out that the present system of officering the Reserve was capable of great improvement, and a plan had been submitted to him to improve it. He had not yet had an opportunity of discussing the subject thoroughly with his official advisers, and he should not like, therefore, to give a sketch of a plan which had not yet been adopted.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £978,983, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of the Dockyards and Naval Yards at Home and Abroad, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1873.”

MR. RYLANDS, in rising to move a reduction of the Vote by £100,000, said, he would remind the Committee that this Vote was intimately connected with Vote 10 for Stores, upon which it was his intention to move a reduction of £150,000, so that the reduction upon both Votes would amount to £250,000. That was a reduction which could be very easily effected if Her Majesty's Government were prepared to carry out those principles of economy upon which the Government was formed. In 1870, the right hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) came down to the House with Navy Estimates which showed a considerable reduction upon those of former years, being no less than £2,000,000 below the Estimates proposed when the Government of the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire was in office. The present Estimates showed a considerable increase on those of 1870-1.

MR. GOSCHEN: But that does not include the Supplementary Estimates of 1870-1.

MR. RYLANDS thought himself perfectly justified in leaving entirely out of view the additional expenditure included in the Supplementary Estimates growing out of the panic on account of the Franco-German War. The Estimates presented by the right hon. Member for Pontefract were not only in the aggregate considerably lower than the Estimates of the present year, but the two Votes to which he was now calling attention were less by £250,000—the Dockyard Vote being less by £100,000, and Vote 10 by about £150,000. His right hon. Friend had been only one year in the office at the time he made a reduction of £2,000,000 on the Estimates of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Corry); but his right hon. Friend had had previous experience as a Member of the Board of Admiralty under a former Administration, and for several years; and while an independent Member of the House, had paid especial attention to naval questions, and had proved at all times his desire for economy, in those respects differing from the present First Lord. In the speech which the right hon. Member for Pontefract made in moving the Navy Estimates in 1870, whilst announcing his intention to make large reductions, he laid down three important principles in naval administration—first, the economical administration of the dockyards, by doing away with a large number of useless and expensive officials, and the limitation of the number of men employed in the dockyards to 11,000; secondly, to limit, as far as possible, the manufacture of stores by the Government, and to go into the open market for their purchase, and thereby to give shipbuilding yards an opportunity for competing for their contracts; and thirdly, to concentrate, as far as practicable, our ships and vessels of war at home, so as to have near our own shores the largest possible force for immediate use if necessary. He regretted that the Government were carried away by the panic of 1870, and induced to come down with Supplementary Estimates, which apparently they had not been able to throw off. The House and the country sympathized with the circumstances that caused the withdrawal of the late First Lord from public life, and it was a public misfortune that he was not carrying out the reforms he enunciated in 1870. The present First Lord had increased the number of men, and if his principle were carried out to the fullest extent, Government would become the manufacturers of everything they required. [Mr. Goschen: No, no!] The right hon. Gentleman would seem to deny that that inference was to be legitimately drawn from what he had stated; but he distinctly argued as a reason for building a larger proportion of tonnage in the Government dockyards, that he could get the work done on more advantageous terms than in private yards, and he said that he thought it best to rely upon their own dockyards for the regular shipbuilding, and to go to the private yards in cases of pressure and emergency. Surely, if these words meant anything they must mean that, in the judgment of the First Lord, the Government should give out contracts only in cases of sudden emergency, and that, as far as possible, the Admiralty should be the manufacturers of all their materials and ships of war. The right hon. Gentleman in accordance with that policy was keeping up the number of men in the dockyards beyond the maximum proposed by his predecessor, and he also advocated the distribution of their vessels all over the world instead of concentrating them for the defence of their shores. In all these respects the First Lord had reversed the policy of his predecessor, and by so doing had reverted to the old ways of waste, extravagance, and inefficiency. In fact, his policy was just the same as that of the right hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Corry), and the speech in which the First Lord moved the Estimates this year might have been appropriately delivered by the Member for Tyrone. So much was this the case that the noble Lord the Member for Chichester (Lord Henry Lennox) congratulated the First Lord of the Admiralty upon having taken a course contrary to that of the right hon. Member for Pontefract. The noble Lord saw that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) was playing the game of those who occupied the front benches opposite. The noble Lord (Lord Henry Lennox) said—

“The number of dockyard men taken in the present year, 12,858, was 1,586 in excess of the number taken by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Childers) in 1870. An economical fever had seized the House of Commons, the result of economical views throughout the country on the eve of a General Election, and the result was a reduction in the dockyards; but before the men who were then sent as emigrants to Canada touched the soil of their new homes they were much wanted in our own dockyards. He was glad that the First Lord had been statesmanlike enough to take warning by the mistake of his predecessor, and play none of those sudden economical pranks with our dockyards, but maintain the men there at the same strength as in the previous year.”—[3 Hansard, ccx. 463.]

He (Mr. Rylands) entirely disputed the assertion of the noble Lord that the men who were sent as emigrants to Canada were much wanted in our dockyards before they reached their new homes. It was only in consequence of the absurd panic of 1870 that any additional men were placed in the dockyards, and he believed that their labour, so far from being wanted, was actually unnecessary and was probably wasted; whilst if any emergency had really existed, the private shipbuilding yards would have supplied everything that the Government were unable to produce. The noble Lord spoke of the reductions in the dockyards as being “economical pranks,” and he (Mr. Rylands) admitted that it was, in his opinion, exceedingly undesirable that there should be any great and sudden change in the number of men. It was undesirable that there should be one year a very large, and the next a much smaller number. There had been instances of that kind. He found that in 1867 the number of men employed in our dockyards was 18,330, while in 1868 that number was suddenly reduced to 15,200. That was a reduction that no doubt created a considerable amount of inconvenience, and must have involved the workmen in difficulty and distress. But who made that sudden change? The right hon. Gentleman opposite the Member for Tyrone. But the policy advocated by the right hon. Member for Pontefract was entirely different. It was not to make sudden changes, employing alternately a larger and a smaller number of men; but to keep down the number to the smallest maximum, and then if additional work were required, to go into the open market and to give orders for any additional vessels that might be wanted beyond those already contracted for. That appeared to him a prudent and sensible course, and he thought the maximum proposed by the right hon. Member for Pontefract ought not to have been exceeded. But the present First Lord was unwilling to remove the men set to work during the period of panic, because he was of opinion that it was undesirable to disturb the number of men they were themselves employing in order to increase the amount of work to be done by contract; and he went on to say that “if they discharged their own men, they would have to pay high prices for building in private yards, where, possibly, the men they had themselves discharged would be engaged in constructing the ships for which enormous prices were being paid." And he further contended that the Government could do the work cheaper because they paid lower wages to the dockyard men, in consequence of their expectation of receiving pensions after a certain length of service and of their regular employment all the year round. But he (Mr. Rylands) altogether questioned the accuracy of the right hon. Gentleman's conclusions, and he challenged him to show that the labour in the Government dockyards would be found cheaper than in private yards. In the public dockyards there had to be paid not only the wages of the men, but a large amount in the shape of establishment charges. He found from the Returns that the total amount of wages for the home dockyards for the present year amounted to £712,571, while the charges for management, superintendence, pensions, and police was £247,795; so that the cost under these heads amounted to a sum of not less than £18 per head per annum upon every man and boy employed in the dockyards. The present Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Shaw-Lefevre), when out of office, used to criticize the conduct of the late Board of Admiralty in permitting so large an amount to be expended on the official establishments connected with the different dockyards, and he should be glad to find that the hon. Gentleman was himself now giving his attention to the subject. A crowd of costly and useless officials was maintained in the dockyards. His hon. Friend the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), when speaking as Secretary for the Admiralty in 1870, made some strong remarks on this subject. He said—

"He had been over all the yards, and, as his right hon. Friend had said, had routed out a great many things that had not seen the light of day for years before. One thing that had struck him particularly was, how amazingly the dockyards were over-manned, having a crowd of accountants, cashiers, storekeepers, master shipwrights, and admiral superintendents. As a man of business, it was impossible for him not to see that all that might be much simplified with benefit to the public. As to responsibility the consequence of having so many of those officers was, that nobody was responsible at all."—[3 Hansard, cxcix. 984.]

The remarks of his hon. Friend the Member for Montrose had been supported in a remarkable manner by the conclusion arrived at by the Royal Commissioners appointed to inquire into the loss of the Mogera. The Royal Commissioners, as the result of their inquiries, report as follows:—

"We feel compelled to add that we have formed, however unwillingly, an unfavourable opinion as to the mode in which the administration of Her Majesty's dockyards is generally conducted. The important work of the survey vessels seems often to have been done in an incomplete and unsatisfactory manner. Officers too often appear to us to have done no more than each of them thought it was absolutely necessary to do; following a blind routine in the discharge of their duties, and acting almost as if it were their main object to avoid responsibility."

Had any steps been taken by the Government to reduce that crowd of officials, and to prevent the want of attention to their duties which, according to the Commission, was displayed by the dockyard officials? Then, as to the wages of the dockyard artificers, the First Lord of the Admiralty said that men were obtained for reduced wages owing to the pensions awarded to them. What was the amount of this saving? Was it 5 per cent? He could, at all events, tell the First Lord what was the loss resulting from this pension list. The amount of pensions paid to discharged artificers this year was not less than £126,154, or nearly 6s. for every 20s. paid in wages to artificers on the establishment.

MR. GOSCHEN said, the hon. Member was taking the present number of artificers in the yards; whereas the pension list represented the accumulated pensions upon very much larger numbers.

MR. RYLANDS replied that all these pensions covered years when smaller as well as larger numbers were employed than were on the establishment now. In order to rebut his (Mr. Rylands') argument, it must be shown that the present number of artificers was much smaller than the average during the past 20 years; but, considering that our Navy Estimates had certainly increased by £4,000,000 or £5,000,000 a-year during that period, he much doubted whether that could be shown; and that being so, he challenged the right hon. Gentleman to show the saving effected in wages in the dockyard establishments as compared with wages in private ship-building yards. But, then, swarms of police were necessary to protect public property in the dockyards. The fact was almost incredible; but in their dockyards at home they paid for police not less than £22,908 a-year, and abroad £8,690. Thus, in order to overlook these 12,000 men in the dockyards, a crowd of officials was employed who seemed to stand in each other's way, and received a just rebuke from a Royal Commission, while the pension system added 5s. or 6s. to every 20s. paid in establishment wages, and over £30,000 a-year was paid for police either to keep the men employed from robbing the public, or to guard the public property from the dangerous population of the dockyard towns. From his business experience, he ventured to say that if any large private undertaking were carried on upon the same principles as our dockyards, the owners would very soon be in The Gazette, and ought to be taken in charge by their friends. He might remind hon. Members that in 1868 an important Select Committee was appointed to inquire into "Admiralty Moneys and Accounts." It was presided over by his hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Seely), and the evidence taken before that Committee demonstrated that the cost of vessels in the public dockyards was much greater than the cost of those built in private yards. That, at all events, was the opinion of the hon. Member for Lincoln, who, in his draft Report, as Chairman, made the assertion, that—

"If the cost of all the iron-clads built in Her Majesty's yards between 1858 and 1865 bears the same proportion to the cost as that of the Achilles to the Black Prince and Warrior, the excess cost of Admiralty built iron-clads during those years has been £1,663,000, on an expenditure of £3,500,000."

And the Report further states, that in several cases the Committee had found the cost of repairs of old ships and old engines had exceeded the price for which new ships and new engines could have been bought. There might be some difference of opinion as to the conclusions at which the hon. Member for Lincoln had arrived; but there could be no doubt that, having regard to the enormous capital invested in the Royal Dockyards, and all the other expenses he had referred to, the working in those dockyards must be more costly than in private yards. The First Lord had told the House that in order to avoid paying enormous prices to private shipbuilders, he was determined to push forward the completion of every vessel but one on the stocks, and to build new ships. What could be the reason for such a course, at a time when not only wages had risen,

but also the price of every material out of which ships were made? Unless the First Lord had bought the materials in advance, and had now got them on hand, it would be a most improvident thing to press forward the building of new tonnage at the present moment. If they kept up a large body of workmen in the dockyards they must find work for them, however high might be the price of materials in the market, and they must press forward the building of vessels which probably might not be required. Another reason for stopping this rash expenditure for new ships was, that there existed great uncertainty as to what was the best ship of war. The Report of the Committee on the Designs of Ships of War was of such an astonishing character that it ought to be well considered before more money was spent on the construction of vessels which might become obsolete in the course of three or four years; and they had the high authority of Armstrong and Whitworth for doubting whether it would be desirable for the future to build armour-plated vessels. It should also be borne in mind that a new power—that of the torpedo—was being brought into operation; and, under these circumstances, it was most unwise for the Government to come down, when labour and materials were dear, and ask the House for money to manufacture new vessels. There could be no justification for the course taken by the First Lord, unless he could show that there were some urgent reasons for preparing means of defence for this country against some threatened danger. But the right hon. Gentleman did not pretend that any further expenditure was necessary for home defence. On the contrary, he expressly said—

"He wished to say in distinct terms that looking to the condition of the navies of other countries, and at the amount of the offensive force of those countries they might be likely to be engaged with, he did not think it would be right to ask Parliament to devote any further large sums at present in strengthening their home defences. They believed that was one of the points on which they were strongest, and on which they need not fear, at present at least, that there was any country that could equal them."—[3 Hansard, ccc. 428-9.]

The right hon. Gentleman further asserted that England was now relatively stronger than ever before, and in comparing our force with that of France, he pointed out that since 1866 there had been additions to our fleet, which had made an enormous difference in favour of this country as compared with France. Under those circumstances, it appeared almost incredible that the Government should be pushing forward the building of new vessels, and incurring an unnecessary and extravagant expenditure, from which no advantage could be derived. But the noble Lord the Member for Chichester (Lord Henry Lennox) deprecated any comparisons with the French Navy, and he urged that—

“We had in this country only to consider what was the proper strength of our Navy for the performance of the various duties so graphically described by the right hon. Gentleman at the close of his speech, and we ought not to enter into a race of building with other Powers.”—[Ibid. 464.]

That was, no doubt, a sound doctrine; but why was it not acted upon in former years? Again and again, successive First Lords had pointed to the extent of the French Navy as a reason for an increase of our own; but, so long as the position of the French Navy could be made use of as an excuse for expenditure in this country, we were never warned against “running a race of building with other Powers.” On the contrary, ex-official Members when on the Opposition side of the House—and probably the noble Lord amongst the rest—made it a constant complaint against the Admiralty of the time being that they were not keeping up in “the race of building” with our dangerous neighbours. But now when France was no longer formidable, and could not possibly for many years to come possess a Navy that would be dangerous to them, and when therefore it might be expected that the opportunity would be taken of reducing their naval expenditure, the noble Lord and other hon. Members jumped up in their places and warned them against making comparisons with France. So long as such comparisons could be used as a justification of expenditure they were prominently urged, but now that they would tend in the direction of economy, they were told to disregard them as being “more than ordinarily fallacious.” He had said that the policy of concentrating ships at home did not find favour with the First Lord, and at that statement the right hon. Gentleman had expressed his dissent by shaking his head. But what other conclusions could be drawn from the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman? He had spoken of the “immense amount of work which was not immediately connected with a war establishment,” and of the “ubiquitous duties to be performed by the Navy of England.” What were those ubiquitous duties? Occasionally there was evidence of some of them in the Civil Service Estimates, when Votes were taken to cover charges of conveying a Bishop on his visitation to the Sandwich Islands, or of entertaining Royal and distinguished personages on board of men-of-war. But it was scarcely necessary to keep up foreign squadrons for purposes such as those. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say—

“If, therefore, we do not build ships for fighting, we shall still have to build them for other purposes; our policy will still be an expensive one, so long as the House resolves to keep up, not for ourselves alone, but for the benefit of the world at large, the police of the seas, and endeavours to stop such practices as the traffic in labourers in the Polynesian Islands, and to check the slave trade on the Coast of Africa; or is always disposed, if we hear of an Englishman or woman stranded or kept on any barbarous island, to send a man-of-war to their relief.”—[Ibid. 460.]

Well, if that were the true policy of the country as propounded by the right hon. Gentleman, he would no doubt find ample excuses for scattering their war vessels on foreign stations; but he (Mr. Rylands) entirely protested against the doctrine that the taxpayers of this country should be burdened to keep up a Navy “not for ourselves alone, but for the benefit of the world at large.” As regarded the operations of their squadrons in aid of benevolent objects, he thought it could be shown that on the Coast of Africa and in China frightful atrocities had been committed by their men-of-war, and he could not suppose that it was in the interest of the Polynesian labourers or of Christian missions that the Rosario should sail round the island of Nukapu, pouring in shot and shell at a distance of 2,000 yards, setting fire to villages, and bringing destruction upon many of the native islanders who were probably innocent, and upon women and children. He should be anxious to know what course the Government intended to take with the captain of the Rosario, in order to prevent such disgraceful occurrences in future? As regarded the “police of the seas,” he considered that that was an International duty; and that any measures for the suppression of piracy where it existed to any serious extent, should be taken by the combined action of the Great Powers, and certainly formed no justification for the great expenditure incurred by the maintenance of foreign squadrons by this country. The right hon. Gentleman had ended by asserting that their Navy was required to protect the commerce of England and carry civilization abroad; but that theory, though accepted before the time of Cobden, had since been universally condemned, even by Ministers at present in office when presiding at the Cobden dinner. Their ships of war were not instrumental in developing commerce. That was brought about by individual enterprise, and by the cheapness of goods.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he had said nothing about developing commerce. He had confined himself exclusively to the protection of their commerce abroad.

MR. RYLANDS contended that his argument was perfectly sound even if restricted to the narrower point. He trusted the Committee would support him in his Motion to reduce the Vote as a mark of its opinion that excessive expenditure should not continue, and that ships which were really not necessary should not be pressed forward at the present high price of labour, and of material. He would move that the Vote be reduced by £100,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £878,983, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of the Dockyards and Naval Yards at Home and Abroad, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1873."—(Mr. Rylands.)

MR. WYKEHAM MARTIN said, in reference to the expense of police at the dockyards, that so far as Chatham was concerned the Government only employed some 58 officers there, whose duty it was to protect miles of ground stored to repletion with valuable property against the depredations of convicts, who, if not closely watched, were notoriously given to secreting property in order to obtain those delicacies which the laws of their country would not allow them—while the cost of their services amounted to no more than £5,000 a year, an expenditure which, he held, was well laid out. As to pensions, all persons superannuated before 1868 not only paid for their pensions, but they brought a profit to the Government out of the system; and he knew scores of men who were now living on pensions, every farthing of which they had formerly paid out of their own earnings. He believed that the Government offer of a small pension operated as an ignis fatuus in most cases. It acted as a retaining fee, although it was a delusion; and it kept the men at work at wages which were absolutely inadequate for the support of their families. In fact, he believed they paid such a price for their pensions that it had been stated that any insurance society would gladly take the annuities at a far lower price. A Return he had in his hand of the wages of a painter, who might be regarded as a skilled labourer, showed that the man received 2s. a-day except when he was employed in painting iron ships, when he got 2s. 6d. a-day. Why, the agricultural wages in Warwickshire were 12s. and 14s. a-week, so that there was only 1s. a-week to the good of the painter. While the Secretary to the Admiralty was paying 14s. a-week to ordinary labourers at Chatham, where you could not get the commonest room under 1s. 6d. a-week, a respectable farmer, not 10 miles distant, between Michaelmas, 1870, and Michaelmas, 1871, paid the following sums to his men, whose weekly rent was 2s., which included a garden, while they could have an additional garden independently at 5s. a-year—the first, £78 5s.; the second, £62; the next, £67; the next, £72; and a boy, £53 11s. Personally, he (Mr. Wykeham Martin) employed a certain amount of labour, and there was only one who had less than 15s. a-week; and even in Warwickshire, which was purely an agricultural county, the result of the recent strike was, that farmers had been obliged to raise wages to 15s. a-week. Something had been said about the general increase of prices, and he could recollect the time when chops, cheese, bread, and beer could be obtained at the club for one-third less than the present tariff rate. He could read letters from dockyard employés which would make hon. Members shudder. A man with a wife and five children was living on 14s. a-week, and a man who had been hurt by an accident had to keep himself, wife, and children, and pay rent out of

7s. a-week. He therefore protested against the Admiralty being charged with paying high wages, when it paid only 14s. a-week in the quasi-manufacturing county of Kent. The hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands) had further overlooked the cost of superintendence in the Government yards, where a permanent staff must be employed, whether the labourers were many or few. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty would have a little mercy on his own flesh and blood, and would not reduce wages below the living point.

MR. RYLANDS explained that he did not want to reduce wages. He merely pointed out that in calculating the wages paid account must be taken of pensions. He believed the hon. Member for Rochester (Mr. Wykeham Martin) had been alluding to men who were not on the establishment.

MR. SAMUDA said, he was prepared to support the Vote, because while private yards might be, in many instances, advantageously resorted to, Government yards, properly administered, were absolutely necessary to the country. There was not, however, really the great difference the hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands) supposed between the present Estimates and those of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract. There was great force in the proposal that a fixed amount of work should be done regularly in the Government yards, and his complaint was, that they were now doing too much in proportion to the private yards. It was understood that the proportion to be given to private yards should be 25 per cent; but that was not the proportion of the present Vote allotted to contract work. No doubt Government pensions, joined with other privileges, such as receiving their wages all the year round, and being paid whether it was wet or dry, were important considerations, and induced men to accept less wages, so that, with judicious management, the Government gained an advantage over private yards, and had no difficulty in getting men; and that rendered it the more incumbent on the Government to maintain an unvarying amount of work, and not disarrange private trade. Altogether the interests of the country required that the work should be divided very differently from that proposed in the Estimates, and that a much larger proportion of it should be given to private manufacturers.

MR. OTWAY said, he could not agree with any of the opinions expressed by his hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, and although it was desirable that the country ought to obtain the full value of the labour it paid for, yet that was impossible under the existing system. His hon. Friend's remarks had been extremely vague, for instead of there being swarms of policemen, as his hon. Friend had alleged, it had been shown by the hon. Gentleman below him (Mr. Wykeham Martin) that only 58 policemen were employed, and that the whole cost of the protection and police supervision of a property worth £20,000,000 sterling was only £4,799 a-year. Could the complete protection and supervision of private property of such value be secured by so small an annual expenditure? There were many other assertions of his hon. Friend to which exception might be justly taken. Great national establishments could not be conducted on the profit-and-loss principle which his hon. Friend advocated. If, for example, it were necessary to construct large vessels for national purposes, the work must be carried on, irrespectively of any rise or fall in the price of iron. There was another matter which had not occurred to his hon. Friend's mind when condemning the system of superannuation pursued by successive Governments, and that was the great danger which now threatened every industry in the country—he meant the strikes. The great danger which now threatened the industry of this country was the system of strikes. Everybody must regard those combinations with a certain amount of dread; and it was, therefore, a satisfaction to know that by the wise arrangements which had been acted on for some years past, the Government had induced men to remain in the public service at a moderate rate of wages by holding out to them the prospect of a moderate pension. Thus, the Government had entirely insured themselves against that great national danger. His hon. Friend, however, had not alluded to that subject, but had taken the whole of the superannuation as compared with the amount paid to the establishment artificers, and had asserted that out of every 26s. of wage 6s. were paid in pension.

If his hon. Friend conducted his own establishment on the arithmetical principles he had propounded, he was astonished at the prosperity he was generally believed to have attained. His hon. Friend had also spoken only of the establishment artificers, forgetting that the great bulk of the labour in the dockyards was performed by men who never came on the establishment at all. His hon. Friend would doubtless concur with him that the Government ought to obtain all the labour for which they paid; but, considering the increase in rent and the high price of the barest necessities of life, excluding meat altogether, it was impossible for a labourer to live on 14s. a-week. Consequently the labourers, after completing their 10 hours' work in the dockyards, were under the necessity of going to other employments, and, in some instances, toiling till midnight, the result being, that on the following day they could not devote their full strength and energy to the Government work. His right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty had evinced every desire to ameliorate the condition of the artizans in our dockyards; but, unfortunately, he had overlooked the labourers at 14s. a-week. All the conditions of their life had changed since their wages were fixed, for not only had rent risen, but the expenses the men were put to in consequence of the new kind of work to which they were put had increased, added to which, since iron shipbuilding had been introduced the wear and tear of clothes had increased some 40 or 50 per cent, and this was a very serious matter to a man earning only 14s. a-week. Again, the work was exceedingly unhealthy, and accidents to the eyes were much more frequent than formerly. It was true that provision was made by the Government for sending men thus injured to the Ophthalmic Hospital; but he knew of one case where a labourer paid £7 in travelling expenses to and from the hospital, and in the purchase of a false eye. Surely the Government ought to take into consideration the changes which had occurred in the conditions of life since the rate of wages was fixed? At Chatham the Government was a great proprietor and the sole proprietor; but it did not perform any of the duties of a proprietor. An agricultural labourer in receipt of 14s. a-week had the advantage of an occasional visit from the squire or his lady, of beer or cider and increased wages at harvest time; but the labourer in the Government employ enjoyed none of these advantages. It was not creditable to the Government, therefore, to maintain the existing state of things. It was the duty of the Government to give these men for their labour a sufficiency to live upon, and instead of being disposed to reduce the Vote by a single farthing, he hoped his right hon. Friend would take the first opportunity of increasing the wages of the labourers, who were at present so inadequately paid.

MR. G. BENTINCK said, he could not imagine a graver charge than that which had been preferred by his hon. Friend the Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands) against Her Majesty's Government. Put into plain English, the charge of the hon. Member for Warrington meant that Her Majesty's Government were prepared to sacrifice the honour and the security of the country to a description of economy which might, perhaps, enable them to save a few pounds and obtain a few clap-trap votes. It was also to be lamented that hon. Members should—unconsciously he was sure—mislead the Committee and the country upon questions such as the one now under discussion; for it was a pity that the country should be led into a belief that the dockyards were conducted upon a system of wasteful extravagance, while, as a matter of fact, the system was one of penurious and mischievous economy. It was all very well for hon. Gentlemen to compare the state of things in 1870 with that which existed at the present time, because the state of facts at the two periods was entirely different. In what he said he wished it to be understood that he did not blame the right hon. Gentleman now at the head of the Admiralty for this state of things, which he found in existence when he went into office, and who had not as yet had time to undertake the almost hopeless task of putting our naval affairs into a proper condition; but in order to justify what he said, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman one or two questions on points of detail. For instance, was the right hon. Gentleman of opinion that the number of workmen at present employed in Portsmouth Dockyard was sufficient for the work now in hand; and if he was so satisfied, he should further like to inquire how it came to pass that there were such remarkable proofs existing of inefficiency in the operations of that dockyard? Was it true, for example, that there was only one tug in it in a serviceable condition, so that on the occasion of the recent collision in the Channel, the City of Baltimore had to be towed off by two vessels of war? If that was so, it reflected great discredit upon the department which had control of the yard. Again, it was said that as the boilers in certain ships, built at a cost of between £400,000 and £500,000, had become so much worn as to be dangerous at high pressure, it had been determined not to replace the boilers but to work them at a much lower pressure, thus rendering vessels practically valueless which had been built for speed at enormous cost. That again, if true, showed a most unsatisfactory state of things. Further, it was important that ships of great draught of water should be able to get in and out of a harbour like Portsmouth with ease; but it was rumoured that the harbour had only a single dredger in a condition fit for service. Yet another of the rumours he had heard in circles where the importance of questions of this kind was as well understood and as highly appreciated as in the House of Commons—it was stated that the repairs of the Prince Consort and the Warrior were proceeding so slowly that the vessels could neither of them be looked upon as being efficient ships in Her Majesty's service. If those rumours were well founded, the Government had clearly made themselves liable to the charge of persisting in that false economy which had hitherto resulted in so enormous an expenditure. It should not be forgotten that as respected the French Navy, that nation was as strong as ever it was; and the more so, as in later years we had been committing the fatal mistake of doing away with our old wooden screw line-of-battle ships, which were our only sure resource in case of disaster, and replacing them with iron-clads, which we could not, as yet at all events, regard as sea-going or efficient vessels. In conclusion, he felt bound to add that nothing was more ruinous to the country or to the naval service than the system of strikes which had been so prevalent in the country for the last few years.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that the objections urged in the course of his speech by the hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands) had to some extent been answered by hon. Gentlemen who from that (the Ministerial) side of the House had taken part in the debate, therefore he (Mr. Goschen) should be able to keep his remarks within narrow limits. His hon. Friend had founded his criticisms not so much upon the Navy Estimates as upon his (Mr. Goschen's) speech in moving them; but he had failed to indicate a single item in them that was extravagant; and he had not attempted in the course of his remarks to show that they were building too many ships, or that they were replacing those they had by too many iron-clads. He was incorrect, moreover, in supposing that there was an increase in this year's Navy Estimates of £600,000 as compared with those of 1870. In 1870-1, they were £9,370,000; this year £9,508,000, or an increase of £138,000. It was equally an error to suppose that he was plunging into shipbuilding beyond the standard established by his predecessors, the fact being that the amount of new tonnage he proposed to build in the ensuing year was 20,000 tons, which the late First Lord of the Admiralty had declared to be the normal annual amount necessary to maintain the efficiency of the Navy; while in regard to that being a bad time to complete iron ships in, on account of the high price of iron, he would observe that they were taking the opportunity, for that very reason, of replacing a certain number of wooden corvettes and sloops, the construction of which had lately been somewhat neglected. Therefore, in that direction, the Government had not been so improvident as his hon. Friend would lead them to imagine. Then came the charge that they were keeping up an excessive number of men in their dockyards; and here he might remark that he had never stated that in times of peace they ought to do all the work which they required in the public dockyards and reserve the private yards for times of war. That was an exaggerated view of what he had said, and, as a matter of fact, out of 20,000 tons of shipbuilding to be done in the year, 3,400 would be executed in private yards. The statement that only £4,000 was to be expended during the year in private yards was also equally incorrect, for the amount now contracted for, although all would not be due during the financial year, was £80,700. In reference to the comparative advantages of public and private yards, what he had stated was this—that the frequent discharge of men from the Government dockyards would disturb the minds of the labourers, and would neutralize the advantages arising from having a certain number of men on whom the Government could under all circumstances rely; but he had never concealed the opinion that the events of the last few years had proved the importance of having a large number of men in their dockyards of whose services and abilities the Government could always be assured, for even the most ardent and disinterested advocates of doing work by private contract would admit that it was quite impossible to do the whole or nearly the whole in that manner and by that means, supposing it were confined simply to repairs and the maintenance of ships, which constituted a very large proportion of what was necessary to be done. In these circumstances certain establishments under certain supervision were indispensable; and the question was whether, having got these establishments and all that plant, it was cheaper for the Government to build their own vessels or to put them out to contract. A special reason, moreover, why the Admiralty should limit its operations to its own dockyards this year was on account of the extraordinary high price being asked for every species of contract work; and further, had he (Mr. Goschen) preferred to discharge more men from the dockyards in order to let the work be competed for by private enterprise, he should have followed a course which would not have been appreciated either by the Committee or the country. He would admit, however, that it was an enormous advantage to have private firms to fall back upon to supplement the regular Admiralty resources when such a step was required; while being equally certain the main numbers on whom the Admiralty should rely were their own employés. Then, again, his hon. Friend had forgotten that there was a certain number of ships for certain duties, not at the call of the Government, but at that of the interests which needed to be protected. That tended to increase the Estimates, but it was an item which was wholly unavoidable. Reference had been made to the conduct of the captain of the Rosario; but, although it was clearly inexpedient to enter into a discussion upon that matter now, he desired to state, with a view to prevent misapprehension on the subject, that he had been assured by the captain that the shells were fired over the natives, and that there was no loss of life. The subject of the employment of labourers and the rate of wages paid to them—a subject referred to by several hon. Members—was also a matter upon which it would be inexpedient to enter. He had, however, considered the question, and had consulted competent authorities upon it, but he was anxious not to make any statement likely to raise hopes that might not be realized. He would mention, however, in reference to the statement that the men engaged in extra work in order to add to their incomes, that they were employed in the yards for only 8½ hours. No doubt the men at Chatham were worse off than those at Pembroke, owing to the high price of provisions at Chatham as compared with Pembroke. The question had also been asked by the hon. Member for West Norfolk, as to whether a sufficient number of men were employed at Portsmouth for the work to be done, the answer to which was, there had been a great pressure of work at Portsmouth during the last few months, and he had encouraged as far as possible the system, that every available man should be put upon the fighting ships rather than upon the subsidiary vessels. It was true that the pressure upon the boilers of the Minotaur had been decreased; but it was a question whether the ship should be put into reserve at once, and the boilers be discarded altogether, or whether the boilers should be used for another year. That was a matter of discretion. He was not prepared to say—and he believed it had not been the custom of the Admiralty—that boilers should be at once discarded if at a reduction of pressure they would still be able to do good service for another year. He had now dealt with most of the points raised, and he trusted that his hon. Friend would not press his Motion to a division.

MR. CORRY said, it was not his province to defend the policy of the First Lord of the Admiralty, as contrasted with that of his predecessor in office; but he wished to point out that the increase of 1,570 in the number of workmen in the yards under the Estimates of 1871-2 was not made by the present First Lord of the Admiralty, but by the Board of the late First Lord, after his unfortunate illness obliged him to absent himself from the office. And in saying that, he would add that it would have been quite impossible to go on with the reduced Vote of the year 1870-1, and it was, therefore, absolutely necessary to increase the number of the men in the dockyards, as was done by the Board of the late First Lord and continued by his successor. The hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. G. Bentinck) had been, like himself, at Portsmouth; and, speaking for Portsmouth, and he believed also for other yards, he could say the establishment of men was not adequate to complete the programme—that was to say, the work which the Admiralty deemed necessary for placing the Navy in a proper position in the present year. At Portsmouth, moreover, the programme of work included something which ought never to have been part of the programme of that or of any other dockyard—something which he had never seen before, and which he hoped would never be seen again. He saw in Portsmouth Yard a new ship, which had never performed any service except that of coming round from the port at which she was built to Portsmouth, where she was to be fitted. She proved so weak and leaky on the passage round that she was ordered to be surveyed, and found to be unsafe to be employed at sea. Her planking was of fir, and of fir of a very bad description, being only fit, as he had been informed, to be used for stageing; and they had to put on teak planking three inches thicker than the original fir planking to give her the requisite strength. In fact, he might almost say the re-building of that new ship, which was thoroughly unseaworthy, formed part of the work of the yard. She was so badly caulked, and the bolts were so badly driven, that it was the opinion at Portsmouth that she must have been put together by labourers, as no shipwrights could have turned such work out of hand. If anything could make the case more unaccountable, if not more reprehensible, it was the fact that that vessel was a Royal yacht, not intended merely for smooth-water service, but for conveying the Prince of Wales and other Members of the Royal Family to the Baltic, across the Bay of Biscay, or on other voyages for which a thorough sea-going vessel was required. He was not now blaming the Board of Admiralty; he was certain that no members of the Board would have sanctioned such a proceeding as that; but, at the same time, he did not think that such a thing would have been possible under the old system at the Admiralty. Again, he found that of the four tugs belonging to Portsmouth Yard, only two were available for service. One of them had her boilers so worn that they could not be used without risk of scalding the men. The most powerful tug, too, in the yard had been for 10 months with only one boiler fit for use, and had been all that time getting a new boiler fitted. Some time ago a French ship-of-war went ashore off Newhaven, and an order being given for the most powerful tug from Portsmouth to go to her assistance, they were obliged to send that unfortunate vessel with her one boiler, and it was considered quite a joke at Portsmouth when a powerful tug was ordered by the Admiralty on any service. What had been said as to the boilers of the Minotaur was quite true. They were meant for a pressure of 25lbs, and they were reduced to a pressure of 12lbs for the sake of safety; and that was the state in which the flagship of the Channel Squadron was to commence the evolutions of the year. When a vessel came in either with her boilers injured by accident, or worn by use, there were no boilers to put into her. A gentleman who wrote in the leading journal had been good enough to notice his visit to Portsmouth, and having heard, he supposed, that he had been inquiring into the condition of the boilers, had observed that it was bad policy to keep a large store of them, as they deteriorated rapidly when exposed to the weather; but it would surely be better to have boilers deteriorate than to have none at all. When the works at Portsmouth, in connection with the old steam basin, were commenced, it was the intention to employ one of the buildings as a boiler-shed, and he hoped that in the next year's Estimates provision would be made for a proper shed for boilers at Portsmouth. In the case of another vessel, the Royal Sovereign—a turret-ship—the boilers had been reduced to a pressure of 10lbs, and he was informed that, in consequence of the state of the trade, there was a difficulty in getting boilers made within a reasonable time either by contract or in the yards. A notice having been posted some time ago at the gate of Portsmouth Dockyard that boiler-makers were wanted, he was told that a wag wrote under the placard in chalk—"You must send to Canada for them." After the treatment that dockyard artificers had received, persons earning good wages from the private trade were not willing to trust their fate again to the mercies of the Board of Admiralty. In the course of his observations, the hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands) had dwelt largely upon his (Mr. Corry's) sins, one of which, as he alleged, was that he had provided for 18,500 workmen in 1867. The hon. Member said the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) was going back to the number employed by the right hon. Member for Tyrone. Now, those men were not his, but his right hon. Friend's (Sir John Pakington's), as the Estimates for 1867-8 were prepared before his appointment to the Admiralty. He did not say this by way of disapproval, for, considering the absolute necessity which existed at the time of building a large number of unarmoured ships, the work could not have been done with a smaller number. When the hon. Member for Warrington talked of these large establishments at the dockyards as though they were owing to a Tory policy, he forgot, or more probably did not know, that they were smaller than those which existed in 1864, when the number of men was 19,500. That was at the time when the present Prime Minister was Chancellor of the Exchequer, and therefore had a right to control the expenditure of the Admiralty. Then it was said that he (Mr. Corry) had reduced 3,200 men. That arose from the necessity, in order to maintain our naval supremacy, of building iron-clads by contract, which the dockyards had not the requisite means of building, and he was obliged to discharge artificers in order to get the money for that purpose. When the hon. Gentleman taunted him with having effected reductions in the number of dockyard men, he appeared to have forgotten the fact that the right hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers)

had reduced many more. The hon. Gentleman had also talked of the badness of the work in the dockyards, and had instanced the case of the Megara as a proof of the bad manner in which dockyard work was performed. Now, the Megara was a single exception to the ordinary rule, because he had never before heard of any ship being turned out of Her Majesty's dockyards in a state not perfectly seaworthy. No doubt, dockyard work was expensive, but its excellence had never been questioned before. The hon. Member had further said that in the present uncertain state of our knowledge of what was required in naval architecture, no more ships ought to be built. It was quite true that what with torpedoes and vessels to carry 50-ton guns, which we were told we were soon to have, those who had to design iron-clads might well be bewildered; but although the hon. Member might be right with regard to that class of vessels, he was quite wrong with regard to the unarmoured ships, of which there was a dangerous deficiency in the British Navy, and he was glad to see that the First Lord of the Admiralty had increased the tonnage of those ships to be built this year to more than 12,000 tons. He should wish to have from the First Lord of the Admiralty some information as to what description of iron-clads he intended to build this year. Of the two new iron-clads which were to be built, besides the Fury, one, they had been told, was to be on the principle of the Hercules or the Sultan; but he should like to know what the second was to be like. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that if the Devastation did not prove a success, the Fury would not be proceeded with, but that five gunboats would be built instead; and therefore, seeing that the Devastation was not yet completed, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman not to proceed with the Fury during the present year under any circumstances, more especially as the Thunderer, a vessel of the same class, was also incomplete. In his opinion the right hon. Member for Pontefract had made a mistake in commencing these three vessels of an entirely new description without waiting to see how one turned out before the other two were ordered to be commenced. He wished now to refer to certain statements that had been made with regard to the discharge of dockyard workmen, and to the relative numbers that had been discharged by the late and by the present Government—a subject that appeared to have excited a considerable amount of interest in the minds of the political agitators throughout the country. He had hoped that he had heard the last of this subject in the past Session, but it had been brought prominently forward by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government during the Recess. In addressing his constituents at Blackheath last autumn, the right hon. Gentleman said—

“The facts I mean to communicate to you may cause some astonishment. Now, with regard to dockyard labourers, listen to the figures, for they are worth hearing. The number of dockyard labourers employed on the 1st of January, 1868, was 20,313. On the 1st of December, 1868, which was the day before I received my summons to the presence of Her Majesty at Windsor, the number of 20,313 was reduced to 15,974; the difference showing the reduction since the beginning of the year was 4,339. The number of dockyard labourers we found was 15,974; and the number on the 1st of October last was 14,511. The result of that statement is that the reduction since we came into office was 1,463; the reduction before we came into office was 4,339; so that three-fourths of the whole reduction of which you have heard so much was not our work, but the work of our predecessors.”

He was not at all surprised that the right hon. Gentleman should have thought that that statement was likely to occasion some astonishment, because there was not a dockyard man who heard him who did not know that there was not a single syllable of truth in the whole of that statement. Of course, he did not impute intentional misrepresentation to the right hon. Gentleman in the matter, because he merely uttered the words that were put into his mouth. Without making any assertion on the subject which might be disputed, he would content himself by referring to the dry figures which appeared in the Estimates. Those figures showed that in 1867-8 there were 18,321 dockyard workmen voted, and in 1868-9 there were 15,272, showing a reduction of their number by himself of 3,049; while in 1870-1 there were only 11,276 voted, showing a reduction by the right hon. Member for Pontefract of 3,996 in the two years. He must explain that in the autumn of 1868-9, 2,000 additional men were entered for the remainder of the financial year, under circumstances which he had frequently explained. On his appointment to the Admiralty in 1867 there was not a single armour-clad complete in the steam reserve. In other words, there was no reserve of ships to fall back on in the event of an emergency. It was unnecessary to point out the extreme danger of such a state of things, and as the Controller reported an anticipated surplus on the Shipbuilding Votes in the month of September, he (Mr. Corry) obtained the sanction of the Treasury to appropriate it to the entry of artificers for six months, chiefly for the purpose of hastening the preparation of an armour-clad reserve. Yet these men so entered for mere temporary service were included among his (Mr. Corry's) reductions by the Prime Minister in his speech to his constituents. They had never formed part of the establishment of the dockyards, and in the words of the right hon. Member for Pontefract, in answer to a question put to him, in 1869—“They were temporarily engaged in the previous October in excess of the number provided for in the Estimates of 1867-8, and they were well aware they would only be employed for a few months.” It had been asserted by an itinerant agitator in Yorkshire that these men had been badly used, as they had been induced to go from Scotland and other parts of the country to work in the dockyards at low wages, with the hope that they would ultimately get a pension; whereas the truth was what he had stated, and that it had been a great boon to them to get wages to enable them to tide over the winter at a time when the shipbuilding trade was nearly stagnant, in consequence of the financial crisis of 1866. The most valuable class of men in the dockyards were the established men, who considered they had a right to serve their full time, and retire on a pension, and on whom, therefore, the Admiralty could depend. Now, though he discharged some of these men—less than 300—the present Government had reduced them by 2,700. The reduction in the number of men, established and hired, was 3,996 in the two first years of the present Government; but afterwards discovering their mistake, they were obliged to take on 1,570 men, who had been on the Estimates ever since, thus making the net reduction effected by them 2,426, instead of 1,468 as asserted at Blackheath. The reductions by the present Government in 1869 and 1870 had been considerably greater than those made by the late Government, and if the late Government had sinned in reducing the number of dockyard men, the present Government had sinned still more; more especially in regard of established men, as contradistinguished from hired men who had no right to expect to be employed longer than the necessities of the service required. The point, indeed, would not have been worth noticing but for the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government at Blackheath—remarks made for electioneering purposes, which obliged him to show how the matter actually stood. He would only add that he hoped so absurd a proposal as that of the hon. Member for Warrington would not be adopted, for the present number of men, far from being excessive, was inadequate to the work which the Admiralty itself deemed necessary.

Mr. CHILDERS said, he also trusted that the hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands) would not press his Motion; but as the hon. Member had alleged that his right hon. Friend (Mr. Goschen) was pursuing a course of policy opposed to his (Mr. Childers's) own, and that statement had also been made by a great master of fiction the other day in Lancashire, he wished to give an absolute contradiction to that general proposition. It was natural in a large Department like the Admiralty that a First Lord should not in every detail concur with his predecessor; indeed, circumstances altered so quickly, that it was possible that on some points of detail, and even more than detail, he might have to differ from his right hon. Friend. The general principles adopted, however, with regard to the present Estimates were the general principles he had laid down in 1869 and 1870, and the difference between the present Estimates and the original Estimates of 1870-71 was only about £200,000. The difference on the aggregate charge, direct and indirect, for shipbuilding was very much smaller; and inasmuch as in 1870 he had proposed to Parliament to work up to a prospective system that with regard to the whole matériel charge, which had consisted of parts of other Votes, and his right hon. Friend had pretty closely adopted what he then proposed, he could not blame him. The average annual amount of shipping to be built was then laid down by him at between 19,500 and 20,000 tons. His right hon. Friend now proposed something over 20,000 tons slight excess over his (Mr. Childers's) own figure, which was quite justified by the Vote of Credit taken in 1870, the effect of which had hardly yet ceased. It had been said that a much larger number of men was now proposed than in 1870; but it should be remembered that in August, 1870, he proposed a considerable increase for a specific purpose, which was not yet exhausted. When, indeed, the normal state of things had come back, it would be right and necessary to make a reduction on the per cent numbers. The calculation which he adopted—one made by professional officers after long and careful inquiries, but for which he was fully responsible—was that the number of men required to build 16,000 tons of shipping, and provide for repairs and miscellaneous services, was from 11,000 to 11,500. He was disposed to think that this calculation would, for a few years, be insufficient to the extent of 300 or 400 men; but it was better to have been inaccurate to that extent than to have continued the system of numbers fluctuating from year to year without regard to any general rule. On the subject of the numbers in the dockyard he had expected his right hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Corry) to go into figures to-night, he should have come down with statistics, so as to answer him in detail, which he could only now do from memory. His right hon. Friend ingeniously put the case as if the complaint of discharges from the dockyard had been originated by him or his right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone); but nothing could be more inaccurate. On the contrary, at the General Election of 1868 nobody on his side of the House—certainly, nobody who had held office—complained of the discharge of between 4,000 and 5,000 men by his right hon. Friend attempted to make capital out of it. Soon, however, as the present Government acceded to office—before a single man had been discharged—a cry was got up by the right hon. Friend's political friends about the cruelty of discharging dockyard men. That made it necessary to see what the extent of discharges and the reasons for them had been. What were the facts? What (Mr. Childers) objected to in that House in 1868, and ever since, was not the discharge of men who were in excess of the requirements of the public service.

but the absolute want of a policy in the matter which, in a time of absolute peace, led to the employment of 2,000 more men than the Estimates allowed in February, and 5,000 less in the following June. What had been called cruelty to the persons employed arose from a want of foresight with regard to the requirements of the service. It had arisen solely from the peculiar policy in connection with the dockyards which had been pursued by his right hon. Friend and by the right hon. Baronet who had preceded him (Sir John Pakington). What was that policy? His right hon. Friend had described very accurately what was done at the end of the year 1867, when he applied to the Treasury for leave to employ, out of certain savings, an additional number of men in the dockyards, running the number up to somewhere about 2,000 beyond the Estimates. But that application to the Treasury was made without any foresight whatever, and without any regard to the principle on which the establishment should be managed, and it was that very want of foresight and absence of definite principle that led to all the difficulties that followed. His right hon. Friend talked of this increase being met by savings on the year's Estimates; but it turned out that his calculations were wrong by something between £300,000 and £400,000; and that very increase in the number of men during the last three or four months of the financial year was one of the causes of that excess.

MR. CORRY said, the cause was that the Government to which the right hon. Gentleman himself belonged had left the ships of the China station in such a rotten and unsound state that the admiral on the station, on his own responsibility, spent some £50,000 to fit them for service, without the knowledge or the sanction of the Admiralty, and, in consequence of this, their calculations were completely deranged.

MR. CHILDERS said, this could hardly justify a miscalculation 18 months afterwards; but however that might be, up to the very day when Parliament was meeting in 1868, his right hon. Friend was increasing the number of men in the dockyards, and though the Estimates were laid on the Table when Parliament met, copies of them could not be procured for something like three weeks afterwards. He did not know what change took place in that time, but it was certain that whereas up to the very beginning of February the establishments were being increased, yet, when the Estimates were produced, they showed not only that the additional men employed were to be employed no longer, but that there was to be a further reduction of 3,000 men, making a total reduction of no less than 4,600 men. His right hon. Friend had said that he (Mr. Childers) for two years reduced the number of men; but during those two years the reduction was a steady reduction, until the Franco-German War broke out in 1870. It had always been a principle of the present Government that, while the dockyards should be reduced, still, when such an event as that occurred, the Admiralty should be at liberty to increase their establishment and carry out special works. When that war broke out, Parliament was asked for a Vote of Credit for £2,000,000, and £500,000 of that sum was employed by the Admiralty, who took on a certain number of men, and in the Estimates for the following year the same number of men were continued in employment. He (Mr. Childers) had never charged the late Government with discharging men, for he maintained that the dockyards were made for the country, and that if it were necessary for the public service that they should be reduced, they ought to be reduced; but he had always laid it down—and he hoped the House would always act upon that policy—that those reductions should be made in conformity with the interests of the public service—that they should not be made in a haphazard manner, but that they should be explained to, and approved of by Parliament. His right hon. Friend had next referred to the Osborne, built at Pembroke, as having been at Portsmouth in a state not creditable to the Department, in consequence of wood of an inferior kind having been put in her, and in consequence of her scantling having been too light, and the right hon. Gentleman had said that such a thing could not have happened under the system in force in his time. But he (Mr. Childers) had been allowed to see the papers on the subject up to the time of his leaving office, and it turned out that the orders relating to the Osborne were given by his right hon. Friend himself. The right hon. Gentleman had approved of the material to be employed in the fullest detail, and had recommended that she should be built as light as possible. No change whatever was ordered by the present Government, except that the Osborne should be proceeded with slowly, there being several iron-clads of more importance to be proceeded with first. Coming to the general question He admitted that there was considerable force in some of the observations of the hon. Member for Warrington as to the relative value of dockyard business to contract work; but he hoped the Motion now before the House would not be pressed to a division, and if it were so pressed he should vote against it. With regard to the value of our dockyard establishments, the view he took was very similar to that of the First Lord of the Admiralty. He should greatly deplore undue reduction of our dockyards, or the abandonment of the system of establishment; and great care should be taken to keep up a proper proportion between the men who were on the establishment and the men who were not on the establishment, but who were hired in the ordinary way. There was an extraordinary misunderstanding in the House on the subject of the conditions on which men were engaged. It was stated that all the skilled artificers in the factories and dockyards were on the establishment; but there could not be a greater delusion, for the great body of the factory men and workers in iron were not on the establishment at all, but were engaged in the usual way. He would repeat that the proper proportion between the established and unestablished men should be watched very narrowly, keeping the dockyards as nearly as possible at the same level, but always retaining power to increase them when an emergency arose. In conclusion, he would say that his right hon. Friend, when he opened the Estimates, did not, in his opinion, state with sufficient fulness the great advantages to be derived from going to private yards; but to-night he had done so with perfect accuracy, and he hoped, under all circumstances, that that policy would be approved by Parliament.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he did not wish to interfere with the proceedings of the evening, or to delay in any respect the taking of the necessary Vote; there were, however, a few remarks which he felt called upon to make.

Mr. Childers

With regard to the Motion of the hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands), if pressed to a division he would vote against it. He did not think there were more than half-a-dozen Members out of all in the House who, if they had merely read the Motion as it stood on the Paper, would have voted for it. But after the speech of the hon. Member, that half-dozen would probably have dwindled down to half that number. The hon. Gentleman was supposed to be a great authority on foreign affairs, and certainly, if his speech to-night was to be taken as a specimen of his naval criticism, the hon. Member would do well to confine himself to our foreign relations for the future. The hon. Member had criticized most unjustly what had fallen from the First Lord of the Admiralty as to our keeping the police of the seas, and asked why it was that it should devolve on us alone to discharge that office. But if the hon. Member paid that attention to our foreign relations which we were told he did, he ought to have known that during the prevalence of Chinese piracy we had constantly received active co-operation from the Navy of France in putting it down. The hon. Gentleman had represented him in a chameleon-like view, for he said — “When the noble Lord is in office he alarms the House by comparing our Navy with that of the French; but when he is in Opposition he is the first to condemn the First Lord of the Admiralty for doing so.” But if the hon. Member had read his speech in 1867, when it fell to his lot to move the Estimates, he would have seen that he acted in a very different way, for he stated then that it was with pain and grief that he listened to such comparisons; that they could do no possible good, and could only tend to create misunderstanding and embitter our relations with our neighbours. The hon. Member had fallen foul of his right hon. Friend the Member for Tyrone (Mr. Corry), of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), and of the present First Lord of the Admiralty, for holding the extreme advisability of keeping in our dockyards a good reserve of workmen. He (Lord Henry Lennox) must himself advert to the speech of the right hon. Member for Pontefract, in order to show that that right hon. Gentleman had said that when he made reductions in the dockyards he did so upon a distinct principle, and that according to that principle 11,300 was the proper number of dockyard men for the year, and he added that that result was arrived at after due calculation. He (Lord Henry Lennox), however, fancied he had seen in certain documents which had been laid on the Table that one of the officers in a high post in the Admiralty at the time did consistently protest against the reduction made by the right hon. Gentleman. It was, in fact, only one of what he might call "those spasmodical reductions" which the right hon. Member had that night himself condemned. The Estimates of the right hon. Gentleman had been laid on the Table at the usual time; but, owing to a very important and much-contested Bill, the Estimates that Session were not finally passed until a very late period. Before, therefore, those very economical Estimates that reduced the number of men were passed the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract had to come down himself and ask for an increase of men to carry out the work that was necessary in consequence of the breaking out of the war between France and Germany. But did the right hon. Gentleman find it easy to replace in the dockyards the men that had been discharged? Not at all. The right hon. Gentleman would bear him out when he said—and if the right hon. Gentleman did not remember he had only to appeal to the archives of the Admiralty, which now, as when he was in office, he found ready access to—that though the men were voted in July, the full number could not be had until the November following, so that we were during the interval working with fewer men than were required. [Mr. CHILDERS dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman shook his head; but he thought he could convince the right hon. Gentleman by reference to documents which he would find it impossible to dispute. His right hon. Friend the Member for Tyrone had asked what description of iron-clads we were going to have. The other night, when he himself asked the same question, the First Lord of the Admiralty said that when the Vote came on, he would be prepared to give an accurate description of them. He (Lord Henry Lennox) hoped we should have that description to-night, and that we should be told what their size would be, what was their projected armour, what their displacement, the kind of ordnance to be carried on board, and other particulars. There was another point to which he called attention when the First Lord of the Admiralty made his opening statement, and that was as to the difficulty of estimating beforehand the amount of work that could be done in the dockyards, owing to its varying nature and peculiarity. On referring to the Estimates for 1871-2, he found that the iron-clad rams, the Cyclops, Hecate, Hydra, and Gorgon, were put down in the Appendix as requiring only 20 tons each to be worked into them; but in the Estimates of 1872-3 he found three of these old friends requiring, not 20, but 100 tons each, to be worked in our dockyards. Why, when 20 tons were thought enough in 1871-2, were 100 tons needed in 1872-3? Could the right hon. Gentleman, looking at the number of men he had to do the work to the amount of work done last year and the year before, confidently say that 16,700 tons was likely to be completed this year? Of that programme of 16,700, as he made out, 10,000 tons went in ships already ordered, and 500 tons were for the torpedo vessel, about which he should have something more to say. There remained, therefore, according to that statement, some 6,000 tons to be worked up in new ships in the coming year. Would anyone, looking to the class of ships all these were to be, tell him that they could be advanced in a more than infinitesimal degree, if the programme of the right hon. Gentleman were carried out? These ships were two iron-clad frigates, the tonnage of which was given by the right hon. Gentleman as 2,679; two corvettes, one of the Blanche class, and four sloops, about which he should like to have some information. The 6,000 tons were to be spread over that amount of shipping. He would like that the right hon. Gentleman should state how he meant to apportion the 6,000 tons, which, according to his own showing, was to be done? He also wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman seriously intended to include in his programme of works the repairs and refitting of the Cruiser? Some years ago that vessel had been mentioned before a Committee of that House as a proof of wanton extravagance in the Admiralty Departments, and it had also been stated that her repairs and refittings had already caused an expenditure three times the amount of her original cost. She was a vessel of 60-horse power, and in her best days could only run $6\frac{1}{2}$ knots an hour, and in 1867 he (Lord Henry Lennox) spoke of her as one of those vessels which could "neither fight nor cut and run away." At a time when there was so much work to be done in the dockyards, he must ask whether it would be judicious to employ men upon a vessel of that class and type? He should have something further to say upon a later Vote, with regard to the proposal founded upon the recommendation of the right hon. Member for Pontefract to add 20,000 tons of shipping every year to the Navy. The programme in that respect was illusory, and the additional fleet was merely upon paper, as would be seen when Vote 10, section 2, was considered. It had been said by the right hon. Gentleman that the Opposition ought to bear the responsibility of any deficiency in the Royal yacht Osborne; but that was absolutely a mistake, for not a plank had been laid, nor a bolt driven in her when his right hon. Friend (Mr. Corry) went out. That was evident from a statement made in 1869 by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract, who said that the building of the Osborne had been postponed in consequence of the expenditure for repairing the other Royal yachts. There ought not to be any party opposition in matters affecting the welfare of the naval service; but those who sat on that side of the House had a difficult task to perform, because they had to give quotations from memory, while the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract was allowed by the First Lord of the Admiralty to see private confidential documents. Notwithstanding these facilities, however, the right hon. Gentleman had not been able to discover anything which redounded to the discredit of the administration of his right hon. Friend the present First Lord. In conclusion, he would say that nothing was more painful to his right hon. Friend the Member for Tyrone than to draw comparisons between himself and his successors; and last year his right hon. Friend distinctly deprecated any such discussions, saying that so long as the Admiralty provided good ships, he would support it.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said,
Lord Henry Lennox

he must congratulate the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty on something like an approach to what formed the old naval policy of the country. He also agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that though we must look to private shipbuilding yards in cases of necessity, the work there and in the dockyards was as different as possible. They could not carry on the business of a Government like the business of a private concern — a Government being subject to political contingencies, from which private firms were wholly exempt, and therefore they were bound to employ a large permanent staff in the dockyards, a course of policy he had always advocated. The right hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) had gone into a long discussion with respect to the controversy between himself and the right hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Corry), as to who had discharged the dockyard labourers. All he (Sir James Elphinstone) could say was that when he was returned for Portsmouth in 1869, he found wandering about the streets hundreds of the very best of our artificers, and he then said he considered it a gross cruelty to turn such men adrift at such short warning, and thereby reduce the strength of our establishment, which had been carefully adapted to the exigencies of our times, and had been controlled and moulded by our best politicians. Now, after the discharge of these men there was a great want of dockyard artificers, and he could not see the economy of the measures which had been taken, for the right hon. Gentleman had discharged men whose pay was £33,000 a-year, involving £12,000 of pensions and £2,000 of gratuities, and men had to be taken on at an expense of £35,000. Our staff of artificers had been broken up, their homes had been destroyed, and since then we had been endeavouring to supply their places, but had succeeded in doing so most imperfectly. Then, again, with regard to boilers, a disgraceful state of affairs existed, and he believed it could not be contradicted that boiler-makers could not be found to supply the boilers wanted for the service. In consequence of that deficiency, the boilers of the Minotaur had been reduced from a pressure of 24 lb to 12 lb to the square inch, and he doubted whether with that power the vessel could draw off a lee shore in a strong wind and heavy sea. He should like to hear what progress the boilers had made, and whether it used not to be the practice to have a pair of spare boilers for each ship. Suppose we now had "a scare," the fact was, that we were now two years behind in the whole of our work, and at our present rate of production it should take that period to make up leeway and get our Navy into proper condition. The Government were fond of the tu quoque argument, and the First Lord recently twitted Lord Clarence Paget with having signed the Order restricting officers in the use of coal. Lord Clarence, however, was then Secretary to the Admiralty, and he imagined, had no more to do with framing the Order than the Gentlemen at the Table had to do with the debates of that House. It was thus that dust was thrown in the eyes of the public. Because a vessel on being pulled to pieces was found to have its bolts driven foul—a fault which indicated that unskilled labourers were employed—his right hon. Friend (Mr. Corry) was told that he ordered it to be built rapidly, as if it followed that there should be bad timber or that the bolts should be driven foul. But whenever a charge was made against the Government, it seemed to be answered by two hon. Members; and as regarded the explanation which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Childers) had given as to the Osborne, he (Sir James Elphinstone) hoped the Papers would be laid upon the Table; because it was very desirable to know where the responsibility of one Government ended and that of another began. It was all very well for the First Lord of the Admiralty to raise a discussion as to the relative responsibility of persons at the Admiralty; but he (Sir James Elphinstone) did not wish to see dust thrown in the eyes of the public in that way. He concurred with his hon. Friend (Mr. G. Bentinck) as to the reckless destruction of wooden line-of-battle ships, most of them comparatively new. Now, an iron-clad, if pierced by a heavy gun, would have to go into harbour, for such a hole could not be repaired at sea, so that whatever Power could send out the most gunboats and pierce the iron-clads would have the advantage. The second line of defence—wooden ships—would then have to be fallen back on, and Admiral Farragut had expressed an opinion that our reserve of fine wooden vessels should not be parted with; yet that had been done for the sake of petty economy. In the dockyards, too, there were now no corvettes or reliefs, and the foolish system was pursued of keeping ships out in hot climates and sending out crews to relieve them. Thus two sets of men had to be kept, and sometimes after all a ship had to be sent home. Last year the Bullfinch was sent up the Persian Gulf, and he inspected that vessel at Bombay in January, 1871, and found the thermometer on the main deck at 82 degrees. It amounted to manslaughter to send such vessels on duty in hot climates; there ought to be a particular class of ships for that purpose, as was the case under the rule of the East India Company. Again, to send out flying squadrons with directions to be at particular places at particular times, regardless of climate, winds, and currents, led to ships being knocked to pieces, and to a great loss of life by pulmonary complaints. He preferred the old plan of independent commands at foreign stations, for the manner in which young officers had dealt with difficult international questions which arose—as had been the case in China and the Polynesian Islands—was highly creditable, although he feared they were sometimes snubbed, instead of encouraged. He wished to take the opportunity upon that Vote of making reparation to Mr. Austin, whom, in the discussions last year on the sale of the dockyards in the river, he mentioned in a manner which he now regretted. He spoke on the faith of information on which he relied, but having since found that he was entirely mistaken, he begged Mr. Austin's pardon. At the same time, his opinion on the improvidence of the transaction remained unaltered. In conclusion, he must say he regretted that of the 16,000 tons of shipping to be built this year, only 5,000 were to be applied to small ships, in which we were lamentably deficient.

MR. SHAW - LEFEVRE said, he thought it unnecessary, particularly after the figures quoted by the right hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), to notice at any length the observations of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Tyrone (Mr. Corry) in reference to the discharge of dockyard men. It was true that the number of men voted for the establishment in the time of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Tyrone was only 18,000, but the right hon. Gentleman engaged a number of men in excess, and the number discharged within a few months was 4,508. It was that proceeding which was described by the right hon. Member for Pontefract as a real grievance for the dockyard men. The right hon. Member for Tyrone also addressed himself to the matter of the Osborne, with respect to which vessel a grave mistake was made in building it with light fir instead of with teak, but that was due to the orders of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. There had been, in connection with that vessel, some bad workmanship, which the right hon. Member for Tyrone attributed to the right hon. Member for Pontefract; but the latter right hon. Gentleman was able to show that all the orders for preparing the vessel emanated from the right hon. Member for Tyrone himself. The latter right hon. Gentleman had addressed himself to the subject of boilers. In the Navy Estimates of last year £90,000 were taken for boilers to be made by contract, and a sum of £30,000 was taken for the same purpose in the Estimates of the present year. Boilers had already been prepared for the Royal Oak, and for a considerable number of other larger vessels. They had been ordered for the Minotaur, but it was not a prudent course to provide a reserve of boilers for all existing vessels. The proper mode of proceeding was to order boilers just about the time when a vessel was likely to want them, because the boilers, if kept long, were liable to become deteriorated. With regard to iron-clads, he was in a position to state that it was intended to commence one at Chatham, and to complete 1,500 tons of her this year; and another at Portsmouth, of which 400 tons only would be completed. The vessel of that class intended to be built at Chatham would be an improved Sultan, she would be somewhat larger than the Sultan; and the hull would be protected by 11 inches of armour, whereas the Sultan had no more than nine inches. The guns would also be heavier, being 18-ton guns, and the engines would be so constructed as to lead to economy in the consumption of fuel, while giving a speed at the measured mile of 14 knots. As to the character of the iron-clad at Portsmouth, no decision had yet been arrived at, nor would be until it was absolutely necessary; for the science of shipbuilding was still so incomplete that it was always desirable to avoid committing themselves to any particular type of vessel until the last moment. With regard to the Fury, it was intended to proceed to complete that vessel as soon as possible; it being necessary to make allowance for the consideration he had referred to, she would not be completely finished until the Devastation was tried. It was hoped the Devastation would be tried this autumn, and it was still thought she would be; but there had been some delay in furnishing the armour-plates, and therefore she could not be completed so soon as intended. It was therefore only intended to build 500 tons of the Fury this year. The result was that it was intended to build 16,741 tons of vessels this year; of this, 9,028 tons were represented by vessels already commenced, the whole of which, except the Fury, it was intended to complete within the year; and that left 7,713 tons of new vessels to be laid down and advanced. Of this amount of tonnage, as he had before observed, 1,500 tons were of the iron-clad laid down at Chatham, 400 tons were at Portsmouth, and 500 tons were represented by the Fury. There were corvettes, of which it was proposed to build 1,277 tons within the year; there was a new corvette at Devonport which it was proposed to advance 730 tons; there were two new sloops at Pembroke, of which it was proposed to complete 850 tons; and there were two new ones at Chatham which it was proposed to advance 1,027 tons. The amount of tonnage in new vessels would be 7,713 tons, to be completed within the year; and at the commencement of next year, with the exception of the iron-clads already mentioned, the course would be tolerably free for the laying down of new vessels. As to the Cruiser, it was the opinion of the Admiralty that she was not suitable for an ordinary war vessel. The Admiralty had recognized a great want of sailing vessels for training purposes, and they proposed that the Cruiser should be fitted out simply as a sailing vessel, to be attached to the Mediterranean Squadron, and used for the training of seamen and young officers. For this purpose the engines would be taken out of her, and the necessary alterations would not involve any great expense.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that the statement made with regard to the Osborne was one of the most extraordinary he had ever heard; it was of a most discreditable character, and it was necessary some further explanation should be given. They who sat upon that side of the House were under a disadvantage in dealing with naval subjects, because no sooner did they turn to the First Lord for an explanation and obtain it than they had to go over the same thing again with the former First Lord of the Admiralty, who was in office when the matter occurred. He understood that to-night there had been a good deal of the tu quoque—"It was not we who did it; it was you." He thought that there could be no more unimportant question for the public than which First Lord it was that did it; the important question was, whether it had been done; whether there had been gross abuse and negligence in the dockyards, for they should all aim at having good management in the dockyards. If he were rightly informed in regard to the Osborne, it was a shameful case, discreditable to the administration of the dockyards, and the House had a right to look to those now in office for an assurance that such a case should not occur again. As there had been such an undue tendency to say "it was done by the other side," he would refer to a speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract, in 1869, in which he said—

"There will be no unarmoured ships in hand at the end of the financial year, except a small gun-vessel at Chatham, and the Osborne, which was to have been built in the course of 1869-70; but the building of which has been postponed in consequence of the expenditure incurred in the repair of the Victoria and Albert."—[3 Hansard, cxciv. 895.]

The inference he drew from those words was that the superintendence of the building of this vessel was in the hands of the present Government; but whether that were so or not, speaking as a bystander and as one of the public, he would ask—Was it true that this vessel was built of bad material, and that when surveyed at Portsmouth as a new vessel she was so utterly worthless that she had to be almost built again? Were those facts? If so, whoever was responsible, they constituted a right to urge on the First Lord that there had been gross neglect and mismanagement. Bad materials had been put into a new vessel, and the public had been involved in very great and wholly unnecessary expense. He did not blame the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Goschen), who of all First Lords had had least to do with it; but in the position he now held he had a great responsibility; and they ought to have from him an assurance that care would be taken that such clumsy workmanship should not be again passed. With regard to the Fury, an assurance had been given that the expenditure upon her should be limited. On Friday last it was his fortune to go over the Devastation, and such an extraordinary mass of machinery was never looked at by the eyes of humanity. She might be a ship, but she did not look like one; she might go to sea, but she did not look as if she ever could, or as if she was ever intended to go to sea. So extraordinary a structure he never looked at. He spoke under correction, but he believed the result of this first experiment in the Devastation produced on the Committee which sat upon the subject a feeling on their part that we had better be cautious about the Fury. As he had before observed, the right hon. Gentleman said there was to be a very limited expenditure on the Fury; but he would ask why there need be any expenditure at all. It appeared to him that the Government ought to be very cautious in regard to proceeding with any vessel like the Devastation, and that it would be better to suspend all the intended expenditure on the Fury until they knew a little more about the success which might attend the experiment of the Devastation. Although he did not think the right hon. Gentleman opposite was so much carried away as his Predecessor by a desire to economize, yet there were several recent cases, something akin to that of the Osborne, which tended to bring anything like fair and legitimate economy as regarded naval affairs into ridicule. He would now make a few remarks on what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman respecting an iron-clad ship which the Admiralty were going to build, and which was to be an improved Sultan. A few days ago he saw the Sultan, and a noble ship she undoubtedly was; but the proposed improvement of the Sultan raised the very important question—Who is responsible for the construction of the Navy? Lately,

Mr. Reed, a gentleman of great ability, held the responsible office of Chief Constructor of the Navy; but he was no longer at the Admiralty, in consequence of some unfortunate misunderstanding during the administration of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract. [Mr. CHILDERS: There was no misunderstanding.] There might have been no misunderstanding; but, at all events, Mr. Reed had left the Admiralty, and at the present moment their Navy was in a most unsatisfactory position as regarded the construction of iron-clad men-of-war. As a gallant Admiral had pointed out in a recently-published pamphlet, a struggle was going on between the gun on the one hand, and the ship on the other, and it was difficult to foresee what would be the ultimate result; but, at all events, the result at that moment of the various experiments which had been tried during the last few years with regard to their iron-clad men-of-war showed that, while we had incurred a gigantic expenditure — of which, however, he did not complain — the great question of the principles on which our iron-clads ought to be constructed remained a matter of great difficulty and doubt. He was not speaking in any party spirit or spirit of complaint, but from a feeling of anxiety respecting one of the most important questions affecting the power and interest of this country, which was still standing in a most unsatisfactory and unsettled position. They had, at least, a right to know who was responsible for the administration of this important branch of our naval department—who was responsible for the construction of our ships, and who was to determine whether the ship about to be built would really be an improved Sultan. In conclusion, he earnestly appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to inform the Committee who was to succeed Mr. Reed as the head of the constructive branch of the service.

MR. LAIRD said, he also concurred with the right hon. Baronet who had just spoken as to the desirableness of knowing who was to be the responsible party for the constructive department of the Navy. He also wished to ascertain from the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the Osborne, was defective in design or in workmanship. If she were defective in design, perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would state who designed her; and if her construction was faulty, who was to blame for that?

MR. GOSCHEN said, the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich had complained that his right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract had answered a question with regard to the Osborne, and had stated that some inconvenience arose from the fact that there were two right hon. Gentlemen on the Government side of the House who had filled the post of First Lord of the Admiralty. But precisely the same inconvenience arose with regard to the opposite side of the House, because when he (Mr. Goschen) had disposed of the right hon. Member for Tyrone he had to deal with the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich. The question respecting the Osborne had been pointedly put by the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Laird), who asked whether the vessel was defective in design or in workmanship. Now, there could be no doubt the original mistake made in the Osborne was that the outer skin was of too soft a material—namely, fir. That mistake was committed by those who were responsible for the design and the specification of the ship, and it was stated that this was done during the tenure of office of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Corry). The inner skin was of hard wood, while the outer skin was of soft wood, and in driving in the bolts which passed through the soft to the hard material, a larger hole was made in the former than ought to have been the case, and leaks then occurred through that process. If, however, there had been more careful workmanship this might have been avoided; and although it was a mistake to have soft material, yet blame was attributable to the Pembroke Dockyard in reference to the work on this ship. Of all the cases which had come into notice during his tenure of office, that was the one he most regretted as regarded the management of a dockyard. He quite concurred with the remark of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Tyrone, that however costly the work of the Admiralty might be, it was well done as a general rule. He trusted, therefore, neither the Committee nor the country would regard that as a fair specimen of dockyard work. This matter, however, he might remark, had nothing whatever to do with economy.

Sir John Pakington

As regarded the Fury, the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich asked the Admiralty not to proceed with her, because he had no confidence in the Devastation. If the right hon. Gentleman would read the Report of the Committee of Designs, he would find that they recommended the Devastation as the type of the fighting ship of the future, and also that they warned the Government against proceeding at once with the Fury. The main question raised with regard to the Devastation was, whether the fore-castle was high enough, and it was pointed out that in case this question was answered in the negative, a similar defect could easily be avoided in completing the Fury. Therefore, nothing would be done with the Fury which could cause any difficulty in changing the design in case it was found desirable to do so. The Admiralty was not proceeding in the dark with regard to this question. The designs had been examined by naval officers of the highest experience, as well as by eminent scientific men, who reported, perhaps, more strongly than the Admiralty altogether approved on ships of the Devastation class; in fact, it was already determined not to build any more ships of the Sultan and Hercules class. He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman wished him to name the particular individual who was responsible for the design of the improved Sultan, but he would describe to the Committee the precise way in which the design was arrived at. The scientific gentlemen in the Constructor's department prepared the plans, and the Committee of Designs paid a very high compliment in their Report to Mr. Barnaby, and the gentlemen who assisted him. The designs had also been submitted to naval officers who were perfectly conversant with the construction of the Sultan, and were able to make suggestions for the improvement of the model on which she was built. The main difference between the Sultan and the improved vessel was, that in the latter the armour-plating would be thicker, and her bow-fire would consist of four 18-ton guns instead of two guns of 12 tons each.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he did not intend for a moment to depreciate the ability of Mr. Barnaby, or of the gentlemen associated with him; but what the right hon. Gentleman had stated did not alter his opinion that at the present time the state of the Construction department at the Admiralty was far from being satisfactory.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he ought to have added to what he had just said that the re-construction of the Construction and the Control departments of the Admiralty, had for the last six or nine months been a subject of anxiety at the Admiralty. It had been found impossible to deal with the subject pending certain inquiries which were still proceeding, and which affected the Admiralty to a certain extent. With regard to the appointment of a new Constructor, he did not think it would be well to proceed with that until he had had a brief opportunity of consulting whoever might be hereafter appointed Controller, as to the best arrangements to be made for the future.

MR. SCOURFIELD wished to know clearly who was responsible for the fact that in building the Osborne fir was used instead of teak?

MR. GOSCHEN said, the suggestion was made to the Admiralty by the dockyard officials, and adopted.

MR. LIDDELL, in reference to the right hon. Gentleman's statement as to the Sultan, said, he wished to ask in the name of common sense, whether it was wise to build such vessels, according to the idea of a sailing ship, or, whether they ought not rather to build such vessels without any reference to their sailing power, but merely with regard to their being guided by steam, and upon which they would be able to put as much armour as would be necessary? Authorities on the matter, who saw her, considered she was unsafe to send to sea under sail. He wished to know how long the present competition between gun and iron was to continue? Iron ships were constructed to resist artillery, and then a gun was invented to sink the ship, and he asked in the cause of economy whether the time had not come for stopping the competition?—that they should not build ships for carrying these enormous masses of iron solely, but for the purpose of fighting our battles—ships easily armed and capable of resisting, if possible, the artillery of the day, but at all events they should not build sailing ships that were not seaworthy.

MR. GOSCHEN said, the question had been carefully considered both by the Admiralty, and the Committee of Designs, and the conclusion arrived at was that it was impossible to tell where the services of fighting ships would be required, it would not be wise to rely upon steam vessels which could only carry a limited quantity of fuel, and were thus confined to the range of their coaling depôts.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) as to the undesirability of discarding sailing ships of war, and wished to urge further the importance of not building fighting ships with too low freeboards. His hon. Friend the Member for South Northumberland not only advocated the necessity of doing away with masts altogether, but of adopting a low freeboard and heavy armour. But experience had shown that such ships were in danger in heavy seas, and the occasional advantage which they would possess when opposed to an enemy would scarcely compensate for the continual disadvantages to which they would be exposed. He had taken occasion at an earlier period of the Session to allude to our wooden iron-clads. At that time it was intended to repair the Prince Consort, but since then that intention, as he understood, had been abandoned, and as others might be in the same faulty condition, it might perhaps be as well that the right hon. Gentleman should give some information about the state of the remaining vessels which went to swell the apparent number of our iron-clad fleet. With regard to the Devastation, the Thunderer, and the Fury, he thought the right hon. Gentleman had scarcely carried the Committee with him as to the advisability of building the three vessels at once. The design had not as yet been tried either in the case of the Devastation or the Thunderer, and, therefore, it might perhaps be as well to delay the expenditure on the Fury till it was seen what kind of vessels the two former turned out to be. It also appeared that the plan to be adopted with regard to the Cyclops was to be pursued in the case of two other ships of the same class.

MR. SHAW - LEFEVRE explained that though the Estimates were framed to include the two other vessels, it was only intended at present to proceed with the Cyclops, and that the question with regard to the other two vessels remained undetermined.

Mr. Goschen

SIR JOHN HAY said, he could not regard the hon. Gentleman's explanation as thoroughly satisfactory. It had been stated that shortly before the Conservative Government left office his right hon. Friend near him (Mr. Corry) had some correspondence with Pembroke Yard with respect to the construction of a light vessel for a Royal yacht. But the vessel was not begun, and when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract came into office, he postponed the building of the vessel. When, therefore, it was determined to construct the vessel, the designs, which had never received the approval of the Chief Controller of the Navy or the Chief Constructor, ought to have been revised. He trusted that the matter would receive careful consideration.

MR. CHILDERS said, that when he took office he found that the Osborne had been commenced on details absolutely approved of by his predecessors. Her progress was delayed for some time, and when it was re-commenced, it was carried out on the instructions given by his right hon. Friend opposite.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he was not aware that any instructions were given, or that the Osborne had been commenced. The matter was earnestly and carefully considered.

MR. CHILDERS said, he could only repeat that the most precise instructions were given by his predecessors, and he had not altered them. The question of good workmanship was quite distinct.

MR. CORRY said, there could be no objection to the use of fir, provided the proper quality was used.

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply to the remarks of the hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir John Hay), said, that with regard to the Osborne, it was distinctly asserted by those competent to determine upon the matter, not that the fir used in the construction of the ship was bad, but that it was a mistake to employ such a soft wood as fir at all. With regard to the Thunderer and the Fury, only 386 tons of the former vessel remained to be completed at Pembroke, and the work which it was proposed to execute on the Fury would embrace no controverted point of naval architecture. He was informed that the work to be done upon her during the next month or two would enable her to be turned into any kind of iron-clad; and he might also take that opportunity of informing them that it was not proposed to repair the Prince Consort this year. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Tyrone laid down six of the Audacious class, which had gone a long way to replace the wooden ships, and now it was proposed to build two iron-clads besides the Fury; and concurring in what had been stated—that it would be unwise to proceed further with iron-clads until they had obtained further information, the subject had been under the consideration of the Board.

LORD HENRY SCOTT asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, whether, in the face of the fact that a 50-ton iron gun could be manufactured which could pierce any iron-clad ship afloat, he was prepared to go on with the construction of iron-clad vessels?

MR. GOSCHEN said, that 50-ton guns had not yet been constructed, nor a ship that could carry them; in fact, it was a problem of difficult solution. Our ships were mainly designed to fight others, and we should not be justified in altogether refusing to build iron-clads which were strong enough to meet all the existing iron-clads of other Powers, simply because there was a possibility of a 50-ton gun being hereafter invented, and ships built to carry them. Experiments, however, would be instituted by the Admiralty to elucidate the question raised by Admirals Elliot and Ryder.

MR. RYLANDS said, he did not think it right to put the Committee to the trouble of dividing, especially as the First Lord had modified some of the statements which he had made in introducing the Navy Estimates. He was glad to have it understood that the additional number of men put on at the time of the panic in 1870, were only to be considered as being maintained for a temporary purpose, and that the number would be reduced to the maximum proposed by the right hon. Member for Pontefract. Before sitting down, he wished to explain that his object was not to strike at the maintenance of Government dockyards, as he was quite aware of the necessity of keeping up the dockyards for the repairs and re-fitting of the Fleet; but he was anxious to urge upon the Committee the desirableness of limiting, as far as possible, the manufacture of vessels and stores by the Government, and of purchasing from private manufacturers and shipbuilders, wherever it could be done advantageously. He thought it had been clearly shown that the cost of manufacturing in the dockyards was considerably higher than in private yards. In withdrawing his Amendment, he hoped that good might arise out of the long discussion which had taken place.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(3.) £68,344, Victualling Yards.

MR. CORRY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, whether his attention had been directed to the mooted question of the propriety of having the victualling yards placed under naval superintendence; the change introduced in 1869-70 having been objected to by all the naval authorities who were consulted on the subject, including Sir Sydney Dacres, the first naval adviser of the Crown? Those authorities were in favour of his opinion, which was, that those establishments should be placed under naval management not only in reference to the service in time of peace, but more especially with reference to the possible contingency of war.

MR. CHILDERS, referring to the change made in 1869 and 1870 in that matter, said, that formerly at Portsmouth and Devonport a naval officer superintended both the hospital and the victualling yard, the hospital at Chatham being under medical superintendence. The conclusion at which he had arrived was that it would be better to have the hospitals placed under the superintendence of medical officers, both at Devonport and Portsmouth, and the question then arose whether the Captain superintendent should be retained for the extremely limited duties of the victualling. He arrived at the conclusion that this was not expedient. His right hon. Friend, however, was not quite accurate in saying that the change was objected to by all the naval officers consulted. Of those who were strongly in favour of the change was Lord John Hay, the junior Naval Lord directly superintending this department.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he must support the view taken by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Corry). He entirely differed from the right hon. Member for Pontefract as to the naval element in the management of those hospitals,

There was a great body of naval evidence in favour of the old system, and he hoped that the present First Lord of the Admiralty would consent to revert to it.

SIR JOHN HAY remarked that at the time the Duke of Somerset's Committee was sitting the then Secretary to the Admiralty had given evidence that nine persons out of ten who had been consulted, including Sir James Hope and Sir William Martin, had stated that it was a mistake to take away the naval officers from these yards; and not only that, but the Duke of Somerset himself and Sir Sydney Dacres were of the same opinion. On the only occasion when any pressure had been put upon the department—namely, when a quantity of provisions had to be sent to Paris, the undertaking was but imperfectly carried out in consequence of this injudicious change. In his own opinion the appointment of civilians in the place of naval officers over these yards had been most unsatisfactory.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he entirely agreed with the right hon. Baronet who had spoken last, that the efficiency of this branch of the Department had suffered from the appointment of civilians in place of naval men over it. That was a specimen of the way in which the paltry reduction in the aggregate Estimates had been made to enable the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government to fulfil his pledge to reduce the amount of the Estimates, and that end had been brought about by crippling the efficiency of every branch of the service he had touched. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty would revert to the old practice with respect to the victualling yards, and would again place them under the control of experienced naval officers in place of second-class clerks.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that in view of the fact that nothing of an unsatisfactory character had occurred at the victualling yards during his term of office, he must decline to put an end to the existing system, which he thought had been proved to work well, until it had had, at all events, a fair trial.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE remarked that the only time that any strain had been put upon that system it had broken down.

Lord Henry Lennox

MR. GOSCHEN said, on the contrary, his opinion was that it did not break down.

MR. CORRY said, whatever the right hon. Gentleman might think, it was in the evidence before the Duke of Somerset's Committee, that the civil authorities had forgotten that it was necessary to provide a ship when provisions were to be carried across the water.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) £59,926, Medical Establishments.

SIR JOHN HAY wished to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty how it was that when 11 of the crew of the Rinaldo were wounded in an attack upon a piratical community on the coast of Sumatra there was no medical man on board to attend to them? It was of the first importance that when ships were ordered on such expeditions they should carry surgeons.

MR. GOSCHEN explained that on the occasion in question the chief surgeon belonging to the Rinaldo had been directed by the Commander in Chief in China to attend to the hospital at Hong Kong, and that at the same time the assistant surgeon was laid up by illness at Singapore.

DR. BREWER said, he should like to know what had been the cause of the want of dental efficiency in both services, and whether it was contemplated to have any dental service in the establishment?

MR. SHAW - LEFEVRE said, the subject of dental surgery as practised in the Navy had not been specially brought under the notice of the Admiralty. He would suggest, however, that the hon. Gentleman should do so himself.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) £18,728, Marine Divisions.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £928,510, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of Naval Stores for Building, Repairing, and Outfitting the Fleet and Coast Guard, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1873."

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £818,626, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of Half Pay, Reserved, and Retired Pay to Officers of the Navy and Royal Marines, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1873."

MR. CORRY said, he must object to proceeding with it, because he wished to raise an important question as to the retirement of naval officers.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir James Elphinstone.)

MR. GOSCHEN urged that the discussion should proceed at once.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he also objected to the Vote being discussed, and would recommend that the next Vote, No. 16, should be taken.

MR. CORRY again urged his objection that it was too late—midnight—to discuss the question of naval retirement.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that, under the circumstances, he would consent to postpone the Vote.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(6.) £638,311, Military Pensions and Allowances.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE took occasion to call attention to the case of Mr. Burgess, late engineer of Her Majesty's ship of war Lucifer, to whom, at the outset of the Crimean War, the Russian Government, he being at the time in their service, offered a large salary to remain, which he declined to accept, on the ground that he could not work against his own country. He then found his way home to England, and served for 17 years, and found himself discharged from the Navy at the age of 75, with only a bonus of £100. He had a wife who was 70 years of age, and he saw nothing between them and the workhouse, although he had acted so nobly, and was one of the most honourable and finest fellows he had ever seen. If the Government did not come to his aid, all he could say was that he should ask his friends to join him in the endeavour to relieve him, so that he might be enabled to pass the rest of his days respectably. He must do the Admiralty the justice to say that they had done their best with the Treasury to put the matter right, but they were met with difficulties arising out of the Superannuation Act.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, that the hon. and gallant Baronet was correct in saying that the difficulty in the case was that it did not come under the provisions of the Superannuation Act, and that the Government could not do as the hon. and gallant Baronet wished without violating the law. There was no way of obtaining a pension for Mr. Burgess except by asking the House of Commons for a Vote for the purpose.

MR. G. BENTINCK said, he thought the case was one of entirely an exceptional character. Mr. Burgess had given up a lucrative employment in a foreign country because he would not work against his own, and our honour required that his claim should not be neglected.

MR. LIDDELL said, he supported the claim, and must contend that it would be most impolitic to do anything which would tend to discourage men like Mr. Burgess from coming back to give their services to the country in time of emergency.

MR. A. GUEST said, he would suggest that for a sum of £200 or £300 an annuity might be purchased which would enable Mr. Burgess to end his days in comfort. He further thought it was impossible to decide in any other way than in favour of the policy of so acting as to hold out an inducement to others to follow his example.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that the Admiralty and the Treasury had done the best they could under the circumstances, but that the Government had not felt justified in going beyond the limits of the law in dealing with the case. After the views which had been expressed with respect to it, however, he would bring it again under the consideration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, while he must add that it would be, in his opinion, a most dangerous precedent. But individual cases which were not met by the Act of Parliament should, as they arose, be brought before that House.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, he thought the case one deserving of consideration. The gentleman referred to had given up a lucrative position in the Russian service, and having served his country for 17 years was in his old age left without the means of maintaining himself. The circumstances showed that he was a man who deserved well of his country.

SIR JOHN HAY wished to know, whether the right hon. Gentleman had considered the question of the number of Admiralty clerks with reference to which he had been in communication with the right hon. Gentleman? In the Estimates for 1868-9, the number of clerks and writers at the Admiralty was 445; it was now 507.

MR. SHAW - LEFEVRE said, the figures quoted by the hon. Baronet were quite erroneous, and not to be relied upon. He would, however, grant the hon. and gallant Baronet the Return he wished for.

In answer to Mr. DICKINSON,

MR. GOSCHEN said, the question of pensions was taken into consideration on the question of the pay of seamen and marines. The pay of seamen of the Royal Navy was less than that of other seamen, but they had the prospect of pensions held out to them. If the pensions were struck off, their wages must be increased in proportion. The Admiralty attended to the question of pensions with the greatest care. No more pensions were given than absolutely necessary.

MR. DICKINSON said, he would suggest that for the sake of diminishing drunkenness on the part of the pensioners, arrangements should be made to pay their pensions weekly instead of monthly.

Vote agreed to.

(7.) £309,185, Civil Pensions.

(8.) £156,700, Freight of Ships (Army Department).

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow;
Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (WARDS) BILL—[BILL 102.]

(Mr. Winterbotham, Mr. Secretary Bruce.)

CONSIDERATION. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [22nd April], "That the Bill be now taken into Consideration."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that on a former occasion the hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill (Mr. Winterbotham) had not the opportunity of informing the House as to the number of

Sir John Hay

Petitions and Memorials which had been presented in favour of an alteration of the law, such as was now proposed. He might, however, be able to supply the deficiency now; but whether so or not, he (Mr. J. Lowther) was of opinion that very little need existed for anything of the kind; and that if it did, or there was any glaring evil connected with it, the House would have been deluged with Petitions upon the subject. The boundaries of boroughs were set out under the Municipal Act of 1835, and, with the exception of the Act of 1859, the system established by the former Act had not been interfered with. Under the present law two-thirds of the members of a town council might memorialize the Judge of Assize, who would appoint a barrister to determine what alteration, if any, should be made in the boundaries of the wards; but the present Bill proposed that one-third of the town council should have the power, and that the authority to whom the application should be made should be the Home Office, and not the Judge of Assize. Such an alteration, however, might lead to the mischievous and pernicious result which a similar provision had given rise to in America, and which was known as "Jerry-mandering," resulting in the practice, that the moment any political party was dissatisfied with the result of the elections, they proceeded to set the law in motion for an alteration of the constituencies. He therefore hoped the House would not accept the present Bill, and he would move, as an Amendment, that the Bill be taken into consideration on that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months,"—(Mr. James Lowther,)—instead thereof.

MR. STEVENSON said, that according to the present law no change could be effected unless two-thirds of the whole number of councillors agreed to the proposal. Many attempts had been made to procure those two-thirds, and they had always failed; in the borough he represented, for instance, there existed a great necessity to alter the wards, in order to adapt them to an entire change of circumstances and a great increase of the population; and they were landed in the difficulty of not being able to accomplish that object for want of the Bill now before the House. This Bill was therefore necessary, and he hoped the House would pass it.

COLONEL WILSON - PATTEN said, that the proposed change would be very great, and ought not to be agreed to without much consideration; in fact, he knew of one or two instances in which it would lead to great abuse. It was the less excusable to proceed in the way now proposed, because there was another mode of arriving at the same object by means of Provisional Orders, and without the expense of a private Bill. His hon. Friend (Mr. J. Lowther) had, therefore, done good service in opposing the Motion, and if he went to a division he should support him.

MR. GOLDNEY said, that if the question was opened at all, they ought to go further than was contemplated by this Bill. There were 60 or 70 boroughs where the municipal boundaries shut out about one-third of the population of the town, and that was an evil which ought to be redressed. He should support the Motion of the hon. Member for York (Mr. J. Lowther).

MR. LEEMAN said, he differed from his hon. Colleague (Mr. J. Lowther) in his views of the Bill, which he regarded as a necessity arising from the outgrowth of the large towns since the passing of the Municipal Reform Act 37 years ago. While it might have been better to have brought the suburbs of towns within more extended municipal boundaries, yet if that question was not yet ripe for legislative action, that formed no valid reason why the country should not avail itself of so much of good as was proposed by the Bill of the Government. The large towns had so extended themselves as to present the greatest possible discrepancies between the number of councillors and the number of municipal electors and values of properties in the different wards. It had been his (Mr. Leeman's) lot to have filled municipal office, almost from the passing of the Municipal Reform Act, in the City represented by his hon. Colleague and himself (York), and having watched the outgrowth of that City, he could give no better illustration of the necessity for some means of revision of existing wards and of equalizing municipal representation from time to time in all their large towns than the City of York presented at that moment. This was the relative condition of the six wards into which the City was divided—Bootham, town councillors, 6; electors, 709; gross rental, £20,406; acres, 98; Micklegate, town councillors, 6; electors, 2,163; gross rental, £50,357; acres, 1,049; Castlegate, town councillors, 6; electors, 728; gross rental, £19,769; acres, 61; Monk-town, councillors, 6; electors, 2,238; gross rental, £28,972; acres, 440; Guildhall, town councillors, 6; electors, 537; gross rental, £17,201; acres, 25½; Walmgate, town councillors, 6; electors, 1,573; gross rental, £23,892; acres, 296. In other words, the three smaller wards, covering 184 statute acres, and with an aggregate of 1,974 voters, occupying property of the gross estimated rental of £57,376, were represented in the town council by 18 councillors, whereas the three larger wards, covering 1,785 statute acres, and capable of continued expansion, had so grown out as now to number 5,974 electors, or thrice the number of electors in the three smaller wards; and the three larger wards having a gross estimated rental of £103,221, or nearly double that of the three smaller wards, were yet only represented by the same number of councillors. He (Mr. Leeman) had returns from Leeds, Hull, Newcastle, Birmingham, and other places, all more or less presenting the same discrepancies as the result of the constant increase and outgrowth of our cities and towns, and all showing the necessity for power to town councils to seek from time to time such revision of their wards or the equalization of their representation as was proposed to be given by the Bill, and which the existing law failed to secure. He could not therefore support the views expressed by his hon. Colleague against the Bill, but for the reasons he had stated was prepared to give it his hearty support.

MR. CAWLEY held that the Bill was not required, as the Bill of last year had made all the alterations needed. The measure now before the House would change the whole principle under which that work had hitherto been done, for it would place the machinery at the absolute disposal of the Secretary of State, who might then alter wards as he chose. By one portion of the Bill it was proposed to give to one-third of the council a power equivalent to that of the majority, and such a scheme would strike at the root of municipal government.

Mr. WINTERBOTHAM said, that the criticisms hitherto passed upon the Bill differed from those made in the present discussion. In the debate on the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Boston (Mr. Collins) no attempt was made to show that the measure contained the dangerous elements indicated by the hon. Member for York (Mr. J. Lowther). The whole object of the Bill was to carry out the Act of 1859, which had proved a dead letter. Under that Act it was provided that the initiative might be taken by two-thirds of the council, who were to go out of office. He thought it was hardly to be expected that they should make such a sacrifice. It was alleged that fresh powers were to be conferred on the Secretary of State, but he would have no more power in the matter than the Commander-in-Chief.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, there was an essential difference between this Bill and the Bill of 1859. The principle of the Bill of 1859 was that the majority should take the initiative; but the principle of this Bill was that the minority should take the initiative. He protested against conferring such a power, and until he had heard better reasons urged for the change it would meet with his opposition.

Mr. WHEELHOUSE said, he should like to know what was the object of placing the Order which was to be made on the Table of the House? If the Bill were adopted, it would work a change through every municipality in England. In boroughs, where everything was done by persons under political bias, the result would be that they would come to the Privy Council, when they had a majority, with just such a scheme as they thought desirable for their own purposes. If the question of municipalities was to be dealt with at all, it should be by a large and comprehensive measure, and not piecemeal, as this Bill proposed to do.

Mr. DODDS, in opposing the Amendment, said, there was imperative need in the borough he represented for the provisions of the measure under notice.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 78; Noes 38: Majority 40.

Mr. Cawley

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered.

Mr. CAWLEY moved an Amendment, in line 16, page 2, to the effect that a majority of the council or one-third of the ratepayers of the borough should have the power of making the recommendation to the Privy Council.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 16, to leave out the word "either."—(Mr. Cawley.)

Mr. WINTERBOTHAM said, the Amendment was really the same one on which they had just divided, and he hoped the hon. Gentleman would, therefore, not press it.

Question put, "That the word 'either' stand part of the Bill."

The House divided:—Ayes 72; Noes 30: Majority 42.

Bill to be read the third time To-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 28th May, 1872.

MINUTES.] — NEW WRIT ISSUED — For Oldham, v. John Platt, esquire, deceased.

NAVY — CHATHAM DOCKYARD — RAILWAY CONNECTION.—QUESTION.

MR. HOLMS asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is intended to connect the Dockyard and Government Establishments at Chatham with the Railway system of the Country; and, if so, when it is likely that the necessary steps for this purpose will be taken?

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply, said, that it was intended to connect the Dockyard at Chatham with the railway system of the country. There had been an agreement with the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company to make a branch line to the Dockyard at Chatham, and three years were given for that purpose. Owing to the difficulties in which that Company found itself in regard to undertaking any new works, the arrangement fell through. Since then various negotiations had been conducted with different promoters, but no resolution had been arrived at. The attention of the Admiralty had, however, been directed to the subject.

ARMY RE-ORGANIZATION — COUNTY MILITARY DEPOT CENTRES.

QUESTION.

MR. GOURLEY asked the Secretary of State for War, If he will state to the House the exact nature of a County Military Depot Centre; how many battalions of the line, if any, are intended to be quartered at one time in each Centre; and, if these Depot Centres are merely for the purpose of training recruits, afterwards to be drafted into the regiments of their respective Counties at such places, either at home or abroad, where they may happen to be stationed?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, the exact nature of a county military depot centre is stated fully in the Report of General M'Dougall's Committee, which has been laid upon the Table. Detailed particulars are given in Appendix H. Speaking generally, it is to be the military head-quarters of a brigade district. The brigade will consist of two battalions of the Line, two of Militia, and the Volunteers within the district. The depot battalion will be localized there, and the permanent Staff of the Militia, and, as far as convenience will admit, that of the Volunteers. The recruits, both for the Line and Militia, will be trained there. The station will be made available, as far as convenience will admit, for the training of the Volunteers. Officers of Militia and Volunteers will obtain instruction there, and the arms of the Militia, and, so far as convenience may admit, of the Volunteers, will be stored there. Of the two other regular battalions of the brigade, one will be abroad and the other quartered in the United Kingdom wherever the public service may require, whether in its own district or elsewhere.

FRANCE—DEPORTATION OF POLITICAL PRISONERS—CORRESPONDENCE.

QUESTION.

MR. MUNDELLA asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he is prepared to state to the House the substance of any Correspondence with the Government of France on the continued deportation of political prisoners to this Country; and, whether, seeing that batches of these unfortunate persons continue to arrive in a state of absolute destitution, the Government of France cannot be made responsible for their temporary maintenance?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, Her Majesty's Government have been and are still in active correspondence with the French Government on the subject of the deportation of political prisoners to this country, and I can assure the hon. Member and the House that there shall be no unnecessary delay in laying the Correspondence before Parliament. I am not at present in a position to reply to the latter portion of the hon. Gentleman's Question.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA).

THE INDIRECT CLAIMS.

THE SUPPLEMENTAL ARTICLE.

QUESTION.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, before making the inquiry of Her Majesty's Government which I have placed on the Paper in accordance with the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman, I desire, with the permission of the House, to make a remark explanatory of the reasons which induce me to put it. These are critical times and circumstances, and I do not wish that my motives should be in any way misapprehended. I do not call in question in any degree the ancient and salutary Prerogative of the Crown as regards the negotiation of treaties; but every rule has some exception, and the application of a principle must be influenced, to a certain extent, by circumstances. This consideration applies to the present case, because, from the first, Parliament generally, has been associated with the negotiations carried on with the United States. The House will remember that when Her Majesty was advised to commence these negotiations, now a long time ago, Her Majesty, to a certain degree, called Parliament to her Councils. The negotiations were not entrusted merely to the Representative of this country at Washington, but a High Commission was appointed, and the most important Members of that Commission were selected from both Houses of Parliament. I put this Question also because, as the House must have observed, a new mode of conducting negotiations has been introduced in connection with this matter. I refer to the mode of proceeding by "understanding," and not by precise expression, which has hitherto been the mode approved by those who have engaged in the diplomatic office. This being on my mind, and the new method of proceeding by "understanding" being one which has not succeeded, and which ought to be arrested in its course, I do not see in what manner I could better achieve my object than by asking the right hon. Gentleman to advise the Crown that the control of Parliament should be exercised, to a certain degree, over these negotiations. I therefore think it my duty to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to submit the Terms of the Supplementary Treaty with the Government of the United States to the consideration of Parliament previous to its ratification?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the Question put to me by the right hon. Gentleman really requires no apology whatever; but the reasons given for it are such that I must be understood to reserve my liberty to demur to them. The right hon. Gentleman says—and says truly—that this case is in a great degree exceptional. One of his reasons for regarding it as exceptional is that a new mode of conducting negotiations—namely, by "understanding"—has been introduced, and he thinks it necessary that a check should be put on that mode of proceeding. It is obviously quite impossible for the Government to give any information to Parliament, if the reasons put forward by the right hon. Gentleman for so doing are the only reasons which can be advanced in support of such a course, because his reason amounts to this—that the proceedings of the Government have been such that it is impossible safely to entrust them with the ordinary discretion exercised by the Executive Government. I think the right

hon. Gentleman must see that, however much that reason may weigh in his own mind, it cannot possibly have any force with us; and, indeed, it must operate precisely in the opposite direction. The House will do me this justice—that I have never defended the position of the British Government with regard to the Treaty of Washington on the ground of “understanding.” Indeed, I have been much blamed for declining to do so. I have said that we had a perfect right to speak of our intentions; but I have always contended that it was a great mistake to place the argument on the basis of “understanding.” That is not a matter which it is proper to enter upon now, and I will therefore address myself to the Question of the right hon. Gentleman. I hope the right hon. Gentleman did not suppose for a moment that I wished to find fault with his putting the Question yesterday. I wished him to put the Question on the Paper that I might answer him with perfect accuracy, instead of trusting to my memory, which is often apt to be treacherous. I was desirous of having an opportunity of referring to what had occurred upon a previous occasion. This is not a new transaction; it is the completion of an old one, and my memory impressed me with the belief that the rules which we had adopted last year were perfectly applicable to the present case. What I have now to say is an answer to the Question put to me yesterday by the right hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Horsman) as well as to the right hon. Gentleman. I was asked last year with regard to the Treaty of Washington a similar question, and I find I am reported to have answered as follows:—

“I am not able, Sir, to name the particular day of the arrival of the Treaty, of which we have not received a final Copy. When it does arrive, however, it will be immediately presented to Parliament. We shall, in this instance, depart from the general rule, and present the Treaty to Parliament, without waiting for its ratification, on account of special circumstances. Among these I may mention that the Treaty has been prematurely made known in America—by prematurely I mean contrary to the intentions of the Executive Government.”

That mode of procedure which was adopted last year we shall again adopt. The very nature of the case requires that an interval should elapse between the signature of the Treaty and the ratification of it. Because, whereas the signature may be directed to be made by telegraph on the part of either State to its Representative in that country, the ratification would require the exchange of the body of the Treaty itself, and therefore it requires the intervention of the time necessary for communication by post. The only other question that remains would be whether the Treaty in its terms would be communicated immediately on its being signed, without waiting for the arrival of the original instrument. That was done last year, and the Treaty was laid before Parliament on the 23rd of May. That will be done again in the present year, in the event of our arriving at the conclusion of any Supplementary Treaty. The conclusion of that Supplementary Treaty depends on the understanding between the two Governments as to the exact terms of an engagement which is not of a nature so perfectly simple as to be disposed of in a moment. But should that Treaty be concluded—and when it is concluded—the right hon. Gentleman will understand from what I have said that it will be immediately laid before Parliament, to place Parliament in possession of its authentic terms.

MR. BOUVERIE: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury the Question I have put on the Paper, in consequence of the answer I received yesterday from the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote)—namely, Whether the British Commissioners at Washington did communicate to the British Government that they had come to an understanding with the American Commissioners, and that a promise had been given by the latter that the Indirect Claims growing out of the acts of the “Alabama” should not be brought forward in the Arbitration; and, what were the terms of that promise, as reported by the British Commissioners?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I gathered from perusing the Question put by my right hon. Friend on the Notice Paper, as he has now stated, that it grew out of the terms of the answer given by my right hon. Friend opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote) yesterday to an inquiry then addressed to him. In what I have to say I hope I shall not be understood to convey—for I do not intend to convey—the smallest reflection on my right hon. Friend opposite. He acted in the exercise of his own discretion—I may say, in the exercise of his own right—and I own that I thought the answer which he offered in his place yesterday to my right hon. Friend behind me was—if I may presume to say so—a very just and proper answer. But in reference to this Question I wish to say to my right hon. Friend behind me, that our grounds for the contention we maintained in our correspondence with the American Government are fully set forth in the Despatches in possession of Parliament, and especially in the Despatch of the 20th of March, in which we set forth the various, and, as we think, amply sufficient, grounds for the doctrine and position we maintained with respect to the scope of the Treaty of Washington. I will not say—not having the whole of that Despatch in my mind—whether the word “understanding” occurs in it; but I will say that the general argument of that Despatch did not at all depend upon “understanding,” but upon statements therein very clearly and sufficiently given. It was quite competent for my right hon. Friend behind me to ask whether there was such an “understanding;” but he will, I hope, excuse me if I say that—our arguments being sufficiently before the world—I do not think any advantage would arise from our going back at this moment on the question whether or not there was an “understanding” between the Commissioners of the respective high contracting parties, or what were the precise terms of that understanding. It may or may not, at a future time, be right to enter into that matter; but for the present I must respectfully decline to do so, because the result of our going back now upon the grounds of the contentions of the respective Governments would only be mischievous when those Governments hope to escape from the effect of those contentions by another arrangement, should they be so happy as to conclude one.

MR. DISRAELI: Will there be any objection to the Papers which have been published in The London Gazette being laid before Parliament?

MR. GLADSTONE: There will be no objection to that.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he wished it to be clearly understood that he had not asked whether there was an “understanding;” but whether, as a matter of fact, the English Commissioners had reported that there was one, and in what terms they had reported it?

POLYNESIAN ISLANDERS.

QUESTION.

MR. EASTWICK asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether any information has been received that the water-logged vessel containing a number of dead and half-starved Polynesian Islanders, which was recently towed into a North Queensland Port by one of Her Majesty's Ships of War, is identical with the schooner “Peri,” which brought a cargo of kidnapped natives to Fiji from the Solomon Islands, and on board of which an attempt was made to shoot Mr. March; and, if not, if he can state to what Country the vessel belonged?

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, in reply, said, that according to the best information received by the Colonial and Foreign Offices, it was believed that the two vessels were identical. Further inquiries were being made, and any information received should be communicated to the House.

ARMY—TORPEDOES—CAPTAIN HARVEY.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN DAWSON-DAMER asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is true that Captain Harvey was rewarded with a donation of £1,000, and £500, for his disbursements for his invention in Torpedoes; whether the whole of the recompense he received was £938 6s. 8d., which was charged with Income Tax; and, whether such charge was legal, and upon what ground such tax was levied?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, Captain Harvey received £1,000 as remuneration for his discovery. I have no knowledge of the £500 at all. Income tax was deducted from the £1,000. The hon. Gentleman has not left me much to inquire whether that was legal or not. On the first blush of the matter I think its legality is questionable, and I would advise Captain Harvey to apply to the Inland Revenue Department if he entertains any doubt as to the legality of the charge.

Mr. Gladstone

PARLIAMENT—THE DERBY DAY.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House will, at the rising of the House this day, adjourn till Thursday next."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. T. HUGHES: On the last occasion of this kind I gave Notice that, if the Motion were made again, I should take the opinion of the House upon it, and I propose to do so to-day. I confess I am surprised that the Motion should again come from the Treasury bench, after the House has undeniably shown that its opinion upon this subject has changed during the past year. ["No, no!"] Perhaps hon. Gentlemen who cry "No, no!" will hear the reason I have for making that statement. If I am wrong the House will correct me. Previous to the present year there were always two occasions, and two only, when Motions of this kind were made. Those two occasions were, one a principal festival of the Christian year—namely, Ascension Day—and the other the principal festival of the English Turf—the Derby. On the 8th of this month the House passed a Resolution that hereafter—at all events for the present year—the usual adjournment which had taken place in previous years for the purpose of allowing Gentlemen who were so inclined to attend the services of their Church upon Ascension Day, should not be continued. The House decided, by a considerable majority, that there should be no suspension of Business. ["No, no!"] Well, I ask whether it is not the case that such a vote was taken on the 8th of this month? I happened to be absent, and I admit there is always a difficulty in ascertaining the reasons upon which the House acts unless one is present. But, so far as I could gather from the newspapers, the vote was of the nature I have described, and certainly the House did not adjourn as usual. The right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) said, I think, that there were a number of very important matters—Gas Bills, Railway Bills, Water Bills, and other measures interesting to the business public in general—which required to be attended to, and that we ought not to allow them to lie over for two hours, because some hon. Members were so old-fashioned and superstitious as to desire to attend Divine worship on the day of Ascension.

That I understood to be the opinion of the House, after carefully reading the reports of what took place on the occasion. Then, surely, when at the beginning of the month the House has refused hon. Members two hours for the purpose of public worship, it is not going to stultify itself at the end of the month by devoting a whole day to a purpose which I venture to think no one in the House will consider of the same importance as the other. Now, as to the first of the two festivals, it has been the custom to keep it in England for—I will not say 1,800 years, but at any rate since St. Augustin with his monks marched from the coast of Kent to Canterbury. That gives it a great start as compared with the festival of the British Turf, for which it is proposed to adjourn to enable hon. Members to spend to-morrow at the races. So far as I am aware, the festival of the Derby has not existed for 100 years. The other has, therefore, at any rate, had the start of more than 1,000 years. I am not going to compare the importance of the two institutions; but I will say that, at any rate, whatever the Christian religion may have done for the British nation—["Oh, oh!"]—hon. Gentlemen may cry, "Oh!" but they will have an opportunity of answering. ["Oh, oh!"] If the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke) has anything to say in opposition to what I am saying, he will have an opportunity to say it. Let us see what the other institution to which we are now about to give a special advantage has done for the British nation. I am told—I do not pretend myself to know much about it—that the British Turf has very much improved the breed of horses for the nation. I have doubts upon that subject. I know that many eminent authorities think that it is by no means the case. Without going into that question, however, as to which I am no authority, I do know what the British Turf has done for the British nation in other matters. It has given to the British nation a system of gambling the most corrupting, the most insidious, and therefore the most mischievous and abominable that has ever cursed any country in the world. Now, upon that subject I suppose most of us are, to a certain extent, authorities. Even in my own personal experience, in my own profession—which deals, of course, with matters of this kind—I have known hundreds of instances in which this system has been the absolute ruin of young men in this country. In the case of settlements under which I myself am trustee, I have had to raise for different families no less than upwards of £20,000 for youngsters who have lost it in gambling on the Turf, and all that money has gone into the pockets of some of the greatest rascals who remain unhung in this country. Therefore, I say, that the great festival of the English Turf is not a proper one to be recognized by this House in the manner now proposed. I have as great a love for sports as anyone in this House, and know as much about them as most hon. Members, and I say, that if we are to choose some sport for special recognition and distinction of this kind, do not let us choose the one which has done most harm, but some one which is doing good in the country. If anyone will move that this House should adjourn for the International Boat Race, or the Shooting Match between the Two Houses of Parliament at Wimbledon, or the Gentlemen v. the Players' Cricket Match, I would not oppose the House coming to such a vote as that. But when it is perfectly notorious to every Gentleman in the House what is the nature of the institution of the British Turf, we are, I think, stultifying ourselves, and setting an evil example to the country if we postpone all Business that is down for to-morrow for the purpose of allowing Gentlemen to celebrate their festival at Epsom. Let me point out to the House that the effect of rejecting the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman will be, not to stop anyone except, perhaps, a few hon. Members who would have to sit in Committee to-morrow, from going to the Derby, but merely to show that this House does not place the Turf festival above that of the Church. If the Motion of the Prime Minister should be rejected, any Gentleman may still go to the Derby as he may go to a dog fight or cock fight if such things still exist, or to a pigeon-shooting match, or any other manly sport of that kind, which this House does not specially recognize. Two years ago I brought into the House a Bill to deal with some of the worst portions of the present betting system. That Bill was received with a good deal of favour, and the House seemed willing to go into the matter. Then the Home

Mr. T. Hughes

Office took it out of my hands, and put my clauses into a Bill that they have had for two years before the House, and which deals with this question. In order, therefore, to provide some useful Business for to-morrow, as there seems to be no chance of the Government bringing on their Bill this year, I have placed a few short clauses in a little Betting Bill which I propose to bring before the House for a first reading to-night, and which I have put down for a second reading to-morrow.

MR. LOCKE: I wish to correct my hon. Friend as to some statements that he has made, for he is dreadfully afraid of the consequences that may result from no Business taking place here to-morrow. He need not be afraid, because no Committees are going to sit to-morrow, and therefore the case that he has alluded to is not at all analogous to that which was mentioned the other day by the right hon. Member for Kilmar-nock (Mr. Bouverie). The right hon. Member for Kilmar-nock based his opposition to the latter Motion on the ground that if the Committees did not sit until two hours after the usual time on Ascension Day, there would be a great delay in the Private Business of the House, and an unnecessary expenditure upon those interested in Private Bills, because although only two hours' work would be done, counsel and solicitors would have to be paid just the same as though a full day's work were performed. Now, no counsel will appear to-morrow before Committees—they will be at Epsom. My hon. Friend the Member for Frome (Mr. Hughes) will of course be there also, because in many instances I have found him extremely inconsistent. For the reason I have mentioned, his objection falls entirely to the ground. It certainly would have been hard that persons who had business before the Committees should be called upon to pay double for the services of counsel and solicitors. But in this case it is clearly understood that it will be a blank day with the Committees, and therefore no inconvenience of that sort will arise. I do not think that it is becoming in the hon. Member for Frome that he should get up and preach to us in the manner which he has done. We must all be well aware that there is a good deal of money lost by betting upon horses; but horses are not the only things upon which money is lost. Is there no such thing in connection with cards and with dice, and are there not thousands of modes by which people could be ruined if they would. There is no doubt at all that the breed of horses has been improved in this country by racing. I know nobody who doubts it except the hon. Member for Frome, and he did not express any very strong doubt, and only, in fact, asked our opinion upon the point. I sincerely hope that he will not divide the House upon this question. It is a sort of sanctimonious course that he is pursuing, and one may well be surprised that he, at all events, should have brought it before the House. I say this because we all know what were his pursuits in early life, and I repeat that I hope that we shall not be troubled to divide.

COLONEL BERESFORD said, he did not think the vote with regard to the adjournment on Ascension Day could be regarded as a test of the opinion of the House on the subject, because that division was taken unexpectedly, and even against the desire of the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie). The division was forced on by a small knot of hon. Members below the gangway, and after all they only obtained a majority of 5 in a House of less than 100 Members. He hoped that the hon. Member for Frome (Mr. Hughes) would not take the opinion of his hon. Friend (Mr. Locke), because he (Colonel Beresford) should be glad if he would divide the House, because then it would be seen what a small following he had, and probably he would not bring forward the question again next year.

MR. GLADSTONE: As I must say a few words upon this question, I will observe that it is perfectly clear that my hon. Friend (Mr. Hughes) has misapprehended the nature and authority of the vote given by the House in reference to Ascension Day, for the two questions have really no parallel. The special objection to this vote is taken upon the ground of the immorality that is unfortunately associated with the practice of horse racing; but the objection in reference to Ascension Day was certainly not the immorality of anything connected with that day. It has been truly said by the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Beresford) that the affair was an accident; and the division was accidental so far as the right hon. Member who made the Motion and the Members of the House in general were concerned. I believe that numbers of hon. Members were present in Committee at the time, and, hearing the bell ring, they thought it must be for a counting of the House, or for a division upon a Private Bill, or for some other purpose of the kind, and that it could not be for anything that required their attention. I may mention, as an illustration, that my hon. Friend the Member for Shaftesbury (Mr. Glyn) was placed in such a forlorn condition in that division as the representative of the Government, that he had not one on his own bench to accompany him in his telling, and was therefore obliged to fall back upon the good offices of the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Bass), in order to get somebody who would march with him up to the Table to announce the majority of 52 to 47. What I suppose to be the case is this—the House generally agrees with my hon. Friend in his denunciation of the foolish, vicious, and, I will say, ruinously vicious practice in many cases associated with what the House, notwithstanding, believes to be in itself a noble, manly, distinguished, and, I may say, historically national sport. The House is disposed, in looking at this sport, however, to feel that it is not bound to take cognizance—and it is not expedient to take cognizance—in connection with such a Motion as this, of those abuses which, though much to be deprecated, are not of necessity essentially connected with the sport itself. But if we are to take cognizance of these abuses—if we are to take our stand upon putting down these practices, which are of so vicious and detrimental a character—we should do something more decided than merely to decline to adjourn over to-morrow. We should endeavour to make these practices the subject of some aggressive action in our legislative capacity. Without entering any further into the excuses for this custom having come into use, I can only say I think it is a custom regarded by many who do not probably care much about the Derby as a security for the holiday. I do not think my hon. Friend the Member for Frome, in a division, will succeed in obtaining an accurate representation of the mind of the House, because I believe that many hon. Members who value the holiday will vote against him on that account, whilst some will vote against him on a question connected with the race itself.

COLONEL FRENCH remarked that for 30 years it had been the custom with the House to adjourn over the Derby Day; but it was not the custom formerly for the Motion for Adjournment to be made by the Government, but by an independent Member. The course was adopted, not so much for the Members of the House, but with a view to let the officers of the House take advantage of the holiday.

MR. BÉRESFORD HOPE said, he intended to vote against the Motion of the hon. Member for Frome as a protest against the division which took place with reference to Ascension Day. The reasons for the one adjournment and for the other were as different as possible, but in its external aspect the present Motion resembled that of the other day. Each was a Motion made without Notice, and calculated to disturb a well-established understanding. It should be borne in mind that many persons had made their arrangements for the Derby in anticipation of the usual holiday, and any sudden departure from the established custom would entail great and general inconvenience upon a large number of persons. He must conclude with the remark, that any Member who might appear in what he believed would be the majority in the present day, and who had also appeared in the unlucky majority on Ascension Day, would not be able to congratulate himself upon his consistency, or his regard for the feelings of other hon. Members.

ARMY—AUTUMN MANŒUVRES.

RESOLUTION.

MR. DIMSDALE, on rising to move a Resolution condemnatory of the selection of the period of harvest for the contemplated Autumn Manœuvres, said, he should not have troubled the House with this question if he had not received a large number of letters from farmers expressing their great anxiety on the subject. They felt that very great hardship would be experienced by farmers and their labourers if the manœuvres were held in harvest time. The issue before the House rested solely on a question of time. He wished to guard himself with this declaration, because he thought any one who had taken any interest in the improvement of the organization of the Army must have come to the conclusion that the Government were entitled to great credit for having introduced the system of military manœuvres. Last year the Secretary of State for War stated that it was well known that in Prussia it had been the custom for a long time as soon as the harvest was over to make the different branches of the military service go through a series of manœuvres. Why should not the military manœuvres in this country be held not during the harvest, but, as in Prussia, as soon as the harvest was over? One of the officials of the War Department stated last year that in many parts of the country the crops would probably not be gathered in in September. The farmers were very desirous of giving every encouragement to the manœuvres; but was it not imprudent on the part of the Government to select a period when crops were still standing in the field for the carrying out of these manœuvres? The carrying out of these manœuvres in August would not only be a great inconvenience to farmers, but a great injustice to their labourers, because it would occasion the loss of their harvest wages. First, as regarded the farmer, the evil was this—that every year, and now much more than formerly, he had great difficulty in obtaining a supply of agricultural labour at the period of harvest. That might be attributed to many causes—partly to emigration, partly to the migration going on from rural to urban districts, and partly to the cessation of a large supply of Irish labour that used to be employed in the gathering in of the harvest in this country. As regarded the position of the labourer, it was still harder. During the period of harvest he earned the largest amount of wages. In the county of Hertford the average amount of wages earned by an agricultural labourer was no more than 11s. or 12s. per week; but in the harvest his wages were generally increased to 30s. per week. During the harvest he earned money wherewith he could discharge the little debts he had contracted during the year, and put himself in a better position to meet the hard time of winter. The alarming strikes which had occurred in agricultural districts had an important bearing on the present question. A strike was a great evil in agricultural and manufacturing parts of the country, both to employers and employed; but it was an evil especially in an agricultural district, as preventing the gathering in of the harvest in the most favourable part of the year, and thereby tending to produce famine. Contracts for the harvest month have been more freely entered into than in any previous year between the employers and the employed, and such contracts would be seriously interfered with if the Autumn Manœuvres commenced at so early a period as the 31st of August. There was another way in which both labourers and farmers might be very much injured. If you deprived the labourers of their money earnings in harvest they would have nothing to fall back upon in the winter months; they would be forced to become inmates of the poor-house, and the farmers would have to pay enormously in the way of rates. Then there was another point to be taken into consideration—namely, the ill effects which so mischievous a proceeding would have on the feelings of the labourers themselves. The other day a working man with whom he was discussing the question said—"I see clearly what is the meaning of this. You are anxious to choose a time of the year which you think will be rather for the benefit of the rich than of the poor." And of this he felt certain, that if by any means a belief, however unfounded, should spring up in the minds of the masses, that Parliament in selecting a period for these manœuvres were balancing the amusement of the rich against the hard earnings of the poor, it would give rise to a feeling of alienation between classes which would entail evils in the future far more serious than any that had ever befallen this country in the past, or in the guise of physical calamity or political disaster. The right hon. Gentleman had never shown himself unreasonable where any fair proposal was made from the Opposition benches, and he trusted, therefore, he would consent to postpone the manœuvres to the 25th of September. Nothing would be more deplorable than that the success of these manœuvres should be interfered with by embittering the feelings of employers and employed in the agricultural districts. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, the selection of the period of harvest for the contemplated Autumn Manœuvres will interfere with the processes of agriculture, affect injuriously the interests of the cultivators of the soil, and inflict grave pecuniary hardship on the labourers in the rural districts."—(Mr. Dimsdale.)

MR. C. S. READ said, that usually the harvest was not completed even in the Southern and Eastern parts of England by the 31st of August, and he never knew such a large quantity of backward spring corn as this year. They could not tell now what sort of weather they would have this summer; but there was every probability of a long, lingering, and somewhat late harvest. He hoped, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman, instead of taking the Militia from the farmers at the time when they would most be wanted, would, if there was any necessity for it, allow the soldiers to help in gathering in the harvest, as they would probably be needed. Let the right hon. Gentleman consider the pay given to a Militiaman. A great deal had been said lately about the poor remuneration given by farmers to the labourer. But the Militiaman, besides his bounty, had only 9d. a-day, 1 lb of bread, and three-quarters of a pound of tough bull beef. The result was, no sooner did the Militiaman undertake his duties if he had a wife and family at home, than they often became chargeable on the parish, and the Guardians were so kind-hearted that, considering the man was discharging a duty, they invariably allowed out-door relief. With the increased rate of wages which the labourer was receiving it was only fair that the Militiaman should get better pay, and so be enabled to repay the relief given to his family.

MR. CARDWELL said, that the hon. Gentleman had brought forward his Motion in so friendly a tone that he presumed it was not intended to press it to a division, but that he had brought it forward as a mode of tendering advice in public that was more usually tendered in private, and which always received the most careful consideration of the Department. He could not agree to the terms of the Motion, and therefore he hoped the hon. Member would not give the House the trouble of dividing upon it. The hon. Gentleman might entirely relieve his mind from any notion that in making the proposed arrangements the authorities had considered one class of the community in preference to another. The military authorities could have no conceivable object except to choose the particular period which was most convenient to all classes of the public. The season of harvest was not the time really selected, but the period immediately after the harvest. ["No!"] If anybody thought that was not the case he should be happy to consider any suggestions supported by evidence to the contrary; but no such suggestions had reached him except in the form of this Motion. The history of the manœuvres of last year was extremely strong as an argument in favour of the proposal of the Government. He saw opposite his right hon. Friend (Sir John Pakington), who was present at the manœuvres last year, and who knew all the particulars. Last year's harvest was unusually late, and he had been very much pressed by some gentlemen to postpone the manœuvres until the 23rd of September, instead of allowing them to commence on the 9th, as he did. It was not without reluctance that he postponed them to so late a date as the 9th. What happened? They had the most beautiful weather, which contributed very much to making the manœuvres a great success. But on the 23rd of September a deluge of rain came on, which lasted for many days, and which had it fallen during the time of the manœuvres would have occasioned the greatest possible disappointment. What was the result agriculturally? The whole damage had been covered by a sum of £1,000. Was that any proof of injury to any agricultural interest? By the advice of the same eminent land surveyor by which he was guided last year he proposed to hold the manœuvres this year about one week earlier—that was to say, to begin on the 31st of August; and he had been assured there was no reason for apprehending that the damage to the farmers would be larger this year than it was last year, and in that point of view the agricultural interest of the district received no injury at all. He would not venture on the hazardous though ambitious office of weather prophet, or predict on the 28th of May what the weather would be in August or September. But in the region where they proposed to hold the manœuvres—namely, Salisbury Plain, the harvest last year, which had been exceptionally late, was over the first week in September. He had no object in view except to consult the general convenience. As to consulting the convenience of the rich rather than of the poor, the hon. Gentleman in making himself a tribune of the people to protect the interests of the poor would carry him along with him. What was really the state of the case? He supposed he was right in tracing the origin of this Motion to an invitation which had been given to the Hertfordshire Militia to join the manœuvres. The military authorities were desirous of making these manœuvres generally representative. He would have been glad that they could have gone to some parts of Ireland or Scotland for the scene of the manœuvres. He had made inquiries, and had found that the balance of advantages was in favour of the present proposal. The next point for consideration was how to make all parts of the country take an interest in the manœuvres. They had invited Militia and Volunteers from Scotland and Ireland, and among other counties they had thought Hertfordshire entitled to notice. Unfortunately for themselves they determined to pay Hertfordshire the compliment of inviting its Militia to join the manœuvres. The colonel of the regiment was very glad, but some agriculturists took the alarm. The moment the military authorities heard that, they released the Hertfordshire Militia from the engagement into which they had improvidently entered, thus forfeiting the advantage to be derived from their presence. All he could say was that the authorities had chosen the most convenient time, when the harvest would in all probability be over, and if the hon. Member were to consult the records of the weather for past years he would find that what had proved to be the most favourable season generally had been selected. If the time recommended by the hon. Gentleman had been chosen, he would find that the weather then had been usually most unfavourable.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON willingly answered the appeal made to him by his right hon. Friend. So far as he could judge as a spectator, nothing could be more successful than the manœuvres of last year, and he heartily wished that the meeting of the present year might be attended with equal success. But his right hon. Friend had used rather an odd argument with regard to the weather. His right hon. Friend said that, as last year they did not meet till September 9, when the weather was charming and the manœuvres entirely successful, therefore they should not meet at the same time this year, but some time earlier. [Mr. CARDWELL: A week earlier.] Last year the manœuvres began on September 9—this year they were appointed for August 31. If this were only a week, he did not take quite the same view as his right hon. Friend of the number of days which made up a week. No doubt the Secretary of State, in making an arrangement of this sort, had to balance various considerations between which it was not easy to decide; but he was rather surprised to find that his right hon. Friend did not follow the precedent of last year. Judging from his own experience, there were few years when they would find the harvest over by the 31st of August. It was desirable to avoid, as far as possible, any unnecessary risk of creating unpleasant feelings by interfering with the harvest; and, looking to the usual course of weather and harvesting, a week or 10 days later than the 31st of August would avoid this unpleasantness, and would not incur greater danger from bad weather.

COLONEL PARKER regretted that the right hon. Gentleman was not prepared to accede to the reasonable proposal made to him by the hon. Member (Mr. Dimsdale). Some years ago, when it was proposed to call out the Militia early in July, the agriculturalists represented to the authorities the great loss that would result therefrom, and the result was that the order was countermanded. He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to adopt a similar course in this case, and meet in some way the views of the agricultural interest. The 12 months' labour of the farmer was about to be jeopardized. He should naturally sympathize with the military if encamped in bad weather; but sympathized more so with those whose whole year's labour depended upon the success of the harvest. The military had experienced no very great inconvenience from a few wet days at the end of August or beginning of September; but it would have a damaging effect on the farmer when shorthanded, for what farmer would like a sprouting barley crop with the malt duty unrepealed? The labourer would also be deprived of earning his accustomed increase of wages at harvest, and be thereby prevented from making his usual savings for the winter. He hoped it was not even now too late to make some modification in the existing arrangements.

MR. WINGFIELD BAKER said, the Militia were being called out in April and May, when the labourer was earning his 15s. or 18s. a-week in hoeing the land. They drew him away from this lucrative employment, paying him as a Militiaman only 13s. 4d. a-week, and so entailing upon him a loss of from 1s. 8d. to 4s. 8d. Besides this, the employer was often obliged to get his crops hoed at an increase of price, paying 7s. 6d. or even more per acre, instead of some 5s. The corn crop, too, was often damaged to the extent of a quarter per acre. There were 7,000,000 acres under cultivation; and assuming that half the number of Militiamen called out were withdrawn from hoeing the crops, and supposing each man during his five weeks' training would have hoed 12 acres, he reckoned that the loss to the country would be about £1,500,000. In the county of Essex a great loss would be occasioned if a number of men were withdrawn at a moment when it became necessary that the land should be hoed, and serious detriment would be done to the crops. He might also observe that a consequence of the men being withdrawn at such a time from their occupations was, that the Militia became unpopular with both the labourers and the employers, and that injury was thus done to the general interests of the country. He trusted, therefore, his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War would give the matter his serious consideration.

MR. A. SMITH thanked the right hon. Gentleman for the attention which he had paid to the Question which he had addressed to him with respect to the training of the Hertfordshire Militia. It would be a serious loss to the farm labourer to be deprived of the £6 or £7 which he might earn during harvest time. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would listen to the appeals addressed to him, and would postpone the manœuvres for a few days.

MR. NEWDEGATE, speaking for the Midland counties, said the period of harvest was considered of more importance than the time of wheat-growing, and inasmuch as harvest there was not over before the end of the first week in September he trusted the right hon. Gentleman, if he desired the attendance of the Militia of those counties at the Autumn Manœuvres—and they were quite willing to serve—would consider the representations which had now been made in favour of deferring the manœuvres to the time to which they were deferred last year with so much success.

LORD HENRY THYNNE said, he hoped his hon. Friend would divide the House unless an assurance were given on the part of the Government that the Autumn Manœuvres would not be held until after the harvest had been completed. The harvest was very rarely over till after the middle of September, and if the manœuvres came off before that time great harm would be done, if not by the troops themselves, by the camp followers. The right hon. Gentleman said that the one great object of the manœuvres was to bring the Volunteers and the Militia into conjunction with the Regular Army; but he might inform him that, owing to the time which had been fixed on this year, the Wiltshire Militia had declined to attend because they could not leave their occupations. The Yeomanry, too, would find it impossible to leave their farms while the harvest was going on. He might add that, although the amount of damage done last year was small, the county in which the manœuvres were held was very different from that in which they were to come off this year.

SIR HENRY STORKS said, with regard to any inconvenience which might attend the calling out of the Militia at a particular time of the year, that the Inspector General took the precaution of making local inquiries on the subject before any period was decided upon by the Secretary of State for War. That was the invariable practice. As to the objection that Militiamen, when called out, lost money which they would have otherwise earned by agricultural labour, he might remark that the services of the Militia, like those of the regular soldiers, were perfectly voluntary, and the War Department experienced no difficulty in finding men on the present terms, nor was there any complaint made on the part of the men. With reference to the rate of labourers' wages, that would depend upon the general principle of supply and demand which always regulated it. At the same time, the Secretary of State for War had given instructions—and they had been carefully complied with—to the effect that every consideration should be paid to local interests. The difficulties which his hon. Friend (Mr. Wingfield Baker) had mentioned as affecting the agricultural interest in Essex did not appear to arise from the calling out of the Militia there. With regard to the observations of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, the 2nd Staffordshire Militia, so far from being unable to attend, had requested permission to be at the manœuvres, only expressing regret that the invitation had not arrived earlier. As regarded the Motion before the House, he had to assure it, on behalf of the Government, that what had been said that night would receive their full consideration, and without pledging the Secretary of State for War in any way to a departure from his present arrangements, he was authorized to state that his right hon. Friend had every desire to meet the wishes of all persons concerned as far as possible.

MR. GREENE said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had been very unhappy in his selection of the 31st of August for the commencement of the Autumn Manœuvres, and, though no very large damage might be done, still the "indirect claims" growing out of the abstraction of labour from farming operations at this period of the year must not be overlooked. If further time had been allowed, as in last year, no one would have had a right to complain; but the hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial side of the House seemed to think that the interest of agriculture was hardly worth considering. The case of the Staffordshire Militia was not in point, because they were composed of miners, who could be spared from their work, and not of farm labourers. He trusted that the hon. Member who brought forward the present Motion (Mr. Dimsdale) would divide the House on it, and let the country see that there was not on the benches opposite a practical Government, nor one which had any consideration for the great interest which supplied the food of the nation. No doubt it was important to have a well-organized Army; but it was also important, in settling the time when the men should assemble for the manœuvres, to fix a period when they could meet together with the least inconvenience. The present Government, however, if they could find one time more inconvenient than another, would select that period.

COLONEL CORBETT considered it important that the Militia regiments to be called out for the Autumn Manœuvres should not have their previous training curtailed; but if they got a fair drill first, then he thought they would be in a condition to receive much improvement from the manœuvres afterwards.

COLONEL WILSON - PATTEN said, that the Militia regiment with which he was connected had been summoned to the Autumn Manœuvres, and he did not find that there was any objection to attend. On the contrary, the proposal to take part in them was very popular; but that was not the whole of the question. At the present moment the price of labour was increasing, and the farmers were becoming alarmed lest their labourers should be taken away at a period when they were most wanted. However, the House had received from the Government an assurance that the appointment of the exact day when the manœuvres should be commenced would be reconsidered, and he would venture to suggest to the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. Dimsdale) not to divide the House, but to accept that assurance. He trusted that the same course would continue to be pursued with respect to Militia training which had been followed up to the present time, and that the men and officers would be consulted as to what would be the most convenient time for being called out. In his county (Lancashire) the same period did not suit all regiments, and the Secretary of State for War had, in compliance with the suggestions of the commanding officers, allowed some difference of time in the calling out of the various corps.

MR. CARDWELL said, he had been entirely misunderstood by the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmund's (Mr. Greene). The authorities had consulted the convenience of all parties, as far as they were aware. He had endeavoured to ascertain the wishes of agriculturists, and, as far as the information he had received went, there appeared to be general concurrence of opinion as to the convenience of the time selected. The authorities had no other object but to choose the most convenient period, and they were ready to reconsider the matter with the view of ascertaining what would really be the most convenient time, and he would state the result when he brought forward the subject again.

MR. DIMSDALE inferred from the debate that there was no practical objection to his Motion, which stated that the manœuvres ought not to take place at harvest time, and he should, therefore, press it to a division.

MR. DISRAELI must say that after the remarks which had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War it would be hardly necessary to press the House to divide on the Motion of his hon. Friend; for the House knew what those remarks meant—namely, the right hon. Gentleman felt that much had been urged by hon. Members which was worthy of attention, and when he brought forward his Bill on the subject the House would see the results of the conversation to-night. For his own part, he should regret not to vote for the Motion of his hon. Friend, because it was one founded on sound principles; but since the declaration made on the part of the Government, he thought it would be a want of courtesy on the part of hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House to press for a division.

MR. DIMSDALE then consented, in consequence of the appeal just made to him, to withdraw the Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SOUTH AFRICA.—RESOLUTION.

MR. R. N. FOWLER, in rising to call attention to the affairs of South Africa, and to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that facilities should be afforded, by all methods which may be practicable, for the confederation of the Colonies and States of South Africa," said, that at present there were in that quarter of the world a great variety of interests, and if a confederation of States could be brought about rivalry would be put an end to, and great advantage result to the people themselves. The question of confederation had already been discussed in that House, and it had been a great deal discussed in the South African colonies, as was evident from the Papers that had been presented on the subject. One question which had created much discussion, and on which the most eminent statesmen of this country had given their opinion, was that of responsible government in the Cape Colony. He ventured to urge on the Government that if they were to introduce responsible government it should be on a large scale, comprehending all the colonies of South Africa. That part of the world was now split up into several States, which were sometimes placed in a position of rivalry by a conflict of interests, and their individual interests would be very much promoted by confederation. Governor Sir George Grey, when Governor of the Cape of Good Hope, wrote a remarkable letter to the then Secretary of State for the Colonies, the present Lord Lytton, forcibly urging the confederation of the South African States on the plan which had since been carried out in North America; and the wisdom of the words he used had been vindicated by everything that had occurred in South Africa from that time to this. His Excellency said—

“The defects of the present system appear to be that the country must be always at war in some direction, as some one of the several States in pursuit of its supposed interests will be involved in difficulties, either with some European or native State. Every such war forces all the other States into a position of an armed neutrality or of interference. For if the State is successful in the war it is waging, a native race will be broken up, and none can tell what territories its dispersed hordes may fall upon; nor can the other States be assured that the coloured tribes generally will not sympathize in the war, and that a general rising may not take place. Ever since South Africa has been broken up in the manner above detailed, large portions of it have always been in a state of constant anxiety and apprehension from these causes.”

In South Africa there were five States—the Colonies of the Cape of Good Hope and of Natal; Western Kaffraria, which was entirely surrounded by British territory, and which must be considered in any scheme of confederation; and the two Republics which, unfortunately, had been allowed to separate themselves from Britain—the Transvaal Republic, which left us in 1852, when the colonies were under the administration of the right hon. Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington), and the Orange Free State, which separated from us two years later, under the Colonial Secretaryship of the Duke of Newcastle. In the Papers just presented to Parliament, Sir Henry Barkly alluded to the question of confederation, and seemed to advocate it for the Cape and the Orange Free State. Recently, in “another place,” there had been a discussion on the desirability of giving the Cape of Good Hope responsible government; but it was a very different question whether responsible government should be given by a large scheme of confederation such as that which he suggested. With regard to Natal, he wished to pay a passing tribute to the Native Minister, Mr. Shepstone, to whom the colony and this country were deeply indebted for his exertions in maintaining satisfactory relations with the Natives, and he hoped that Her Majesty’s Government would place that gentleman in a position which would enable him to carry out his views for the improvement of the Native races, who were in excess of the White population. In Natal, Mr. Welbourne had proposed a scheme of railway communication with the Free State, which had the support of the Legislative Council, and of all the most influential men in the colony, and which could be carried out without a tunnel, and without a greater gradient than 1 in 32. This line seemed to be recommended by very weighty considerations. The state of locomotion in Natal was very bad indeed. The present roads were mere tracks; waggons were often detained three or four weeks; during the last dry season 4,000 head of cattle perished of overwork and want of sustenance; and the transport of sugar 40 miles from the county of Victoria, which produced from £200,000 to £250,000 worth of sugar yearly, cost double its freight from Natal to London. This state of things could not fail to exert an injurious influence on the colony, and showed the pressing necessity of railways, which here, as in America, ought to be constructed even before roads. There were 350,000 Kaffirs who had been gradually trained to habits of industry; their productive toil was absolutely paralyzed; and with improved communications their thousand ploughs might be multiplied by ten. The unanimous support which the railway scheme had received in the colony entitled it to the attentive consideration of the Secretary of State, and should make the Government hesitate to exercise its power of veto. The Papers contained a curious correspondence with regard to a gentleman who came to this country as the Envoy of the Orange Free State, and who claimed, as the representative of an independent State, to confer with the Foreign Secretary; but it appeared that Her Majesty's Government very properly held that the relations between that State and the Mother Country ought to be dealt with by the Colonial Office. A question arose as to whom the diamond fields belonged, and the Orange Free State wished to have it referred to arbitration. It was suggested that three Commissioners should be appointed by each party; but the Orange Free State urged that there should be a power of appeal to some independent authority. To this proposition the Earl of Kimberley most properly objected, on the ground that England could not allow the question of her relations with South Africa to be interfered with by any foreign Power. Recently a rumour had reached him that the matter they had urged should be referred to the Dutch Minister in London; but he could not doubt that Her Majesty's Government would pursue the policy which the Earl of Kimberley had indicated. With regard to the South African Republic he might mention that he had seen a letter written by a minister of the Dutch Reformed Church, who said the state of affairs had greatly altered there, and that public opinion was now against slavery and wars with the Native races. He trusted the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies would be able to give information confirmatory of this statement. On former occasions he had called the attention of the House to the great atrocities connected with the system of "comandoes," which, in point of fact, was but another name for carrying children into slavery; but he was glad to learn that this practice was greatly on the decrease. The Rev. F. Leon Cachet, a clergyman of the Dutch Reformed Church, residing at Utrecht, in the Transvaal territory, says—

"Slavery in the Republic has received its death-blow. Notwithstanding the activity of our Government, notwithstanding the efforts of the enemies of justice, slavery in the Republic is dying out—never to be revived. The better-minded majority is having the upper hand over the evil minority."

As regarded the diamond fields, a number of proclamations by Sir Henry Barkly, the Governor of the Cape, were printed in the Parliamentary Papers, and they showed the great wisdom with which Sir Henry had endeavoured to settle the affairs of that country. There was, however, one point on which he trusted the Under Secretary would furnish additional information. A paper which had been sent to him by Sir Fowell Buxton contained a report of a meeting held in the diamond fields, at which a resolution was passed to the effect that when any person purchased diamonds from a native, such native should receive 50 lashes in the public market-place. Such a punishment was most severe and unjust, and he felt assured Her Majesty's Government and Sir Henry Barkly would use their utmost exertions to prevent its being inflicted. He was glad to see the Government had given their support to the eminent statesman who now administered our affairs in South Africa. Sir Henry Barkly had distinguished himself in every part of the world, and it was very fortunate that he should now be able to govern our dominions in South Africa. In conclusion, he expressed a hope that it might be Sir Henry's good fortune to establish in South Africa a system of government similar to that by which our North American Colonies had been united. Everybody must have been gratified at the proofs given during the last few days of the attachment of our North American Colonies to their Sovereign and to the Mother Country, and he trusted the result of the exertions of Sir Henry Barkly and of the Government might lead to a similar satisfactory state of things in South Africa. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

MR. W. M. TORRENS seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that facilities should be afforded, by all methods which may be practicable, for the confederation of the Colonies and States of South Africa."—(Mr. Robert Fowler.)

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN said, he thought he should be able to make a few remarks which would give some satisfaction to his hon. Friend and all those who were interested in this important question. He must point out, however, that the course pursued by his hon. Friend was somewhat inconvenient, as he had originally given Notice of his intention to discuss the affairs of South Africa generally, and it was not until last evening that he gave Notice of the particular subjects he intended to submit to the consideration of the House. So impressed were the Government with the desirability of attaining the object desired by the hon. Gentleman that they were willing to waive their usual objections to abstract Resolutions of this character, and to accept his Motion. His noble Friend at the head of the Colonial Department had stated in public despatches his willingness to accept the principle of confederation which was now occupying the attention of the colony. If the colony should adopt this principle, it would probably be necessary by Imperial legislation to empower the Cape Legislature to create provincial assemblies, and to vest powers of legislation in such assemblies, leaving the Colonial Legislature to pass a law embodying the necessary details. He did not propose at this moment to enter into this vast question of the desirability of adopting responsible government at the Cape, because Her Majesty's Government had expressed in public their opinion as to its desirability, and would now confidently leave the subject to be discussed by the Cape Colony. Some little time ago there was sent to this country what purported to be an address of the Governor of the colony in reference to this subject, but which was, as a matter of fact, a hoax. He hoped speedily, however, to present to Parliament an authentic report of what the Governor said. The question of responsible government at the Cape stood in this position at the present moment—Some years ago Sir Philip Wodehouse made a proposal to the Assembly in the direction of giving more power to the Crown and less to the people of the colony, but this was rejected by the Cape Parliament. As the colonists refused to approximate themselves to the position of Crown colonists, the only alternative was to adopt a system of responsible government, the present system having proved unworkable; but this was rejected by a small majority of the Legislative Council. In opening the present Session of the Colonial Parliament, the Governor said that, having now had time to form an opinion as to the direction which legislative reform in the colony ought to take, he was convinced of the thorough fitness of the colonists to be entrusted with the management of their own affairs, and had no doubt that responsible government might be safely adopted in the colony, and that its adoption was most desirable. With regard to another branch of the question, he had no doubt that federation and responsible government ought to go together, and he felt sure, further, that the more fully this question was discussed, both at home and in the colony, the more strongly would public opinion take the direction to which he was alluding. He did not intend to go into the vexed question between the Orange Free State and Transvaal Republics and the government of Cape Colony; but the Orange Free State especially must suffer from the present state of things, by which she was cut off from the sea and had to import everything through the Cape Colony, and he could not but feel that it would be to the advantage of both these Republics if they were again brought under the jurisdiction from under which they ought never to have gone. This question was, however, one which would gain nothing by premature discussion.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN resumed his observations. He said Her Majesty's Government were desirous to promote a system of federation in the belief that it would be most conducive to the best interests of the colony. The question of railways was one of very considerable importance to the whole of South Africa, and particularly of Natal, which had suffered much from the want of means of internal communication. A scheme proposed by Mr. Welbourne had occupied much attention in the colony for six months past, and opinions in its favour had been pronounced. Her Majesty's Government thought it desirable, as a general rule, that a scheme of so great magnitude ought to be undertaken by the Colonial Government, and not by a subsidized company; but there were some peculiar circumstances connected with Natal which had caused a somewhat different conclusion to be arrived at in the present case. The Earl of Kimberley, in a despatch which was then on its way to the colony, used these words—

“There are powerful reasons in favour of a colony undertaking to construct and work the railways which it may require, rather than placing them in the hands of a company receiving assistance from the State in the form of a subsidy or other special concessions. The position of Natal is, however, in some respects exceptional, and, after considering the extent to which it would be practicable for the colony at the present time to proceed at once with the construction of the projected railways as Government works by means of moneys borrowed on the security of the public revenue, I have come to the conclusion that the greatest number of miles of railway which could be thus constructed would be so limited that the railways would fail to command a remunerative traffic; and thus, while the colony would be imperfectly provided with means of communication, it would be committed to a very heavy annual charge for interest, with no certain prospect that the railways would either directly or indirectly produce an equivalent return. Her Majesty's Government feel bound to pay great attention to the deliberative opinion of the Legislative Council, which has the advantage of thorough local knowledge, that nothing short of the simultaneous and immediate construction of a comprehensive system of railways will suffice for the present requirements of the colony.”

The Earl of Kimberley then went on to state the division of responsibility between the Home and Colonial Governments, and, adverting to the careful consideration of the subject by the latter, and their reiterated opinion, added that, under all the circumstances, he should not be justified in refusing to entertain the proposal that Natal should resort to the same means through which many great railways had been successfully established in other countries—namely, to a subsidized company. [Mr. GILPIN desired to know whom the hon. Gentleman was quoting?] He was quoting the Earl of Kimberley. His noble Friend then went on to state that he required certain things to be done which did not appear to be provided for in the scheme, and certain details which were necessary to be arranged. Now that the principle had been conceded, he trusted it might be found easy to arrange those details so that no great delay might arise. The Government had in this instance done what he believed to be their duty; they had departed from the ordinary rules upon which they acted for the purpose of meeting the special circumstances of Natal. One very proper stipulation, he might add, had been made by his noble Friend, and that was that, before the undertaking should be sanctioned, a company should be properly formed and should prove its capability of carrying out the work before the colony was finally committed to it. He hoped that he had given sufficient evidence of the desire on the part of the Colonial Department to promote the interests of South Africa, and that he had shown that, whether in regard to the great question of federation or to that of railway communication, they had no wish to thrust their opinions upon the colony, but that their object was in this, as in all other matters, to consult the feelings and wishes of the colonists themselves.

Mr. GILPIN expressed his thanks to the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken for the course he had adopted in reference to this matter, and said that, in his opinion, even the brief discussion which they had had that evening would exercise a wholesome influence on the colonies, and would prove that the House of Commons was not indifferent to them. If he was to take exception to anything said by his hon. Friend it would be to his allusion to the railways. He considered that the colonies were themselves the best judges of such matters, and while the Colonial Office were no doubt right in laying down certain preliminary conditions, yet it seemed to him that if a colony were agreed in favour of a particular plan, that the great probability was that was the plan which ought to be adopted. Undoubtedly, the whole of Natal was in favour of Mr. Welbourne's scheme. Even the two Bishops, who could not agree in directing the people which road to take to Heaven, could yet agree as to the best mode of sending them to the gold-fields. The rival Bishops had signed a memorial in favour of this line, and it was probably the only document they had both signed since the signature of the Thirty-nine Articles. He knew personally that there was the strongest wish for the carrying out of this scheme, and he rejoiced that the Government was prepared to sanction it under certain conditions.

MR. EASTWICK would be glad to learn when his hon. Friend proposed to lay these Papers upon the Table.

MR. W. M. TORRENS also desired to acknowledge with feelings of gratitude the manner in which his hon. Friend (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) had dealt with this question, and expressed his conviction that the proceedings of that evening, when they came to be read in the colony, would be productive of real good. He thought that it was a matter of congratulation that they had at the head of the colony at this juncture of affairs such a Governor as Sir Henry Barkly, in whose good sense, discretion, and vigour, he had the greatest confidence. For one, he cordially concurred in all his hon. Friend had said as to the necessity of guarding against any hasty decision, especially as in a colony circumstanced like Natal it might be possible for the colony to be surprised into a premature or improvident arrangement. He congratulated his hon. Friend on his good fortune in having initiated a change of policy in relation to South Africa, and looked forward to the future with much satisfaction.

MR. M'ARTHUR expressed the great satisfaction with which he had listened to the speech of the Under Secretary for the Colonies, which would afford much gratification in South Africa, and especially that part of it relating to the railway, for no better assistance could be given to our dependencies than by developing internal communication.

Motion agreed to.

METROPOLIS—QUEEN SQUARE, WESTMINSTER, AND ST. JAMES'S STREET.

RESOLUTION.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK rose to move the following Resolution:—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it would conduce to the convenience of the public if a carriage communication were opened between Queen Square, Westminster, Birdcage Walk, and St. James's Street."

As it was very probable some Official would get up and move that the House be counted before he had proceeded far with his remarks, he should make them as brief as possible. In 1869, when Mr. Layard was Chief Commissioner of Works, he (Mr. C. Bentinck) had brought up this question, and suggested that a suspension bridge should be erected over the Ornamental Water in St. James's Park, which would shorten the route to the House by no less than 500 yards. Nothing, however, was done. On a later occasion, since the present Chief Commissioner had taken office, he again raised the question in a modified form, proposing that a carriage communication should be established by the road already existing between Marlborough House and Storey's Gate. He regretted that no record of his Question or of the Chief Commissioner's Answer appeared in Hansard, although they were given at length in the newspapers next morning; but the answer was that he could not entertain any proposition to make a permanent thoroughfare through St. James's Park; but as it was contemplated to stop up part of King Street, and obstruction might therefore arise to the passage of Members through Parliament Street, he proposed the formation of a temporary road through St. James's Park. Later in the Session, however, the Chief Commissioner, in answer to the hon. Member for Cricklade (Mr. Cadogan) stated that it did not then appear that King Street was likely to be stopped up; that it was desirable to see the effect of the Thames Embankment in relieving the traffic through Parliament Street; and that, under existing circumstances, it was not desirable to interfere with the arrangements in regard to St. James's Park unless it should be found to be absolutely necessary. In March last Session the noble Lord the Member for Cambridge (Viscount Royston) again brought the subject under the notice of the House; and moved an Address to the effect that the road by the east-end of St. James's Park might be opened for carriage traffic from Marlborough House to Storey's Gate. The Chief Commissioner, in reply, said that no present necessity had arisen for making a public thoroughfare through the Park; but that King Street being now shut up such a contingency as he had contemplated last Session had occurred, and the opening of such a road would be a convenience to hon. Members; but the road would be opened for the convenience of Members only. He (Mr. C. Bentinck), however, went back to his original plan, which had been approved by Sir Benjamin Hall. The bridge would only be 800 feet, and the estimated cost was £25,000. The scheme had commended itself to the late Sir John Thwaites, to the Duke of Somerset, and to the right hon. Baronet the Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey), all of whom were in its favour. It had been objected to on the ground that the Imperial taxation was asked to pay for an object which benefited local interests. He maintained strongly that that was not so. London improvements were always of great advantage to country visitors, and especially those improvements which promoted facilities for getting better access to the various railway stations. Another scheme would be the removal of the gates and iron railings at Queen's Square, the expense of which the inhabitants had offered, so long ago as the 8th July, 1868, to defray themselves, after asking the Ranger for his sanction to the formation of the carriage roadway. They received a generous answer, referring them to the Chief Commissioner of Works.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

House adjourned at a quarter
before Eight o'clock

ALL SAINTS CHURCH, CARDIFF, BILL.
[Lords.] (By Order.)—SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read a second time.”

MR. DILLWYN, in rising to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said, there was a very large Welsh-speaking population in Cardiff. Most of the people in Wales were Dissenters; but there was also a very large body of Church of England people. The want of a Welsh church exclusively devoted to Welsh-speaking people had been very strongly felt in Cardiff about 18 years ago, and the trustees of the Marquess of Bute, at the instance of the Marchioness, built a church expressly for the Welsh-speaking people. It was admitted that that was the object of the church; and the Communion Service had been given by Lady Bute, with a Welsh inscription upon it, which was a proof that the church was intended only for those Welsh inhabitants of Cardiff who were unacquainted with the English language. From various causes the congregation had dwindled away very much. One cause lay in the character of the population, which had very much changed; but he believed the leading cause was, that the gentleman appointed to the ministration in the church was not a Welshman, but an Englishman who had learned the Welsh language, but did not speak it as a native-born Welshman would. He hardly knew the name of the incumbent; but was credibly informed that he did not address the congregation in the manner they liked. The consequence was, he had lost his congregation. A similar case had happened in Liverpool, where a Welsh church had fallen away from a like cause; but they had got a proper Welsh clergyman who understood the language, and the church had been filled. In Cardiff, if a Welshman were appointed to the church the result would probably be the same. The present Bill was promoted by the Marquess of Bute and the incumbent, and his Lordship was desirous of getting the church. The question was, whether the House should agree to a Bill which proposed to hand over the church to the Marquess of Bute. It was, no doubt, intended to convert this church into a Roman Catholic place of worship, and to carry on the Welsh service elsewhere; but the Welsh service so conducted was to take its place by the side of the English, with the invariable result of being shunted on one side. The proposal was one strongly resented by the Welsh people, and as the House very rarely had a Welsh grievance brought before it, he trusted that this particular one would receive the consideration to which he believed it was fully entitled. The people who were interested in this matter were poor, and could not afford the expenses which would attend an opposition upstairs. Such a measure as this, disestablishing a part of the national institutions, ought, in his opinion, not to be brought in as a Private Bill, but should be introduced as a public measure. He was in favour of disestablishing the Church in Wales; but objected to dealing with public and national institutions by Private Bill legislation. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Amendment.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN, in seconding the Amendment, protested against an attempt to smuggle this Bill through the House as a Private Bill. No Bill which dealt with a great public question and on public principle ought to be treated as a Private Bill. This Bill was nothing more than an attempt on a small scale to disestablish the Welsh Church, not in the interests of the Non-conformists or of the people of Wales, but in the interests of the Roman Catholics, and the English-speaking section of the Church of England in Wales. The population for whom the church was intended consisted chiefly of dockyard labourers, common seamen, and marine storekeepers, and if his hon. Friend (Mr. Dillwyn) had not taken up their cause they would have been smothered under the ecclesiastical tyranny which proposed to deprive them of their church. They had done what they could, for he had himself presented a Petition against this Bill, signed by 1,300 persons. It should be remembered, moreover, that at the lowest computation there were 20,000 people in Cardiff who preferred the Welsh language to the English. To say that they kept up 12 chapels in Cardiff, and did not care to attend All Saints', was a very strong argument against the Established Church in Wales, but no argument in favour of this Bill. This was the first time since the Reformation that it had been proposed to sell a Protestant church to the Roman Catholics. The site was selected by the late Marchioness of Bute as the very best that could be obtained for the purpose, and the cause of the scanty attendance arose from the fact that the incumbent had not succeeded in learning the Welsh language. The proposed purchaser of this church was a Roman Catholic nobleman, the Marquess of Bute, who could put his hand upon any spot in Cardiff, and set it apart for a Roman Catholic church. Why, then, should he spare his flocks and herds and lay his hands upon this little ewe lamb? He, for one, would do all in his power to obstruct this compact between a Peer who had abjured the religion of his fathers and a Bishop who did not understand the language of his flock.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that during some years he had had a good deal of information respecting the working classes in Wales; and his connection with the Principality arose from the fact that a valued relative of his was Chancellor of the diocese of St. David's, and he felt confident that the sale of this church would produce a most evil impression amongst the working classes. If there were any great occasion for the sale it might be excused; but the only palliation of the proposal seemed to be that it was a matter of convenience. The Bishop of Llandaff had been induced to consent to the sale of the church by the Marquess of Bute, the church having been founded, and given to the locality, by the late Marchioness of Bute. Why was this proposal made? Because the Marquess of Bute, having changed his religion, refused to endow this Protestant church. Who could expect that he would do so? But what was the plea? The plea was this—that the district was inhabited by a colony of Irish Roman Catholics. Well, but supposing that Irish Roman Catholics had collected in this district, was it to be held that, wherever there was a colony of Irish Roman Catholics, the Church of England was to be sold to them? But that was the principle of the Bill; and it was a great principle which was involved in the Bill. It was the principle upon which the majority of them had disestablished the Irish Church. The application of this principle was, in the present instance, on a small scale; but that made no difference in the principle—the principle in this case was the same as in that of the Established Church. He was prepared to show how it was so. Why was the Irish Church disestablished? Because it was a Missionary Church; and were they to entabish now in England the principle that the Church of England was to be deprived of every fabric which harboured a small and therefore a missionary congregation? That was the principle involved, and it was a principle to which he, for one, objected, because he knew that it grated upon the feelings of the English people. What had they heard in respect of Wales? The right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) went down to Wales, and proposed the disestablishment of the Church of England in Wales; and why? Because he knew—and he (Mr. Newdegate) was sorry to say the right hon. Gentleman was right—that the conduct of the Church in Wales, where it was ritualistic, had alienated the Welsh population. Could any means be conceived more calculated to increase that feeling of alienation than the sale to the Church of Rome of a church belonging to the Church of England, expressly founded for preaching in the Welsh language? He could not, for his own part, conceive an act of greater impolicy, or one more calculated to increase the feeling of alienation which had already spread among the Welsh people, as against the Church of England.

COLONEL STUART, in supporting the Bill, said, that 18 years ago, when the church was founded, the district was one of fields and moors, but was now inhabited chiefly by an Irish Roman Catholic population. He believed it would be of great convenience to the Church of England workmen that they should have a church in a more convenient place. The whole of the clergy of the Established Church doing duty in Cardiff had petitioned in favour of the Bill, and he hoped the House would pass it.

MR. GOLDNEY gathered from the Bill that the site of the church had been given by the late Marchioness when the docks were in formation, the expectation being that there would be Welsh labourers in the locality, and it was thought desirable that there should be a church for them where the service was conducted in their own language. But the facts had altered. Instead of a Welsh population going to the place it had been inhabited by an almost exclusively Irish Roman Catholic population, and it was now wanted to remove the church to a place where the Welsh population would attend it, which they did not do at present. This principle had been carried out in London, where churches had been removed from inconvenient to convenient sites. In the present instance the person who had built the church asked that it might be transferred to a place where the people would attend it. He (Mr. Goldney) was not aware that the congregation had fallen away solely because the clergyman was not a Welshman; and he believed that one great cause was that the population of the district in which the church was situated belonged to a totally different persuasion. He therefore hoped the Bill would be read a second time.

MR. BRUCE said, it had been his happy duty on very many occasions to co-operate with the Bishop of Llandaff, and he was satisfied, from his intimate knowledge of the character of the Bishop, that he would never have sanctioned the present measure if he had thought that it would have the slightest influence for evil on the Church among the Welsh-speaking population of the diocese. And when he found the whole of the clergy in Cardiff—many of whom were Welsh of the Welsh—and many of the laity, in favour of the Bill, he confessed there were strong prima facie reasons in its favour. Acting in accord with the Marchioness, the Bishop determined that the experiment should be tried of devoting the church exclusively to the Welsh-speaking people. It had been planted in a thinly-peopled part of the town; but the population of the town had since doubled, and the district was now inhabited by Roman Catholics. The result was that the congregation had dwindled down to about 10 in the morning and 20 in the evening. It might, perhaps, be said that this was owing to having a clergyman who could not speak Welsh; but before him there was a Welsh-speaking clergyman. [Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN: And the church was full.] Even then the church was not full. The Bishop of Llandaff had instituted a system of having missionary clergymen to preach in those districts which were exclusively Welsh. The present incumbent of the church—the Rev. Morgan Lloyd—though of Cornish extraction, was born in Wales; and he was employed by the Bishop to minister to the Welsh in the hills of Glamorganshire. There he had extraordinary success, and the consequence was that the Bishop appointed him to the incumbency of the church. Such were the circumstances under which the Church was so ill-filled. The Marquess of Bute being desirous to have a chapel for the Roman Catholic population made this proposition—that if this church were assigned to him, he would give in exchange a site in a part of the district far better suited for the purpose, and on which, with the purchase money for the existing church, another church could be erected. It was to be supposed that, under the circumstances, the Bishop and clergy would jump at the proposal. He had correspondence with various members of the Church, and they assured him that the proposal was one of the very best that could be made. One of these gentlemen was the chairman of Quarter Sessions, who was intimately connected with the place, and he assured him that the proposed removal would be most advantageous. It was really not a question as to Welsh services at all, because it was not in the power of the Bishop during any incumbency to say whether the incumbent should conduct the services in English or in Welsh.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, it must be borne in mind that this church was originally designed as a church for the Welsh-speaking people of Cardiff as a whole. It was originally a chapel-of-ease to the large parish of St. Mary; but since that time a district had been assigned to it, and it ceased to be a chapel-of-ease. Notwithstanding what was said in the letter which had been published by the Lord Bishop, he contended that the church was designed for the whole Welsh-speaking population of Cardiff, and that it was wrong to assign it to a district. So far as the Marquess of Bute was concerned, it seemed to him that nothing could be more handsome or proper than his conduct; but still, what the House was called upon to do was to alienate from the poor Welsh people of Cardiff a church which was erected for them exclusively, and which absolutely belonged to them. They had a vested right in this church. ["No, no!"] If not a legal vested right, they had an undoubted moral vested right. The Welsh-speaking population of Cardiff was at least 10,000, and there were 12 entirely Welsh Nonconformist chapels in the town. This being so, was it not a shame that they were asked to take away the only one Welsh church from the poor of Cardiff? It was true that the congregation of the church had fallen off; but the Lord Bishop gave the reason for that. He said that, owing to the smallness of the stipend, which was originally only £80 a-year, he had not been able to obtain the continuous services of a man of much ability. It had been said that the present incumbent was an able man; but it was clear he had not touched the hearts of the people, and he had not filled the church. He believed that if the matter were passed over until another year some compromise would be come to by which Welsh services would be secured. He hoped the House would not consent to pass the Bill.

MR. HORSMAN observed, that he had entered the House knowing nothing of this Bill; but the speech of the Home Secretary had certainly surprised him. He said that the church was originally built for the Welsh population, but that population had ceased to be so large as it was, and therefore there should be a change in reference to the church. There might, however, be a change in the Church population in other parts of the country.

MR. BRUCE: The proposition was not to remove the church out of the district, but only out of that part of the district that was Roman Catholic, in order to put it into another part that was not so.

MR. HORSMAN: In any district in England where the Church population dwindled to a minority—perhaps from accidental causes, from having an unpopular or incompetent minister—they might come to the House of Commons and apply for an Act to sell the district church. He was sorry that the Prime Minister was not there to say whether he would support what was said by the Home Secretary. If they should come to have a parish where the Church population was as one to ten he did not know why, if a liberal offer were made, the parish church itself might not be sold. He was startled at this proposition. No doubt the question was a very simple one; but by the speech of the Home Secretary it was made one of great constitutional importance.

LORD CLAUD JOHN HAMILTON, happening to know something of that case, hoped the House would not be led away by the sentimental arguments of the Welsh Members or by the fear of Popery which had developed itself in the mind of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), but would rather listen to what had been said by the hon. Member for Cardiff (Colonel Stuart) and by the Home Secretary. The question was a very simple one. The trustees of the Marquess of Bute, during his minority, built that church in Cardiff, and decided that the services should be conducted in Welsh. Although there were 10,000 Welsh people in Cardiff, it was found that under several incumbents that church was badly attended; and under the present incumbent, although the numbers had somewhat increased since he was appointed, there were rarely more than 10 worshippers at the morning and 20 at the evening service. Consequently the incumbent, with the approval of the whole of the Established clergy in Cardiff, and with the assent of the Bishop, applied to the Marquess of Bute for a fresh site on which to build a church in the selfsame district. The Marquess of Bute, with his usual generosity, had offered to give a site free of charge and to pay over the sum which this church originally cost on condition that when the new church was built the empty and useless fabric now existing was handed over to him. What could be more handsome than such an offer? Was it likely that the hon. Members for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), and Denbigh (Mr. Osborne Morgan) understood the interests of the Established Church in Wales better than the Bishop and clergy of the diocese? In order to relieve the House from any anxiety on the subject, he might state that he had received a letter from Cardiff which showed that the spiritual wants of the Welsh-speaking inhabitants of Cardiff who belonged to the Established Church were amply provided for independently of the services that were performed in this church. Had not this church been handed over to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners it would have been unnecessary to have come to Parliament in order to obtain its sanction for its transfer under this arrangement. The measure having passed the House of Lords without comment from the Bench of Bishops he trusted that it would not be rejected by that House on sentimental grounds.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS, at the risk of encountering prejudice and of being misunderstood, and even misrepresented by many, must say that he was in favour of this Bill. He had carefully studied the facts in relation to the subject, from the foundation of this church in 1854 down to the present time, and the conclusion at which he had arrived was, that the opposition to this Bill, and the popular feeling which had been roused against it, were founded entirely upon misconception, fostered by prejudice. He thought there was an absence of fairness and candour, and even of bona fides in the opposition to this Bill. It was rather too much to say that the measure was opposed to the interests of the Church of England, when it had received the approval of the Bishop of the diocese, and all the clergy of Cardiff; and there was not the slightest pretence for characterising the arrangement as a mere sale of a church, or as a sacrifice of a small and helpless Protestant Church to the selfishness of a great Roman Catholic nobleman, and the encroaching spirit of the Roman Catholic Church. By this Bill it was provided that a new church should first be erected in every way equal to the present building, and on a more convenient and suitable site, away from the Irish Catholic population; and that when this was completed and open for use—and not till then—it should be exchanged for and devoted to the same identical purposes as the present church, which would include any existing conditions as to Welsh purposes. This would be no gain or advantage to the Roman Catholics, for there was nothing to prevent the Marquess of Bute to-morrow building a Roman Catholic cathedral alongside All Saints' Church. The exchange would be a mutual accommodation, greatly to the advantage of the Church of England, in the opinion of the Bishop and clergy, and no substantial injury to anybody that he could see. The thousands who petitioned against this Bill never went near the church, and never contributed one farthing towards providing an efficient Welsh clergyman, and the church was a complete failure. He thought that in the true interests of the Welsh Protestant community, and the peace and good-will of the town, it was to be regretted that this exchange was not allowed to be made without rousing those religious prejudices and animosities which had too long disgraced and injured this country. He should therefore vote for the second reading of the Bill.

MR. RICHARD, speaking on behalf of many of his countrymen who were members of the Established Church, opposed the measure on the ground that it was a serious encroachment upon the rights of the Church of England inhabitants of Cardiff. It had been stated, in support of the Bill, that it was difficult to secure a Church of England minister who spoke the Welsh language, to officiate in the church in question; but he could scarcely think that this could be the case when no difficulty was experienced in obtaining Welsh-speaking ministers for the numerous Nonconformist places of worship in Wales. He believed that if the Bill passed it would excite a bitter feeling among members of the Church throughout the Principality.

MR. OCTAVIUS MORGAN supported the Bill in the interest of the public peace, inasmuch as the windows of the church were constantly being broken, the clergy insulted, and the congregation annoyed by the Roman Catholic population, in whose neighbourhood the building was situated. The scheme proposed would be of the greatest possible advantage, and the removal to a more suitable place would be of great advantage to the Church.

MR. SINCLAIR AYTOUN regarded the Bill as part of a system of intimidation which had been adopted by the Roman Catholic population of Cardiff towards the members of the Church of England, and if it were passed a premium would be offered to the practice of similar intimidation elsewhere. The Home Secretary had been the great promoter of this species of intimidation, through the course he had adopted with reference to the Murphy riots in the North of England, when he had written to the mayors of the towns where they had occurred announcing his willingness to put into force an old Act of Parliament introduced in Pitt's time for the prevention of public discussion. He trusted that the House would not allow the Bill to become law.

MR. EASTWICK said, he thought that this particular Bill had no relation whatever to the general question of the transfer of churches from one place to another. The Marquess of Bute had built this church; it had become useless for the purpose for which it was built, and he offered another instead of it. He asked the House to consider it, not as a general, but as a merely local question.

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE wished to say a few words upon this question, as to which he gathered nearly all he knew from the debate. They were asked to do by a Private Bill what, in his opinion, should be done only by a public measure. He did not think that it was altogether a question of providing a church for the Roman Catholic population, nor whether this particular church could be better placed in some other part of Cardiff. How did the matter stand? The trustees built a church in an ecclesiastical district connected with the old church of Cardiff, in order that the old population of that part of Cardiff should have the services performed in the Welsh language. This object had not been fully realized, partly through the want of an adequate endowment. One most extraordinary statement in the Petition for the Bill, given as a reason in favour of it, was that this church had been much damaged by the Roman Catholic portion of the population, who had broken the windows. Under these circumstances, it was a strange proposition to say that the Welsh portion of the population in Cardiff should have withheld from them the benefits intended for them, and when, according to the Bishop's own letter, the transfer of such church to another part of Cardiff was, not for the purpose of securing a Welsh church there, but to secure the establishment of a church in which the English language would be used. The smallness of the congregation and the absence of an adequate endowment did not justify the sale of the church.

Mr. Watkin Williams

MR. C. DALRYMPLE wished the right hon. Gentleman to bear in mind that the new site, so far from being at a distance, was within the limits of the district. It would be more suitable for the Protestant population, and would enable the Church of England to do efficient work. He believed some of the opponents of the Bill on the other side of the House wished to retain the present site in order that the church might remain weak.

MR. GREENE said, he could not see why the Roman Catholics, if they required a church in this district, should not build one, instead of wanting a building belonging to the Church of England. If the inhabitants of the district hereafter changed their views or gave place to a Protestant population there would, if the Bill passed, be no church for them. He was not ashamed to say he was one of those who disagreed from the Pope.

ARMY—VOLUNTEERS—CAPITATION GRANT.—QUESTION.

COLONEL C. LINDSAY asked the Secretary of State for War, When the Capitation Grant to the Volunteer Service, which has been delayed so much longer than usual, to the great inconvenience of Commanding Officers, will be ready for issue?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, the rules require that each corps shall furnish the names of the members of the Finance Committee, and of the members of that Committee to whom the issue is to be made. I am informed that the corps which have so applied have received the grant, but that the hon. and gallant Colonel's corps is not among them.

FRANCE—DEPORTATION OF POLITICAL PRISONERS.—QUESTION.

MR. OTWAY: Sir, it may be in the recollection of the House that, in the early part of the Session, I addressed a Question to the noble Lord the Under

Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs with regard to the landing of French prisoners in this country in a state of destitution, and he then informed me that the Secretary of State would immediately communicate with the French Government on the subject. On the 4th of March my hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Bromley-Davenport) repeated the Question to the Under Secretary, who replied that friendly remonstrances had been addressed to the French Government on the subject. Hearing that political prisoners still continued to be landed in a state of destitution in this country a gentleman addressed a letter to the Foreign Office on the subject on the 12th of March I think, and on the 14th of March the writer received this answer from the Foreign Office — that Her Majesty's Ambassador had received assurances from the French Government to the effect that the practice would be put a stop to of sending destitute Communists to this country. During the Recess I was made acquainted with the fact that French political prisoners had arrived in this country in a state of utter destitution, possessing no money or means of procuring sustenance, and that consequently on more than one occasion they had been forced into that which is deemed a crime in this country—namely, procuring means of sustenance from the fields. I received this morning a letter, dated the 28th of May, from a gentleman connected with the Union in the borough which I represent—Chatham—in which the writer says—

"I find by The Times of this morning you purpose asking the Government a Question this evening respecting the French prisoners, &c. I thought it as well to tell you that on Saturday week we had in our workhouse 21 of these poor fellows. They were in a most wretched condition. They left next day for London."

Under these circumstances, I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, What course Her Majesty's Government intend to take in consequence of the continued transportation to this Country of French political and other prisoners in a state of destitution, notwithstanding the assurances on this subject given by Her Majesty's Government in the House of Commons and elsewhere?

MR. GLADSTONE said, his hon. Friend must bear in mind that this subject was raised two or three days ago, on a Question put by the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) to his noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. His noble Friend replied that the matter was still under discussion between the two Governments, and during the 48 hours which had passed since that answer was given, nothing had been heard which would enable him to make any addition to that statement. In the course of a very short time, however, he hoped it would be in the power of the Government to give more definite information.

MR. OTWAY asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that French political prisoners continued to arrive in this country, and that he received a letter from the clerk of the Chatham Union stating that on Saturday week 21 of these destitute persons were received in the Chatham Workhouse, and thus became a burden on the ratepayers.

MR. GLADSTONE said, his hon. Friend must bear in mind that the simple fact of the prisoners arriving in a state of destitution was not the whole of the case. The question was as to the intervention of the French Government. He had no information—nor was he aware that the Foreign Office had any information—of any new case in which there had been any intervention of the French Government in transmitting persons of that description to this country.

POST OFFICE—MAILS TO THE SOUTH OF IRELAND.—QUESTION.

MR. DELAHUNTY asked the Postmaster General, Whether the great mass of postal correspondence from England, Wales, and Scotland, to all parts of Ireland, is carried by the night mails, via Holyhead to Dublin, and from thence forwarded by the morning mails to the country; whether within the last two or three years (contrary to the wishes expressed by many of the merchants and traders affected thereby) the mails for the south of Ireland have not been delayed in Dublin from 8.35 A.M. to 9.0 A.M., whilst the mails to the north and west are as heretofore despatched at 8.25 and 8.30 A.M. respectively, and if such delay is to be still continued; whether any steps have been taken to accelerate the delivery of letters in Cork, Limerick, and Waterford; whether he is aware that if the mails for Waterford, even although delayed in Dublin as at present, were forwarded by the Dublin and Cork Railway to Maryborough, and from thence by the Waterford and Central Railway to Waterford, they could be delivered forty-five minutes sooner than at present; and, if the latter Company is willing to perform such service, would the Postmaster General take advantage of it; and, whether he has notified to the Waterford and Central Railway Company his refusal to arbitrate on the service required from them at the present time by the Post Office, and also his intention to determine said service in carrying the mails to Waterford; and, if so, whether he would state by what route he purposes to forward the mails from Dublin to Waterford?

MR. MONSELL: Sir, the great mass of postal correspondence from England, Wales, and Scotland, to all parts of Ireland, is carried by the night mails via Holyhead to Dublin, and thence forwarded by the morning mails to all parts of the country. The departure of the day mail from Dublin was postponed from 8.35 to 9 a.m. about three years ago in order to lessen the risk of the English correspondence being left behind in case of the packet being late, owing to storm; but so far from this change having been contrary to the wishes of the persons interested, complaints had been received of the great inconvenience arising from the occasional delay of the English correspondence, and the alteration met with the concurrence of a deputation of Irish Members of Parliament, of which my hon. Friend was himself a member. [MR. DELAHUNTY: Certainly not.] That was the information I received. Moreover, much of the time lost was regained by improved local arrangements at Waterford. In consequence of a notice received from the Waterford and Central Ireland Railway Company, re-opening the question of payment for the mail service, the existing arrangements are being carefully revised, but no decision has yet been arrived at as to what alterations will be made. No change is likely to take place until the latter part of the year, and the new arrangements will, of course, depend much upon the willingness of the Railway Companies to give facilities to the Post Office upon such terms as the circumstances will warrant.

ARMY—WINDSOR CAVALRY BARRACKS.
SURGEON MAJOR LOGIE.

QUESTION.

LORD GARLIES asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the case that a Report of Surgeon Major Logie, an Officer of the Royal Horse Guards with over thirty years' service, was forwarded by the Officer commanding that Regiment to the General in command of the district to the effect, that, owing to the effluvia arising from drains at the moment open and others about to be opened, and other causes of a like nature, a part at least of the Cavalry Barracks at Windsor were, in his opinion, "unfit for occupation;" whether this Report contained an assurance that Surgeon Major Logie was supported in this view by two other Surgeons of long standing in the Household Brigade; whether a Board of Inspection composed of a Lieutenant in the Royal Engineers and a Staff Surgeon of under twenty years' service was in consequence appointed to report upon the accuracy of Surgeon Major Logie's Report; whether a Board thus composed did draw up a Report which led to a communication being sent in the shape of a severe reprimand to Surgeon Major Logie, complaining of his Report not being substantiated, and as "causing much anxiety, correspondence, and trouble, and resulting in no proof," and therefore "shorn of much of its value;" whether it is not the truth that several Officers have corroborated his statements, and that several Officers and one Non-Commissioned Officer have been since attacked with symptoms of a typhoid character, and one Officer removed from the Barracks in question owing to similar but more intense symptoms; and, what steps, if any, are going to be taken to remedy this deplorable result?

MR. CARDWELL, in reply, said, he was not surprised that the House should have manifested some signs of impatience at a detailed Question of that kind, because it was quite open to an Officer who felt himself aggrieved by any reprimand which he might have received from the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief to make a proper representation through his superiors, which would be most certainly attended to by

His Royal Highness. He submitted to the noble Lord, who had himself been an officer in the Household Brigade, that it would be more likely to conduce to discipline in the Army that such a course should be pursued, than that ex parte statements should be placed on the Paper of the House in the form of a Question addressed to him. As the Question had been put, perhaps the House would allow him to give an answer. ["No, no!"] Well, then, since the House did not wish that he should give an answer, he would suggest to the noble Lord to advise Surgeon Major Logie to make a representation through his Commanding Officer to the proper quarter.

LORD GARLIES said, he thought it would be satisfactory to the House if the right hon. Gentleman answered the Question. ["No, no!"] He wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman declined to answer?

MR. CARDWELL: I can only repeat what I have already said. I collect from what has occurred that it was not the wish of the House that the Question should be put, and it is not their wish that I should proceed to give an answer.

LORD GARLIES: Well, then, I beg to give Notice that I shall call the attention of the House to the subject on the earliest opportunity.

TURNPIKE ACTS CONTINUANCE.

QUESTION.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON asked the President of the Local Government Board, If his attention has been called to that part of the Report of the Select Committee on Turnpike Acts Continuance in which they "call the earnest attention of Parliament to the importance of not allowing the present Session to close without making the adoption of the Highway Act compulsory throughout the Country;" and, if so, whether it is his intention to comply with this recommendation?

MR. BRUCE said, in reply, that if it were possible or useful to deal with one portion of the question by itself he should have been prepared to bring in a Bill on the subject. But the question was part of a very much larger one, and there were three or four other very difficult matters which would have to be dealt with. After communication with the President of the Local Government Board, he was of opinion that a far better settlement of this question would be obtained by postponing it to another Session.

LAW REFORM—THE JUDICATURE COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether it is not a fact that a Draft of a Bill for the reconstruction of the Judicature Commission was some time ago furnished to the Government, and, if so, what has become of it; whether it is the intention of the Government to bring in any Bill for this purpose during the present Session; whether the Government have any objection to lay upon the Table of the House the Draft Bill referred to; and, whether it is the intention of the Government to dissolve the said Commission?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, in reply, that it was perfectly true that the Lord Chancellor had been furnished by certain Members of the Judicature Commission with certain proposals, which, with other materials, had been embodied in a draft Bill which would have been presented to Parliament if the reception of the Appellate Jurisdiction Bill by the House of Lords had been somewhat different. The Appellate Jurisdiction Bill had been referred to a Select Committee of their Lordships' House, and it must very much depend on the result of that reference whether the draft Bill to which he had alluded, and which was still in existence, would be presented to Parliament during the present Session. It was quite unusual to lay on the Table of the House a Bill when only in draft, and before it assumed the shape of a direct proposal, and he could not be a party to any such proceeding. The Judicature Commission was now engaged in the preparation of its final Report, which he trusted before very long would be presented. There was no intention of dissolving the Commission before that was done.

ARMY—SICKNESS AT CASHEL BARRACKS.—QUESTION.

MR. STACPOOLE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has been informed that scarlatina has broken out in the Cashel Barracks; and, whether any arrangement has been made to place the Tipperary Militia in Clonmel or some other suitable barracks during their training instead of Cashel?

Mr. Bruce

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, I have made inquiry, and the answer conveyed by telegraph from the officer commanding at Cashel was as follows:—

"There is no case of scarlatina in barracks, or any other disease. One recruit joined on the 6th of May ill, which resulted in scarlatina. He died on the 15th of May. No other case occurred."

NAVY—RULE OF THE ROAD AT SEA—SAILING REGULATIONS.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the President of the Board of Trade, If he will refer the question whether any change is desirable in the present Rule of the Road at Sea to the Committee now sitting at the Admiralty on the cognate subject of the Fittings of Boats for Saving Life at Sea?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, in reply, said, he could not consent to refer that question to the Admiralty Committee, to which the hon. Baronet referred. The Admiralty did not consider the subjects cognate, and he felt bound to add that he was not prepared to re-open the question by a reference of that kind.

RATING—EXEMPTIONS OF GOVERNMENT PROPERTY.—QUESTION.

DR. BREWER asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he sees any prospect of bringing in a Bill to repeal certain exemptions of Government property to rating this Session?
